[5, 6] Over the strenuous objection of counsel for defendants, the prosecution was permitted to introduce evidence to the effect that, several weeks after the crime for which defendants were on trial was committed, the defendants were originally arrested on a charge of carrying concealed weapons and thereafter "booked on a suspicion of robbery." Also, that when so arrested the defendants were in possession of an automobile in which a "gun" was found. No connection was shown between either or any of such facts and the crime for which defendants were on trial, or with any fact relevant thereto. Following their discharge from custody on the charge of carrying concealed weapons, which was preferred against them at that time, defendants were rearrested and were then charged with the commission of the robbery of which they were convicted in the instant case. That the evidence to which objection was made was inadmissible is ruled in each of the authorities to which attention hereinbefore has been directed. In addition thereto, especially as to the inadmissibility of evidence that at the time defendants were arrested on a charge of carrying concealed weapons a "gun" was found in an automobile which defendants were operating, see People v. Milburn, 89 Cal. App. 526, 265 P. 285.

[7] Further complaint is made by appellants that the trial court committed prejudicial error as against defendants by modifying a certain instruction offered by them and thereafter giving to the jury the instruction as thus modified. The instruction in question dealt with the so-called "defense" of an alibi.

With the exception that, as requested by defendants, no words of the instruction were italicized, it was as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if you do not believe from the evidence that the defendants were present at the time and place when and where the offense, if any, was committed, but that they were at some other and different place or places, or if you have a reasonable doubt as to whether this is the case, then you will find them not guilty. The defendants are presumed to be innocent until their guilt is established by legal evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, and if you have a reasonable doubt of their guilt you will acquit them."

All the words italicized in the foregoing instruction were stricken by the trial court, and, as thus modified, the instruction was given to the jury. In effect, the essential difference between the first part of the instruction requested by defendants and that given by the trial court was that, had the former instruction been given, in substance the jury would have been told that, if from the evidence the jury had a reasonable doubt as to whether at the time the robbery was committed defendants "were at some other and different place or places" than that at which the crime actually occurred, they were entitled to an acquittal; whereas by the instruction as modified and thus given to the jury it was informed that, "if you do not believe from the evidence that the defendants were present at the time and place when and where the offense, if any, was committed, but that they were at some other and different place or places, then you will find them not guilty."

It thus will be seen that the element of "reasonable doubt" as to the whereabouts of defendants at the time the crime was committed was omitted from the instruction given to the jury. The authorities of this state are unanimous in the declaration of the law that as to the "defense" of alibi, if the defendant introduces sufficient evidence to raise a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, he is entitled to an acquittal. People v. Winters, 125 Cal. 325, 57 P. 1067; People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 55 P. 137; People v. Garrett, 93 Cal. App. 77, 268 P. 1071; People v. Mar Gin Suie, 11 Cal. App. 42, 57, 103 P. 951.

[8] It is further contended by appellants that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in giving to the jury, at the request of the people, the following instruction: "The Court instructs the jury that if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants or either of them feloniously took from the person or the immediate presence of Robert Mullins, the property, or any part thereof, as charged in the Information, by means of force used upon Robert Mullins, as charged in the Information, or aided, abetted and assisted any other person or persons to so feloniously take from the person or the immediate presence of the said Robert Mullins, the property or any part thereof as charged in the Information, by means of force or fear and against the will and consent of the said Robert Mullins as charged in the Information then you should find the defendants guilty."

On reading the foregoing instruction, at once it will be noted that its gist consists in a statement that, if either of the defendants committed the robbery in question, or if either of them aided or abetted any other person in its commission, then the jury should find both of the defendants guilty. It should be remembered that the defendants were not charged jointly, but that each of them was separately charged with the commission of the offense, and that the "defense" of "alibi" of one defendant rested upon an entirely different state of facts and circumstances from that presented by his codefendant. It was altogether possible that one of them was guilty of the offense of which he was charged and at the same time that his codefendant was wholly innocent. But in the instruction of the trial court, if "either of them feloniously took from the person or the immediate presence" of the victim of the robbery the property, or any part thereof, as charged in the information, or "aided, abetted and assisted" any other person in the commission of the offense, it would become the duty of the jury to "find the defendants guilty." The prejudicial effect of such an instruction is most obvious.

It becomes unnecessary to consider either of several other alleged errors which defendants assert were committed on the trial of the action.

The judgment, and the order denying the motion of each of the defendants for a new trial, are reversed.

PEOPLE v. BARNES.

Cr. 1609.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.
Feb. 6, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 21, 1931.

1. Witnesses 🔑267.

Warning by trial judge to defendant's counsel that he should curtail cross-examination held not erroneous.

2. Criminal law 🔑1166½(12).

Any error of trial judge in warning counsel to curtail cross-examination was cured by immediately admonishing jury to disregard remarks.

3. Witnesses 🔑267.

Warning of trial judge to defendant's counsel that he should curtail cross-examination was not erroneous limitation.

Defendant's counsel was merely admonished that it was duty of court to expedite business and to prevent cross-examination upon immaterial and irrelevant matters and to prevent repetition of questions already asked, and was then directed to proceed with cross-examination with that warning, while record disclosed that cross-examination was continued thereafter at considerable length.

4. Criminal law 🔑656(9).

Warning of trial court to defendant's counsel to curtail cross-examination on immaterial and irrelevant matters was not erroneous as expressing opinion on weight of testimony.

5. Criminal law 🔑483.

Expert witness was not required to make scientific investigation of documents presented to him in order that he might form and give expert opinion (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1881, 2065).

6. Criminal law 🔑483.

Refusal to compel expert witness to answer inquiry requiring examination of instruments to determine handwriting held not erroneous (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1881, 2065).

7. Criminal law 🔑808½.

Instruction on presumption of innocence and reasonable doubt in language of statute was sufficient (Pen. Code, §§ 1096, 1096a).

8. Criminal law 🔑761(2).

Proposed instruction, in forgery prosecution, respecting defendant himself being victimized, requiring assumption that defendant had testified falsely, held properly refused.

Jury had been instructed that it was not sufficient to find that defendant had attempted to pass a fictitious or forged instrument, but it must find that he either forged instrument or had knowledge of its condition at time it was passed, so that as much of proposed instruction as was material was given, and in so far as it related to defendant himself being victimized, it was based on assumption that defendant had testified falsely in respect thereto and would have been prejudicial to him.

9. Criminal law ⚷829(1).

Refusal of proposed instruction, subject-matter of which was fully covered by other instructions given, held not error.

NOURSE, P. J.

Defendant was tried upon an information charging the crime of forgery. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and from the judgment upon the verdict and from the order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant has appealed upon a typewritten record.

The facts of the case upon which the jury's verdict of guilt was based are that the defendant on February 17, 1930, opened an account with the Bank of America at 631 Market street in San Francisco under the name of Joseph Barnes, and gave as his address the Dale hotel in San Francisco. The proprietor of that hotel identified the defendant as the same man who came to his hotel on February 17 and gave his name as Joseph Barnes and asked that his mail be held for him. On the following day the defendant opened an account with the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank at Oakland under the name of Henry Gail and gave as his address 412 Tenth street, Oakland. The proprietress of a rooming house at that address identified the defendant, Joseph Barnes, as the person who came to her house on that date, gave his name as Henry Gail, and requested her to hold mail coming to that address under the name of Henry Gail.

Immediately following the opening of these two accounts, the defendant deposited cashier's checks in the Bank of America to the credit of Joseph Barnes and in the Oakland bank to the credit of Henry Gail, and on April 22, 1930, a check in the sum of $8,600 bearing the name of George K. Jensen was deposited in the Bank of America to the account of Joseph Barnes and bore his indorsement. Upon the bank's discovery that the name of Jensen was a forgery, the defendant was arrested and executed a large number of exemplars of his handwriting in the presence of the police officers. A handwriting expert called on behalf of the people testified that the indorsement on the $8,600 check, the signature which the defendant made on the register of the rooming house at 412 Tenth street, and other documents introduced in evidence, were in the handwriting of the defendant. The witness Chauncey McGovern was called as a handwriting expert by the defendant and testified that he had made a thorough examination of all these documents and had at first reported that they were all in the handwriting of the defendant, but upon further examination he had come to the conclusion that the indorsement upon the check in suit and some of the other documents offered were not in the defendant's handwriting. Aside from these conflicting opinions of the handwriting experts, the evidence of defendant's guilt is clear and convincing and the point is not made on this appeal and it could not well be made in view of the record that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict.

[1, 2] The first attack upon the judgment is the criticism of the trial court in limiting defendant's cross-examination of the handwriting expert called by the state. The state had put in evidence thirty-five exhibits upon which this witness had given his opinion. The defendant proceeded to cross-examine this witness at great length upon each one of the exhibits and was finally warned by the trial judge that he should curtail his cross-examination. The defendant now objects, first, to the language used by the trial court in giving this admonition, and, second, to what he asserts to have been a denial of his right to continue the cross-examination. The language of the court was merely an expression of the legal rule found in People v. Rader, 136 Cal. 253, 68 P. 707, where it is said that it is the right and duty of the trial court to expedite business by curtailing cross-examination upon immaterial and irrelevant matters. It seems to be mere sophistry to say that a court is in error in stating a well-settled rule of law before the jury, particularly in view of the presumption that the jurors are presumed to know the law, but if any error was made in this respect it was immediately cured by the action of the trial judge in admonishing the jury to disregard his remarks.

[3] The second point is based upon a misconception of the action of the trial judge. Defendant's counsel was merely admonished that it was the duty of the court to expedite business and to prevent cross-examination upon immaterial and irrelevant matters and to prevent repetition of questions already asked. He was then directed to proceed with his cross-examination with that warning. There is nothing in this language which justifies the assumption that the defendant was then directed to cease the cross-examination, and the record discloses that the cross-examination was continued at considerable length thereafter.

[4] Two other points are now raised in this same connection, both of which are based upon misconceptions of the action of the trial court. It is argued that in the court's statement that it was its right and duty to expedite business and to curtail cross-examination upon immaterial and irrelevant matters, it thereby expressed an opinion upon the weight of the testimony brought out in the cross-examination, and it is also argued that in this connection the trial judge was instructing the jury upon matters of fact. As we have heretofore said, the trial judge was merely expressing, in a general way, a fixed rule of law as to his duty and was not in any sense commenting upon or expressing any opinion as to the weight of the testimony before him.

[5] It is argued that the trial court erred in not ordering the witness McGovern to answer an inquiry as a handwriting expert on behalf of the defendant. The defendant insists that this witness did not come within the class of the privileged as specified in section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, and that having been duly subpœnaed and in court, he was bound to answer questions propounded to him, this duty being imposed upon the witness by section 2065, Code of Civil Procedure. With this we agree, but the rule does not apply when the defendant has demanded that the witness perform a duty which the statute has not imposed upon him—that he go to the trouble of making a scientific investigation of the documents which were presented to him in order that he might form and give an expert opinion as to the author of the respective writings. This is a duty which a party cannot impose upon an unwilling witness. The rule in this state is found in People v. Conte, 17 Cal. App. 771, 122 P. 450, 455, 457, where the court held that the doctor having been sworn as a witness could have been required to answer such pertinent questions as might have been put to him notwithstanding that they might call for expert testimony, but that, "We know of no rule of law which would have authorized the court to compel him to go to the trouble and perhaps some expense of scientifically investigating the cause of the marks on the rock for the purpose of qualifying himself to give expert testimony on that subject." Thus, where a doctor has made a medical examination of a party and has formed an opinion as to the physical injuries suffered, he may be required to testify as to the opinion which he has formed, based upon the facts disclosed by such examination (Berge v. Superior Court, 154 Wash. 144, 281 P. 335), and this duty is imposed upon the witness notwithstanding that the party calling him has not compensated him for his examination as an expert or other than by the ordinary witness fees received for attendance upon the court (McClenahan v. Keyes, 188 Cal. 574, 206 P. 454).

[6] In presenting the point on this appeal the appellant assumes that the witness had made the necessary examination of the various writings and had then formed an opinion as to their authorship. The state assumes that the witness had not made such an examination and that the questions propounded to him by appellant's counsel required him to make such an examination before he would be able to give an intelligent answer. To understand the situation it is necessary to review the circumstances leading up to the ruling of the court complained of. Soon after appellant was arrested, he made a number of exemplars in the presence of police officers, and these, with checks, cashier's checks, hotel registers, and other documents were delivered to McGovern for the purpose of examination. All these were photographed and enlargements made from the negatives, and after an examination McGovern reported to the police authorities that they had all been written by the appellant. He was called as a witness for the defense and testified very positively that upon a second examination of these documents he was satisfied that the appellant had not written any of the so-called forgeries, that is to say, none of the checks which were in evidence, but that he did believe that the appellant had written a slip at the Oakland bank receipting for a certified check. The witness was then withdrawn and the appellant placed on the stand a witness who identified a letter purporting to have been written in Los Angeles by one James A. Lewis, without date, regarding a sale of an automobile. The same witness on cross-examination told a peculiar story of her travels with Mr. Lewis, finally leaving him in Chicago. The defendant went on the stand, gave somewhat of a similar story about his travels with Lewis and their registering in hotels in Los Angeles and San Francisco, none of which he could remember, and that he last heard of Lewis a few days before his arrest. McGovern was recalled to the stand and asked to look at the letter offered as Defendant's Exhibit No. 3 for identification, and was then asked if there was any similarity between the handwriting of that letter and that of the man who wrote the forged checks. To this question objection was made and sustained. The question was then reframed and limited to a comparison of Defendant's Exhibits Nos. 4 and 5, these exhibits being photographic enlargements of the $8,600 check and of a check drawn upon the Oakland bank in the name of Henry Gail. The witness testified that he had seen and compared both. He was then asked if, after comparing these exhibits, he found any similarity to the handwriting on the letter with Defendant's Exhibits Nos. 4 and 5. He refused to express an opinion, claiming ethical grounds, and the record then contains a running discussion in which the attorneys for both sides and the witness took part and during which counsel for appellant asked the witness whether he had "formed an opinion" to which the witness answered that he had. If this inquiry, which as we have said was a part of a running discussion in open court, had been framed with the particularity that such question should have been framed, we would conclude that the witness came within the rule of the cases above cited, and should have been required to answer the question. However, it does not appear that the question to which this answer was given related to all the exhibits and the letter or whether it related merely to Defendant's Exhibits Nos. 4 and 5. It appears that the witness had not seen the letter prior to his appearance on the stand and that he had not, therefore, given it any examination, or at least the examination which he had given to all the thirty-seven exhibits which were under discussion. Naturally, if he were an expert in handwriting and found it necessary to make two minute examinations of these other exhibits from photographic enlargements in order to determine their similarity he had not qualified himself to give an expert opinion as to the letter, and the trial court was, therefore, not in error in refusing to compel him to express his opinion on that subject. The unsatisfactory condition of the record is illustrated by the motion made by defendant to correct the record, a motion which was made and denied at the time of the motion for a new trial. At that time appellant asked to correct the record so that it might show that the question propounded to witness McGovern was for the purpose of proving by that witness that the exemplar, Defendant's Exhibit No. 3 for identification, was written by the same person and is in the same handwriting as the alleged forged instrument and the other people's exhibits, except No. 3. The motion was denied, and we are bound, therefore, by the record which fails to disclose whether the witness had made an examination of the letter and had formed an opinion as to the similarity of the handwriting of the letter to that of Defendant's Exhibits Nos. 4 and 5.

We are, however, forced to the conclusion that if the court erred in refusing to compel the witness to answer, it was not prejudicial error because the answer most favorable to the appellant would have been that these two exhibits and the letter were all written by the mysterious Mr. Lewis. However, the witness, having previously testified that those two exhibits had not been written by the defendant, it could have served the defendant no purpose to have this witness testify that in his opinion they were written by Lewis, particularly when all the testimony relating to this man tended unmistakably to show that he was a mere creature of the imagination. On the other hand, if the answer of this witness had been that in his opinion the two exhibits had not been written by Lewis, it would not have aided the defendant's case in any respect.

To restate the matter the prosecution had offered testimony tending to prove that the forged check and the other thirty-four people's exhibits had been written by the defendant. The witness McGovern had testified that the check and some of these exhibits (those corresponding to Defendant's Exhibits Nos. 4 and 5) had not been written by the defendant. There was, therefore, a conflict between these two witnesses on that point. It would not have aided the defendant in any respect if the witness McGovern had expressed the opinion that these Exhibits Nos. 4 and 5 had been written by Lewis or by John Doe. Such testimony would merely have been cumulative of that which he had already given. In presenting the point the appellant merely argues that the trial court was in error in refusing to compel the witness to testify. He has not pointed out how the assigned error could have prejudiced his case in any manner.

[7] The appellant complains of the refusal to give his proposed instruction on the presumption of innocence and reasonable doubt. The jury was instructed in the language of section 1096, Penal Code, and this was sufficient. Section 1096a, Pen. Code.

[8, 9] He also complains of the refusal to give a proposed instruction reading: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant himself was victimized and believed the instrument to be genuine, etc." The jury had been instructed that it was not sufficient to find that the defendant had attempted to pass a fictitious or forged instrument but it must find that he either forged the instrument or had knowledge of its condition at the time it was passed. Thus, so much of the proposed instruction as was material was given. In so far as the proposed instruction related to the defendant himself being victimized and believing the instrument to be genuine there is no evidence upon which this could be based, the defendant himself having testified that he had never seen the forged instrument. Thus his proposed instruction was based upon the assumption that he himself had testified falsely and would have been prejudicial to him. As to the three other proposed instructions, refusal to give which is assigned as error, in so far as they related to matters material to the issues the subject-matter was fully covered by other instructions given.

[10] Finally, it is argued that the court erred in permitting the introduction of evidence as to a transaction not charged in the information. The assignment is based upon the evidence of the Oakland transaction in which the operations of the defendant were conducted in the name of Henry Gail. This evidence was all admissible under the rule which permits the introduction of evidence of other crimes when such evidence tends to show that the crime for which a defendant is being tried is part of a general plan or system of criminal acts pursued by the defendant. Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

This cause is before us upon an appeal from an order settling plaintiff's cost bill and refusing to strike out certain items. The record shows that, in an action tried in the superior court of the county of Shasta, both the plaintiff and the defendants were awarded their costs, and, at the conclusion of the trial, both the plaintiff and the defendants filed their cost bills in which they set out as an item of costs the expense of one-half of the transcript of the testimony taken in the cause just referred to, which transcript was ordered by the court under the provisions of section 274, Code of Civil Procedure.

The record shows that at the beginning of the trial the court ordered that an original transcript of the testimony be made by the reporter from day to day, and the expense thereof charged to the respective parties in equal proportions, to wit, at 10 cents a folio, being 20 cents a folio for the transcript ordered by the court. The record further shows that at the time of the making of the order just referred to the plaintiff and the defendants also ordered one copy each of the transcript, at a cost of 6½ cents per folio. On the following day the record shows that the plaintiff desired two extra copies of the testimony, which copies the reporter agreed to furnish the plaintiff, as follows: One extra copy for 4 cents per folio and one extra copy for 3 cents per folio.

One-half of the total cost of the original transcript of the testimony ordered by the court amounted to the sum of $675.48. The plaintiff, and also the defendants, in their cost bills, set forth an item of cost in the sum above named, and costs were allowed the respective parties in the sum mentioned, for and on account of the original copy of the transcript of the testimony ordered by the court.

The contention is now made that under the third paragraph of section 274, Code of Civil Procedure, the appellants should have paid only 4 cents per folio as their portion of the costs of the original copy ordered by the court. This contention is based upon the fact that, after the court had ordered the original copy, and the parties hereto had each agreed to take a copy at 6½ cents per folio, the plaintiff ordered two additional copies, and therefore five copies in all were made by the reporter, and only 8 cents per folio should have been charged for the original copy, and that the defendants have overpaid costs for the original copy in the sum of 6 cents per folio which should have been borne by the plaintiffs by reason of the fact that the plaintiffs obtained two extra copies at a reduced rate. The provision of the section relied upon reads as follows: "For transcription for one copy, twenty cents per one hundred words; for two copies made at one time, fifteen cents each per one hundred words; for three copies made at one time, eleven cents each per one hundred words; for four copies made at one time, nine cents each per one hundred words; and for five or more copies made at one time, eight cents each per one hundred words."

In basing their argument upon this section the appellants overlook the fact that only one copy was ordered by the court; that the court ordered an original transcript of the testimony to be made and charged, respectively, one-half to the parties in this action. Whatever agreements or orders were made by the parties to this action, they were independent, separate, and distinct from the order made by the court. It would hardly be contended that, if an outsider entered into an agreement with the reporter to obtain a transcript of the testimony, this would have anything to do with the cost of the original transcript ordered by the court. Had the court ordered five or more copies to be made, then and in that case no greater charge than 8 cents per folio could have been made for any of the copies. Likewise, had any one of the parties involved in this action ordered from the reporter five or more copies, the reporter could not legally have charged more than 8 cents per folio for such copies. The fact that, after agreeing to and furnishing each of the respective parties one copy of the testimony for 6½ cents per folio, the reporter agreed with the plaintiff to furnish extra copies for 4 cents and 3 cents per folio, has no bearing upon the costs of the original transcript ordered by the court, and the defendants are not disadvantaged in the least by reason of the fact that they did not order extra copies. The additional copies ordered by the plaintiff and the cost thereof constituted an independent transaction between the plaintiff and the reporter. It appears that the reporter did not charge all that he might have charged under the section of the Code, but that does not affect the transaction in the least, as there is nothing in the section to prohibit charging less than the law allows.

A reference to the case of Barkly v. Copeland, 86 Cal. 493, 25 P. 3, 4, confirms what we have heretofore stated. In that action the court had ordered an original transcription, chargeable one-half to the respective parties, and, thereafter, one of the parties obtained additional copies and inserted the expense thereof in the cost bill. The court in dealing with this question used the following language: "By the order of the court, this half of the fees thus paid by the defendant in the first instance became a necessary part of the costs and disbursements incurred by him in defense of the action. He was therefore entitled to recover it from his adversary against whom he obtained judgment. As to the second item, * * * paid by the defendant for the second transcription, he could not recover that, or any part of it, from the plaintiff, as neither the latter nor the court had ordered it, but the defendant alone. * * * 'The party ordering the reporter to transcribe any portion of the testimony or proceedings must pay the fees of the reporter therefor.'" The record shows in this case that the respective parties were charged, and had paid the amounts apportioned by the court order for the original transcription. The remaining copies were matters of private agreements. If the costs were excessive, action only would lie against the reporter.

A number of other questions were argued by counsel, such as the question of estoppel, but we do not think such questions necessary to be considered for a determination of this action.

The order of the trial court is affirmed.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered against the plaintiff upon sustaining a demurrer to the amended complaint and denying leave to amend.

The complaint alleges that Mr. and Mrs. A. Delmuto were insured by the defendant insurance company against damages accruing on account of an accident in the operation of their Durant automobile. The insurance policy, which was issued in the name of A. Delmuto, is attached to the complaint as an exhibit. It is further recited that, upon application for this insurance policy, the owners of the machine told the representative of the defendant that "neither of them drove * * * said automobile, but that said automobile would be driven by Leo Delmuto, their son * * * (who) was of the age of fourteen years, and that they desired the policy so written as to cover the driving of said automobile by said fourteen year old minor"; that the usual form of a policy was thereupon issued including the following clause: "This policy shall not cover in respect of any automobile, * * * while driven or manipulated by any person under the age fixed by law, or under sixteen years of age in any event." To this policy there was attached, as a part thereof, an amendment or rider containing the following provision: "The policy to which this endorsement is attached is hereby extended to apply to any person * * * legally responsible for the operation thereof, provided such use or operation is with the permission of the named assured, or if the named assured is (an) individual, with the permission of an adult member of the named assured's household. * * *"

It is then alleged that this plaintiff subsequently recovered a judgment for $3,409 against Mrs. A. Delmuto, as damages resulting from a collision with the Durant machine belonging to Mr. and Mrs. A. Delmuto, while it was being operated by their minor son, Leo; that said judgment is in full force, no part thereof having been satisfied; that A. Delmuto is dead and his said widow is insolvent and unable to pay said judgment. The complaint then prays for judgment against the defendant as a surety. A demurrer to the amended complaint on the ground that it fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action was sustained denying leave to amend. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

The demurrer was erroneously sustained. Under the provisions of the insurance policy it seems clear that the surety company is liable for damages accruing from an accident incurred with the insured automobile while it is operated by "any person * * * with the permission of an adult member of the named assured's household." It is not denied that Mrs. A. Delmuto was the wife of the assured named in the policy, nor that she was an adult member of his household. It is not denied that the minor son Leo was driving the automobile with her permission. These facts are conceded.

The respondent, however, contends that the rider which contains the preceding clause must be construed and reconciled with the clause in the body of the policy which provides: "This policy shall not cover * * * any automobile * * * while driven * * * by any person * * * under sixteen years of age."

[1] It is true that the provisions of a rider which is attached as a part of an insurance policy should be construed and reconciled with all the provisions of the instrument with respect to the same subject-matter so as to carry out the intentions of the contracting parties thereto. Burr v. Western States Life Ins. Co. (Cal. App.) 288 P. 444; 2 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. (2d Ed.) p. 1011; Old Colony Life Ins. Co. v. Hickman, 315 Ill. 304, 146 N. E. 132; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Sacramento Stockton S. S. Co. (C. C. A.) 273 F. 55, 58; 32 C. J. 1159, § 270; 14 R. C. L. 934, § 107.

The respondent argues that the evident purpose of the clause in the policy with respect to the age of the chauffeur was to limit the liability of the insurance company to accidents occurring while the machine was being operated by one who was sixteen years, or more, of age, and that the surety company was not liable when the machine was being operated in violation of law.

[2, 3] At the time of the accident which resulted in the judgment against Mrs. Delmuto, the insured car was not being operated by a chauffeur contrary to law. It is alleged in the complaint in this case that an "operator's license numbered 108835 was issued to one Leo Delmuto by the Motor Vehicle Department of the State of California, * * *" that the "application for said license was signed by A. Delmuto and Mrs. A. Delmuto, father and mother respectively of said Leo Delmuto." The signing of this application by Mrs. Delmuto made her equally responsible with her husband for damages caused by the car while it was driven by their said son. She authorized him to drive the car.

There appears to be no difficulty in reconciling the language of the policy with that of the rider on the subject of liability on account of the age of the chauffeur. It may be reasonably construed to mean that the surety company shall not be liable upon the policy "while [the machine was] driven or manipulated by any person * * * under sixteen years of age" unless such minor was operating the car "with the permission of an adult member of the named assured's household," in which event the company is liable. To construe the language of this instrument otherwise would defeat the apparent intent of the parties and render the quoted language of the rider valueless. We have no doubt the foregoing interpretation of the insurance policy is in accordance with the intention of the parties and that the defendant is not exempt from liability for an accident which occurred while the 14-year old son of Mr. and Mrs. Delmuto was driving the car.

Since the rider was attached to the policy to extend the liability of the company to cover "any person * * * legally responsible for the operation" of the insured car, and Mrs. Delmuto was personally responsible for the damages since she had authorized the issuing of an operator's license to her son and thereby assumed the liability, and a judgment had been regularly procured against her for the amount of such damages, under the terms of the insurance policy the judgment creditor may maintain this action against the policy for the satisfaction of the judgment. The insurance company was originally liable for this damage under the terms of the policy.

The demurrer was therefore erroneously sustained. The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to overrule the demurrer to permit the defendant to answer.

BEARD et al. v. STATE BOARD OF EMBALMERS AND FUNERAL DIRECTORS et al.

Civ. 7828.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 4, 1931.

1. Licenses 🔑5.

Legislature may require applicant for license to practice profession, to be graduate of school of certain standard.

2. Constitutional law 🔑48.

Statute susceptible to two constructions, one consistent with, and other inconsistent with, Constitution, must be construed in harmony with constitution.

3. Licenses 🔑7(1).

Statute requiring applicant for embalmer's license to be graduate of school of certain standard held constitutional (St. 1929, p. 259, § 5).

St. 1929, p. 259, § 5, requiring that the applicant must have completed a full course of instruction in an embalming school of class A as rated by the "Conference of Embalmers," examining boards of the United States, was constitutional, although it could be construed as unconstitutionally requiring completion of a course in an embalming school which had been rated class A by the conference, since such statute was also susceptible of construction which merely required the completion of a course of study in an embalming school of the same type as those rated class A by the conference, and as so construed was constitutional.

4. Licenses 🔑22.
Mandamus 🔑10.

Petitioners, not alleging in their applications that they had completed course of study in embalming school of proper standard, were not entitled to license and could not compel board of examiners to examine petitioners for embalmers' license (St. 1929, p. 259, § 5).

Original proceedings in mandamus on the application of Hawley W. Beard and others to compel the State Board of Embalmers and Funeral Directors, and others, to examine petitioners for license as embalmers.

Writ denied.

Nat Schmulowitz, Geo. B. Harris, and Edward M. Leonard, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

SPENCE, J.

This is an original proceeding in mandamus. Upon the filing of the petition an order was issued requiring respondents to show cause why a peremptory writ should not issue to compel respondents to examine petitioners for licenses as embalmers under chapter 140, Statutes of 1929 (page 258).

The sole question here involved is whether that portion of section 5 of the act relating to the requirement that the applicant "must have completed a full course of instruction in an embalming school of the class A type as rated by the 'Conference of Embalmers' examining boards of the United States" is constitutional.

From the allegations of the petition it appears that petitioners have treated this provision as unconstitutional and have made no effort to comply with its requirements. They allege that they filed their applications upon the forms prescribed by the board showing themselves to be otherwise qualified under the act, but deleted therefrom all reference to the completion of a course in an embalming school of the class A type as rated by the conference. From the further allegations of the petition it appears that petitioners have completed a course in an embalming school, but it is not alleged that said school is of the class A type as rated by the conference nor is it alleged that they showed in their applications to the board that they had completed a course in a school of that type or any embalming school. In our opinion the provision of section 5 above referred to is constitutional and petitioners have failed to show that they are entitled to the relief prayed for.

[1-3] It is well settled that the Legislature in demanding some standard of efficiency of those applying for licenses to practice a profession may in its judgment require applicants to be graduates of a school, the standards of which shall be in no particular less than those prescribed by an association or board of national significance. Ex parte Gerino, 143 Cal. 412, 77 P. 166, 66 L. R. A. 249; Arwine v. Board of Medical Examiners, 151 Cal. 499, 91 P. 319. Petitioners contend, however, that the statute must be construed to require the completion of a course in an embalming school which has been rated class A by the conference, and as so construed the statute is unconstitutional. Respondents contend that it should be construed to require the completion of a course in an embalming school of the same type as those rated class A by the conference and as so construed the statute is constitutional under the rule established by the authorities above referred to. It may be conceded that the statute is open to the construction placed upon it by petitioners, but in our opinion it is equally susceptible to the construction placed upon it by respondents. Being susceptible to two constructions, one consistent with and the other inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution, it is fundamental that it be so construed as to make it harmonious with the Constitution and comport with the legitimate power of the legislature. 5 Cal. Jur. 615, 617.

[4] The statute being constitutional and petitioners having failed to allege in their applications that they had completed a course of study in an embalming school of the class A type as rated by the conference, the order to show cause is discharged, and the petition denied.

HOLAHAN et ux. v. McGREW et al.

Civ. 4241.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Jan. 28, 1931.

1. Pleading 🔑205(5).

Pedestrian's complaint against owner and contractor for injuries inflicted by falling canopy held sufficient, in absence of special demurrer on grounds of uncertainty.

> The complaint of the pedestrian, suing for injuries caused by the dislocating of a cross-timber supporting a temporary canopy erected over sidewalk, charged the negligent construction of the canopy, so as to permit portions thereof to project over the traveled portion of the street, and that a bus came in contact with and struck the canopy, causing heavy timbers to fall on the pedestrian.

2. Appeal and error 🔑231(2).

Right to complain on appeal for uncertainty of complaint held waived, where demurrer did not charge specific uncertainty.

3. Pleading 🔑403(4).

If pedestrian's complaint was uncertain in not pleading exact part of canopy which was struck by bus, defect held cured by answer.

> The pedestrian brought suit for injuries caused by dislocating of cross timbers supporting temporary canopy, and the defendants by answer denied that they negligently or carelessly constructed or maintained the canopy, or that portions thereof unnecessarily or otherwise projected out over and obstructed the paved portions of the street so that pedestrian was injured.

4. Appeal and error 🔑193(6), 882(3).

When uncertainty in complaint is not raised by demurrer, but issue is tendered by answer and case tried on that theory, judgment will not be reversed.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1170(3).

Technical defects in complaint, which do not result in miscarriage of justice, are cured by Constitution (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

6. Municipal corporations 🔑819(1).

In pedestrian's action against owner and contractor for injuries inflicted by falling canopy when struck by bus, evidence held to support judgment for pedestrian.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑818(3).

In pedestrian's action for injuries caused by falling canopy, evidence that cross timbers similar to ones struck by bus protruded beyond curbing held competent.

> Evidence of the presence of other similar protruding timbers in the immediate vicinity of the timbers struck by the bus was competent to show that a reasonably prudent driver should have observed the cross timbers and anticipated the danger of coming in contact with one at the very point he proposed to stop the bus to receive passengers.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1).

Error, if any, in admitting evidence, held harmless, where other witnesses testified to same facts without objection.

9. Appeal and error 🔑216(1).

If evidence that cross timbers of canopy, similar to timbers struck by bus and causing injury to pedestrian, protruded beyond curbing, was competent only against bus company, owner and contractor not requesting limitation of application of evidence could not complain.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1).

In pedestrian's action for injuries inflicted by falling canopy struck by bus, instruction on public nuisance held not to constitute reversible error.

> The court instructed the jury in effect that any structure which projected over public street so as to interfere with travel constituted a public nuisance, and that the maintenance of such an illegal obstruction would constitute negligence per se, but that negligence, whether it was violation of law or whether it was any other kind of negligence, was of no consequence unless it was proximate cause of injury.

11. Municipal corporations 🔑822(1).

In pedestrian's action for injuries inflicted by falling canopy struck by bus, instruction interpreting ordinance respecting construction of canopy held not erroneous.

> The ordinance was construed as favorably to the defendants as they were entitled to have it interpreted, and the jury was clearly charged that, even though they found that the ordinance had been violated and that such violation constituted negligence per se, they must further find that failure to conform to the ordinance was the proximate cause of the accident before they were entitled to find for plaintiffs.

12. Trial ⚷260(1).

Rejecting requested instruction fully covered by other instructions held not error.

13. Appeal and error ⚷882(12).

Defendants could not complain that court accepted defendant's construction of ordinance involved and charged jury accordingly.

14. Municipal corporations ⚷800(1).

Violation of canopy ordinance, although negligence per se, would not be actionable unless it also constituted proximate cause of injury to pedestrian.

15. Municipal corporations ⚷821(19).

In action by pedestrian against owner and contractor for injuries inflicted by falling canopy struck by bus, whether alleged violation of canopy ordinance was proximate cause of accident held for jury.

16. Appeal and error ⚷932(1).

Appellate court assumed that jury allowed maximum sum authorized by instruction as damages for future medical care; verdict being general.

17. Damages ⚷185(1).

Evidence held not to authorize award of damages for future medical care to injured plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

Action by John Holahan and wife against Charles T. McGrew and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Modified, and, as so modified, affirmed.

See, also, 295 P. 1059.

Culver & Nourse, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank H. Jaques and Fred E. Helwig, both of Long Beach, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal on the part of the individual members of C. T. McGrew & Sons, a copartnership, together with the partnership and the Commonwealth Building & Loan Association of Long Beach, from a joint and several judgment for damages for personal injuries sustained by Mrs. Holahan. Her injuries were caused by the dislodging of a cross timber supporting a temporary canopy which was erected over a sidewalk for the protection of pedestrians pending the construction of a building at Long Beach.

The Commonwealth Building & Loan Association owns lots 2 and 4 of block 104 of the city of Long Beach, fronting 50 feet on Pine avenue. The defendant C. T. McGrew & Sons, a copartnership, was engaged in constructing a building on these lots. Pursuant to the provisions of a city ordinance which was in force, a canopy was built for the protection of pedestrians over the sidewalk in front of the building which was being erected on Pine avenue. This canopy was constructed by placing upright timbers about eight feet in height along the borders of a fifteen-foot sidewalk. The outer timbers were flush with the curbing at the edge of the street. Cross timbers were insecurely fastened with eight-penny nails at the top of these upright posts to support the roof of the canopy. These cross timbers were permitted to protrude beyond the curbing over the paved street a distance of about eight inches. A portion of the space adjacent to the street beneath this canopy was reserved for the use of pedestrians. The defendant West Side Transit Company, a corporation, owned and operated a line of auto busses for transporting passengers to various parts of the city of Los Angeles. These busses were accustomed to stop every half hour of the day to receive and discharge passengers at the very point on Pine avenue where this canopy had been constructed. About 3 o'clock in the afternoon of January 7, 1927, the respondent, Frances Holahan, with other passengers, stood beneath this canopy waiting for the bus. Driving close to the curbing at this point, for the purpose of receiving passengers, the top of the autobus struck the protruding end of this timber, knocking it from the upright posts, and dislodging other timbers. A plank two by twelve inches in size struck Frances Holahan, fracturing her shoulder and causing other bruises and contusions, from which she suffered great pain. She incurred considerable expense for hospital and medical treatment on account of these injuries. An action for damages was instituted against the owner of the property, the contractor, and the company which operated the autobus line, as joint tortfeasors. The cause was tried with a jury. A verdict was rendered against the defendants for the sum of $4,724. A joint and several judgment was thereupon entered against each of the defendants, from which this appeal has been perfected.

These appellants contend that the complaint fails to state a cause of action against either of them, that the evidence fails to support the judgment, and that the court erred in instructing the jury with respect to the law of the case.

[1, 2] The appellants contend that the complaint fails to state facts charging them with negligence in the construction of the canopy which proximately caused the accident. There is no merit in this contention. The complaint appears to be sufficiently specific. It first recites that, "said defendants * * * negligently and carelessly constructed said canopy so that portions thereof unnecessarily projected out over and obstructed the paved portion of said Pine avenue traveled by vehicles. * * *" The following paragraph then alleges: "The defendants * * * so carelessly and negligently constructed said canopy that vehicles traveling upon the paved portion of said Pine avenue came in contact with and struck said canopy, causing said canopy to be in a * * * weakened condition." In the next paragraph it is asserted that, while the canopy was in this weakened and defective condition, the defendant West Side Transit Company, by its agent, negligently operated one of its busses so that it "came in contact with and struck said canopy, causing said canopy to collapse and said heavy timbers to fall with great force upon plaintiff. * * *"

It is true that the real defect which caused the accident was the cross timber which extended beyond the curbing. These protruding timbers were a part of the frame which supported the canopy. The top of the bus came in contact with one of these protruding timbers, knocking it from its support and dislodging from the canopy other planks, one of which struck and injured Mrs. Holahan. There is evidence that this cross-timber which was struck and dislodged by the bus was merely nailed to the upright posts with two eight-penny nails. There is no evidence that other machines had previously struck this canopy and thus weakened it. The real negligence which appears to have caused the accident, and upon which the plaintiffs rely in support of the judgment, is the insecure manner in which the cross timber was nailed to the upright posts, and the fact this timber was permitted to extend beyond the curbing. This was the very point where the busses were accustomed to stop for passengers. The contractor should have anticipated the danger of protruding timbers.

It will be observed the first paragraph above quoted specifically charges the negligent construction of the canopy so as to permit "portions thereof" to project out over the traveled part of the street. The second paragraph above quoted, which refers to the weakened condition of the canopy caused by machines striking it, may be disregarded as surplusage. It is harmless. The third paragraph specifically charges that the bus of the defendant West Side Transit Company "came in contact with and struck the canopy causing * * * heavy timbers to fall with great force upon plaintiff." The protruding timber was a part of the canopy. The complaint might have been more specific in stating just what part of the canopy the bus struck to cause the falling of the timbers. The allegations of the complaint were, however, sufficiently specific in the absence of a special demurrer on the ground of uncertainty. A demurrer was filed in which it was averred that the complaint was "ambiguous and uncertain." But no specific uncertainty was charged. The appellants therefore waived the right to complain for the first time on appeal that the complaint fails to specifically state the exact part of the canopy which was struck by the bus.

[3] If the allegations of the complaint are uncertain in this regard, that precise issue was tendered, and the defect was cured by the allegations of the answer. An amendment to the answer was filed by leave of court. It avers: "These answering defendants deny that they negligently or carelessly constructed or maintained the canopy * * * or that portions thereof unnecessarily or otherwise projected out, over and obstructed the paved portion of the said Pine avenue, * * * (so) that plaintiffs were injured or damaged." Moreover the case was tried on the theory that the dislodging of the protruding timber was the proximate cause of the accident.

[4] Even though the allegations of a complaint may be defective regarding the facts constituting the proximate cause of accident, when the uncertainty is not raised by demurrer, but, on the contrary, the issue is clearly tendered by the averments of the answer, and the case is tried upon that theory, the judgment will not be reversed on appeal for such defect, for the reason that the defendants are not prejudiced thereby. Oles v. Kahn Bros., 81 Cal. App. 76, 253 P. 158; Martin v. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co., 203 Cal. 291, 298, 264 P. 246; 21 Cal. Jur. 280, § 195.

[5] Since there is no miscarriage of justice in the present case, the provisions of article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution, will also cure the technical defect of which the appellants complain.

[6] It is claimed the evidence fails to support the judgment. It must be conceded there is no substantial evidence indicating that a general defective or weakened condition of the canopy caused the accident. There is, however, ample evidence to sustain the implied finding of the jury that the cross stringers were attached to the upright posts so as to permit them to protrude beyond the curbing over the paved portion of the street a distance of about eight inches, and that the dislodging of one of these timbers by contact with the bus caused the injuries which were sustained by Mrs. Holahan.

Mr. Virgil Abbott, who drove the bus of the defendant West Side Transit Company at the time of the accident, testified:

"I struck a timber on the canopy there and knocked it down.

"Q. Where did that (timber) come in contact with the bus? A. Right at the top of the door. * * * About two inches," from the top of the door. "It (the timber) was a 2x4 nailed onto a 4x4 upright * * * posts. * * * They (the posts) were around close to the curb line. * * * It (the cross-timber) was fastened to the 4x4 post with two eight-penny nails. * * *

"Q. What distance would you say that 2x4 projected? * * * A. Seven or eight inches, I guess. * * *

"Q. Did you see any boards fall upon Mrs. Holahan, a timber? A. I didn't exactly see them fall, on her, no, but I know they came down. * * * She wasn't knocked down. * * *

"Q. When you approached this stop on that occasion, do you recall whether or not the cross-piece you have described was at the point where you usually stop for passengers? A. Right at that place, yes. * * *

"Q. Did you see any evidence there of that timber having come in contact with the door? A. Yes. * * * I seen a little piece of wood sticking up there where it hit the door and a little paint scraped off."

Margaret Maes, who was a stranger to Mrs. Holahan, testified that she observed the accident. She said:

"I saw the bus driving up there. * * * Just as he drove past I heard a noise like a grinding or a scraping. I looked up and saw a timber sticking out and the friction of the bus moved that timber. * * * I saw what appeared—really looked like two boards. I think it must have been two boards falling down. * * * I saw the bus striking that timber, and moving that timber caused the sliding of some boards. * * * I saw the * * * timber sticking out as it struck the bus.

"Q. How far did that stick out from the post? A. * * * About seven inches at least. * * *

"Q. How high was it from the walk? * * * A. Oh, perhaps eight feet. The carpenter sawed it off afterwards."

Mr. Rickard, a patrolman in the police department of the city, testified:

"I think there were several planks sticking out in the street. * * * One in particular I noticed was (protruding) about two feet. * * *

"Q. How high was that from the pavement? * * * A. About even with the top of the ordinary bus. * * *

"Q. How far were they projecting out in the street? * * * A. About eight inches, such a matter. * * * One (of these cross-timbers) was knocked down."

Pearl Poe, a carpenter who was working on the canopy at the time of the accident, testified: "I was working on the north end of canopy, on the top of same, when the bus struck the canopy, the top of bus leaning in struck upright post and cross-piece, knocking cross-piece out at one end. * * * I saw the scaffold board one end (of which) was on cross-piece that (the) bus struck, slide down the same and strike an old lady on the head." The foregoing evidence adequately supports the judgment in spite of the conflict which exists regarding some of these facts.

[7] The appellants contend that the court erred in admitting, over their objection, evidence of the fact that other similar cross timbers of this canopy also protruded beyond the curbing. The objection that this evidence is immaterial was raised only on one occasion, when the witness Abbott, who drove the bus, was asked generally if he did not observe "the condition of the canopy, such as any timbers projecting out into the street." Several other witnesses testified without objection that other cross timbers extended beyond the curbing. Mrs. Maes and Mr. Rickard so testified. These witnesses were thoroughly cross-examined by the defendants on this subject. There was no effort on the part of the appellants to preserve this objection in its application to other witnesses, nor to confine it to any particular defendant. We are of the opinion this evidence of other similar protruding cross timbers in the same canopy was competent and material, at least so far as it applies to the alleged negligence of the agent of the West Side Transit Company. The entire canopy was one structure. The roof was supported by upright posts set along the curbing a few feet apart. At the tops of these upright posts these protruding cross timbers were nailed. The question as to whether the particular cross timber, with which the bus came in contact, extended beyond the curbing, was the vital issue of the case. Abbott, the driver of the bus, denied that he saw the protruding end of this timber with which he came in contact before his machine struck it. If other similar protruding timbers of the same structure were plainly visible to the driver of an approaching vehicle, there is greater reason to assume that a cautious driver should have seen that particular timber. The more numerous these protruding timbers, the greater likelihood there would be that the driver of an approaching vehicle should have seen and avoided the danger. The evidence of the presence of other similar protruding timbers in the immediate vicinity was competent to show that a reasonably prudent driver should have observed them and anticipated the danger of coming in contact with one at the very point where he proposed to stop his machine.

[8] Moreover, having permitted other witnesses to testify to the same facts without objection, the evidence became harmless. 2

Cal. Jur. 1020, § 607; Bower-Venus Grain Co. v. Smith, 84 Okl. 105, 204 P. 265; 3 C. J. 815, § 730. In the authority last cited, it is said: "Appellant cannot complain of the admission of evidence over his objection, where evidence of the same tenor was admitted without objection."

[9] Assuming, without so determining, that the challenged evidence regarding the protruding of cross timbers other than the particular one which caused the accident was competent only against the defendant West Side Transit Company, the other defendants may not complain, for the reason there was no request to thus limit the application of the testimony. Evidence may be incompetent as to one of several joint tort-feasors and competent as to others. If such evidence is competent as to any one of several defendants to the same action, it is admissible, and a general objection to its competency is not available on appeal to any party to the action in the absence of timely application to limit it to the party against whom it is competent. 3 C. J. 823, § 733; Wigmore on Evidence (2d Ed.) p. 159, § 13; Delger v. Jacobs, 19 Cal. App. 197, 125 P. 258; Outlook F. E. Co. v. Am. Surety Co., 70 Mont. 8, 223 P. 905, 911.

[10] We find no reversible error in the giving of certain instructions with relation to a public nuisance. The jury was charged in effect that any structure which projected over a public street so as to interfere with travel constituted a public nuisance, and that, in the absence of legal authority, no one had a right to construct or maintain such an obstruction. The jury was further instructed that the maintenance of such an illegal obstruction to a public street would constitute negligence per se, but that "negligence, whether it is a violation of a law, or whether it is any other kind of negligence is of no consequence unless you find such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury." These instructions appear to correctly state the law. Possibly they serve no useful purpose in this case, since the plaintiffs were not relying upon proof of a public nuisance to establish negligence per se, but were relying upon proof of the maintenance of cross timbers of the canopy which overhung the street so as to come in contact with the bus. If the maintenance of this protruding cross timber became the proximate cause of the accident, and Mrs. Holahan was free from contributory negligence, she was entitled to recover damages which resulted from that unwarranted situation, whether that portion of the canopy which overhung the street constituted a public nuisance or not. There was evidence that these cross timbers did overhang the street a distance of at least eight inches, and that one of them was struck and dislodged by the bus. The jury was fully and fairly instructed regarding the doctrine of contributory negligence and every other issue in the case. These instructions were harmless. They were certainly not prejudicial and do not constitute reversible error.

[11, 12] It is also claimed prejudicial error resulted from an instruction which was given to the jury interpreting the provisions of a city ordinance with respect to the construction of the canopy over the sidewalk in its relation to a lamp post which was situated in the outer portion of the walk near the curbing. This contention is without merit. The ordinance was construed by the court as favorable to the defendants as they were entitled to have it interpreted. The jury was also clearly charged that, even though they found that the ordinance had been violated and that such violation constituted negligence per se, they must further find that the failure to conform to the ordinance was the proximate cause of the accident before they were warranted in finding a verdict for the plaintiffs. This was a correct statement of the law. The giving of this instruction was therefore not erroneous. The ordinance contained this clause: "Canopies * * * shall be placed and maintained in the outer portion of the space between the property line and the curb and inside of any public utility poles, lamp posts or trees adjacent to the building site." After quoting the preceding clause the court said: "By this latter provision * * * it is meant that that portion of such canopy which would be next to any pole, lamp post or tree standing in such sidewalk adjacent to such building site must be placed inside such pole, lamp post or tree, and on the outer portion of the space between the property line and such pole, lamp post or tree, and that all other portions of such canopy must be placed on the outer space between the property line and the curb. * * *" This construction of the ordinance clearly means that in the immediate vicinity of a point where a power pole, lamp post, or tree intervenes between the property line and the curbing, the canopy must not extend toward the curbing beyond such object, but must be confined to the space between the property line and the pole or lamp post, and that the remaining portion of the walk not so obstructed by a pole or post must be covered with a canopy extending from the property line to the curbing. The uncontradicted evidence shows this is the very manner in which the canopy was constructed. At the only point where a lamp post stood the canopy was cut out from the curbing so that it did not extend beyond the post. This is the construction of the ordinance contended for by the appellants in another instruction which was offered by them and rejected. There was no error in rejecting this last-mentioned instruction, for the reason it is fully covered by the preceding charge.

[13] For the same reason there was no error in refusing to permit the defendants to offer evidence that this was the construction placed upon the ordinance by the agents of the city. The court accepted the defendants' construction of the ordinance and charged the jury accordingly. Whether this construction of the ordinance is correct or not, the appellants may not complain.

[14] While it is true that a violation of this canopy ordinance would constitute negligence per se (Martin v. Shea, 182 Cal. 130, 187 P. 23; 45 C. J. 723, § 105), the violation of the ordinance would not be actionable unless it also constituted the proximate cause of the accident (Henderson v. Northam, 176 Cal. 493, 168 P. 1044; Michael v. Key System Transit Co., 98 Cal. App. 189, 276 P. 591; 45 C. J. 902, § 479). In the text of Corpus Juris last cited it is said: "The rule that no liability attaches unless the negligent act or omission was the proximate cause of injury is applicable where the act or omission complained of constituted a violation of some statute or ordinance, even though such violation is held to be negligence per se."

[15] It was the province of the jury to determine whether there was a violation of the canopy ordinance, and, if so, whether such violation was the proximate cause of the accident. Baillargeon v. Myers, 180 Cal. 504, 182 P. 37; 19 Cal. Jur. 734, § 140.

In the present case there was no contention on the part of the plaintiffs that the appellants were guilty of negligence on account of the mere violation of the ordinance in extending the canopy to the curb line without regard to the intervening lamp post, or in cutting out the canopy at the point where the lamp post stood. The appellants were therefore not prejudiced by the giving or refusing of instruction on this subject.

[16, 17] Finally, objection is made to an instruction which was given to the jury regarding the elements of damages which might be considered by them in the event they found that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. Among other elements of compensation, the jury was charged that "in estimating the amount of such damages you may consider * * * such cost of sanitarium treatment and care which it is reasonably certain that they (the plaintiffs) may sustain hereafter, if any, not exceeding $1,000.00." While it is true there is some evidence to support the plaintiffs' claim that Mrs. Holahan was permanently injured as a result of the accident and that "her nervous system has been practically wrecked," there is no evidence to indicate that future medical treatment or hospital services would aid her condition. Nor is there any evidence of the probable cost of such future care and treatment. Under the foregoing instruction with respect to damages, we must assume the jury may have included in their general verdict of $4,724 the maximum sum of $1,000 to cover the cost of future medical care and treatment. To that extent the judgment is not supported by the evidence. There is no means by which this court is able to determine what sum the jury allowed as compensation for future treatment. We must therefore assume they may have allowed the maximum sum of $1,000 which the court instructed them they were authorized to award.

The respondents suggest this court has the discretion to modify the judgment in this respect. The judgment is accordingly modified by striking therefrom said sum of $1,000. As so modified, the judgment for the remaining sum of $3,724 is affirmed. The appellants may recover only one-half of their costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

Action by John Holahan and wife against Charles T. McGrew, the West Side Transit Company, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the last-named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

B. P. Gibbs and Walter W. Little, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank H. Jaques and Fred E. Helwig, both of Long Beach, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a separate appeal on the part of West Side Transit Company from a joint and several judgment for damages for personal injuries sustained by Mrs. Holahan which were caused by the dislodging of a timber used as a part of a canopy which was constructed over a sidewalk for the protection of pedestrians.

The facts of the case are related in greater detail in the opinion this day filed (295 P. 1054), in the same case which determines the appeal from this judgment on the part of the other defendants.

The defendant Commonwealth Building & Loan Association of Long Beach owns two lots at the corner of Pine avenue and Broadway, in the city of Long Beach, upon which it was engaged in constructing a building. The defendant C. T. McGrew & Sons had the contract for this structure. Pursuant to a city ordinance, a canopy had been erected, for the protection of pedestrians, over the sidewalk in front of the building. The canopy did not conform to the specifications required by the ordinance. Several cross timbers extended beyond the curbing, over the street, a distance of from three inches to two feet. At the point where this canopy was maintained during the construction of the building, busses were accustomed to stop to receive and discharge passengers. At 3 o'clock on the afternoon of January 7, 1927, the plaintiff Frances Holahan was waiting beneath this canopy for a bus. This appellant, West Side Transit Company, was engaged in operating a system of autobusses for the purpose of transporting passengers in that vicinity. Virgil Abbott was the driver of one of these busses. At the time mentioned he turned the bus in close to the curbing at this canopy to stop for passengers. This appears to have been his first trip since the completion of the canopy. He claims that he did not observe any of the timbers which extended beyond the curbing over the street. Opposite the very point where he was accustomed to stop, a cross timber, which was nailed to the upright posts about eight feet above the street, protruded beyond the curbing a distance of eight inches. The top of the bus struck this timber, knocking it from the posts to which it was nailed. This dislodged other planks, one of which struck Mrs. Holahan, breaking her shoulder and otherwise injuring her. Suit for damages was brought against all the defendants jointly. The cause was tried with a jury. A joint and several judgment for the sum of $4,724 was rendered against them. From this judgment the West Side Transit Company perfected a separate appeal.

It is asserted by this appellant that the court erred in refusing to grant its motion for a nonsuit, that this appellant is free from negligence, and that the contractors' violation of the ordinance in the construction of the defective canopy amounted to negligence per se, constituting it an insurer against injuries resulting therefrom.

[1-3] The jury found a verdict against the owner of the property, the contractor who constructed the canopy, and this appellant as joint tort-feasors. Assuming that the canopy was constructed in violation of the city ordinance and that both the owner and the builder of the canopy were therefore guilty of negligence per se which proximately caused the accident, this does not necessarily relieve the transit company from liability, provided it was also guilty of negligence which directly contributed to the injuries sustained by Mrs. Holahan.

The rule of law is well established that, even though different parties may not act together with a common purpose which results in injury to another, if their concurring negligence produces the injuries complained of, both may be liable for damages as joint tortfeasors. 19 Cal. Jur. 664, § 90; Buttrick v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 86 Cal. App. 136, 140, 260 P. 588; 45 C. J. 895, § 476. The fact that one of the tort-feasors may be guilty of negligence per se, for violation of a statute or ordinance, does not relieve the other, provided his acts or omissions, concurring with those of the first wrongdoer, proximately cause the injuries complained of. Under such circumstances both would be equally liable. In the present case the negligent construction of the canopy so as to permit timbers to extend beyond the curbing, which resulted in an accident and caused injuries to one who was lawfully at that place and free from contributory negligence, renders the owner of the property and the contractor liable for negligence. At the same time the driver of an autobus who carelessly and negligently operated his machine so as to strike one of these protruding timbers and dislodge other planks which fell upon and injured a pedestrian standing beneath the canopy, would also impute negligence to the owner of the bus which he was driving. When several similar timbers of the canopy, in the immediate vicinity, extended over the street within plain view of the driver of a machine, it would become his duty to exercise care, in driving his machine up to the curbing, to make a reasonable allowance for such protruding timbers. It was the province of the jury to determine whether the driver saw such protruding timbers or whether, in the exercise of ordinary care as a reasonable person, he should have seen and avoided them. Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co., 74 Cal. App. 303, 240 P. 53; 19 Cal. Jur., p. 729, § 138. Approaching a structure of that sort bordering on the street, the exercise of ordinary care would prompt a driver who proposed to stop his machine at that point to look for dangerously protruding timbers. The verdict of the jury infers that they found the driver of the autobus guilty of negligence in that regard. There is ample evidence to support this finding.

The respondents argue that, except for the negligence of the contractor in violating the canopy ordinance and extending the cross-timbers beyond the curbing over the street the accident would not have occurred. It is equally true that, except for the careless act of the driver of the bus in failing to observe these protruding timbers and in running the machine so close to the curbing as to come in contact with this particular protruding timber, the accident would not have occurred.

[4] The appellant asserts that the driver of the bus had a right to assume the contractor would not violate the ordinance and extend timbers beyond the curbing so as to obstruct the street. But this assumption that one will not violate the law does not excuse another for blindly driving into danger without using his eyes to observe the obstruction which is plainly visible. One who relies upon the observance of a statute or ordinance by another may not complain of its violation while he himself is guilty of negligence which concurs directly in the cause of the injuries. Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co., 74 Cal. App. 303, 309, 240 P. 53. In 19 California Jurisprudence, p. 596, it is said: "One who is himself not negligent is entitled to rely upon the presumption that others will exercise due care, so that it is not negligence to fail to anticipate danger which can come only from a violation of law or duty upon the part of another. * * * But reliance upon this presumption does not excuse one who is himself negligent."

The evidence in this case is ample to support the implied finding that this appellant was guilty of concurrent negligence which proximately caused the injuries sustained by Mrs. Holahan. The motion for a nonsuit was therefore properly denied.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by Nell Leone Wallace against Oliver G. Wallace. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Charles Bagg, of San Bernardino, and Philip Cohen, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, and John B. Surr, of Berkeley, for respondent.

JENNINGS, J.

The defendant, Oliver G. Wallace, has appealed from a judgment rendered against him in the amount of $3,184 and costs. The language of the decree from which defendant appeals is as follows: "It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that plaintiff, Nell Leone Wallace, have and recover from the defendant Oliver G. Wallace the sum of $3184.00 and that said defendant pay said plaintiff said sum of $3184.00 for her support and maintenance pursuant to the provisions of the property settlement agreement between them, dated January 26th, 1924, as approved, confirmed and made a part of that certain Interlocutory Decree dated September 15th, 1924, rendered in the Superior Court of the State of Washington for King County, in the action then pending between plaintiff and defendant, said action being numbered 176218 of the files and records of said court, and because of the salary earned by the said defendant to and including July 27th, 1929."

The record discloses that on January 26, 1924, the parties to this action entered into an agreement at Seattle, King county, Wash., which agreement stated that it was made for the purpose of settling the property rights of the parties thereto. This agreement, after providing for the transfer and conveyance of certain personal property and the payment of certain moneys by the husband to the wife, contains the following provisions with respect to the payment of certain sums for the maintenance of the wife: "That in addition to the sums hereinbefore set forth, the party of the second part does hereby agree that he will pay to party of the first part for her support and maintenance until such time as she shall remarry, the following sums, to wit: (a) The sum of One Hundred Seven Dollars and Fifty Cents ($107.50) a week when and while the salary of the second party is Four Hundred Dollars ($400.00) a week; (b) One fourth of the weekly salary earned by the party of the second part when and while his weekly salary is less than Four Hundred Dollars ($400.00) a week." The record also discloses that on August 12, 1924, the plaintiff, Nellie L. Wallace, filed an action for divorce against the defendant, O. G. Wallace, on the ground of cruelty, praying for a dissolution of the marriage and for an order that the defendant, O. G. Wallace, pay to her the sum of $100 for payment to her attorneys for the prosecution of the action and for her costs and for such other and further relief as should seem just to the court in the premises. To this complaint, on August 15, 1924, the defendant filed an answer. The action came on for hearing in the superior court of the state of Washington for King county on September 15, 1924. The findings of the court recite that the plaintiff appeared in person and by her attorney and that the defendant appeared by his attorney and that the state of Washington was represented by the prosecuting attorney of King county. The findings also contain a recital that the plaintiff and defendant in the action had theretofore entered into an agreement as to property rights and alimony which had been submitted to the court. In its conclusions of law based upon the findings of fact the court provided that the contract and agreement regarding property rights and alimony theretofore entered into between the parties be embodied in the decree to be entered in the action. The interlocutory decree signed by the judge of the court on September 15, 1924, ordered and decreed "that the agreement heretofore made between the plaintiff and defendant covering the property rights and provisions for alimony and costs of this action, a copy of which is attached hereto and made a part hereof, be and the same hereby is approved and confirmed and made a part of this interlocutory decree, and that the defendant pay the plaintiff costs herein and an attorney's fee of $100.00." Attached to and forming a part of the decree is a copy of the agreement entered into between the parties on January 26, 1924. On March 16, 1925, a final decree of divorce was signed by a judge of the superior court of the state of Washington for King county, in which final decree the entry of the interlocutory order of divorce on September 15, 1924, was recited, and the court, finding that the defendant had been duly and regularly served with summons in the action by personal service in the state of Washington and that the court had jurisdiction over the person of the defendant and the subject-matter of the action, confirmed its previous findings of fact and conclusions of law and its interlocutory order and decreed that the marriage theretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant be finally dissolved and that the plaintiff be granted an absolute divorce from the defendant.

The complaint filed by the plaintiff in the present action is entitled a complaint for money. It contains recitals relative to the intermarriage of the parties, their entering into the agreement for property settlement on January 26, 1924, the institution of the action for divorce in the state of Washington, the appearance in such action of the defendant, the entry of the interlocutory decree of divorce by the Washington court, the fact that there was no modification or reversal of such decree and that there had been no appeal from it, due performance by the plaintiff of all conditions of said property settlement agreement, the rendition of the final decree of divorce on March 16, 1925, in the state of Washington, and the specific provisions contained in said property settlement agreement relating to the payment of money for the maintenance and support of plaintiff. The complaint further alleges that defendant made the payments provided for in the property settlement agreement up to April 7, 1928. Finally there are allegations respecting the total earnings of the defendant subsequent to April 7, 1928, and the amount claimed by plaintiff in accordance with the provisions of the property settlement agreement, and the judgment in the divorce action. To this complaint the defendant interposed a demurrer both general and special, the special demurrer being on the grounds that the complaint is ambiguous, unintelligible and uncertain for the reason that it could not be ascertained therefrom whether the action was based on a contract or was an action upon a judgment. In due time this demurrer was overruled. Thereafter the defendant filed his answer in which he admits the filing of the complaint for divorce in the state of Washington, his appearance in the divorce action in said state and his filing of an answer to the plaintiff's complaint in said suit, the entry of an interlocutory decree for divorce on September 15, 1924, attacks the jurisdiction of the Washington court to render a decree requiring the payment of any sums to the plaintiff as alimony or for her support, admits that the plaintiff has never remarried, admits that by the terms of the property settlement agreement he agreed to make the payments specified for the support and maintenance of the plaintiff, sets out specifically in detail the weekly salary earned by him at specified intervals subsequent to April 7, 1928, denies that the sum claimed by the plaintiff is due her, for the reason that the property settlement agreement executed by the parties was void as being contrary to the public policy of the state of Washington, where it was executed and contrary to the public policy of the state of California, and alleges seven further defenses to the plaintiff's complaint.

[1] Counsel for appellant attacks the judgment of the trial court on a number of different grounds which we will attempt to consider and discuss seriatim. It is first contended that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained on the ground that it is impossible to discover from the complaint whether the present action is one on a judgment rendered in the state of Washington or is an action based upon a contract. This objection is without merit unless it appears that the demurring party was misled by the defects in the pleading. Stein v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 159 Cal. 368, at page 370, 113 P. 663. Inasmuch as the appellant filed his answer which, as he declares, required eight separate defenses because of the uncertainty of the complaint, it is obvious that he was not misled by the alleged defects in the pleading.

[2, 3] Appellant further objects that the action in the state of Washington was for divorce only and for attorney's fees; that no reference to any property settlement agreement is to be found in the complaint for divorce; that in the divorce complaint there is no allegation of need for financial support by the plaintiff; and that therefore that portion of the decree of the Washington court providing for the payment of any sums for plaintiff's maintenance was outside the issues, beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and void. This contention may not be successfully maintained. A judgment granting relief in excess of that demanded in the complaint is not a void judgment nor is it thereby rendered susceptible to collateral attack (Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 88 P. 267, 11 Ann. Cas. 520; Parker v. Parker, 203 Cal. 787, 266 P. 283), although the granting of excess relief is erroneous and may form the basis for direct attack (Bennett v. Bennett, 50 Cal. App. 48, 194 P. 503).

[4, 5] The third ground of objection is that the judgment of the Washington court in the divorce suit, in so far as it provides for the payment of alimony, is too indefinite and uncertain in its terms to form the basis of an action. This objection is not without merit. The trial court unquestionably adopted the theory that the action was one brought upon a foreign judgment. The decree rendered by the superior court in the state of Washington is not a judgment for a definite sum. Such a decree may therefore appear to be vulnerable to the objection here urged, for the general rule is that where the judgment is for money it must be stated with certainty (1 Freeman on Judgments [5th Ed.] par. 84) and the money judgment should specify the amount (14 Cal. Jur. p. 956). But a decree that provides for the payment of alimony periodically in the future is necessarily indefinite to some extent. Nevertheless, where the decree provides for the future payments of fixed installments of alimony and there has been no modification of it prior to the maturity of such installments and its enforcement is not by the law of the state where it is rendered left so completely within the discretion of the courts of that state that they may annul or modify it, such a decree is, as to installments past due and unpaid, within the protection of the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution. Sistare v. Sistare, 218 U. S. 1, 30 S. Ct. 682, 686, 54 L. Ed. 905, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1068, 20 Ann. Cas. 1061. In the Sistare Case, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States uses the following language: "Generally speaking, where a decree is rendered for alimony, and is made payable in future installments, the right to such installments becomes absolute and vested upon becoming due, and is therefore protected by the full faith and credit clause, provided no modification of the decree has been made prior to the maturity of the installments, since, as declared in the Barber Case [21 How. 582, 16 L. Ed. 226], 'alimony decreed to a wife in a divorce of separation from bed and board is as much a debt of record, until the decree has been recalled, as any other judgment for money is.' "

[6, 7] So under the provisions of the decree of the Washington court it would appear that the right to weekly installments, even though the amount of such installments was contingent upon the amount earned weekly by the appellant, became absolute and vested upon becoming due. A decree that merely adopts the language of a property settlement agreement entered into between the parties should not be held invalid for uncertainty, particularly when the agreement is submitted to the court by the parties or their legal representatives for the express purpose of having it incorporated in the decree. D'Arcy v. D'Arcy, 89 Cal. App. 86, 264 P. 497. Under such circumstances, as the court said in the case of D'Arcy v. D'Arcy, supra, the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Shaw, in the case of Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Miller & Lux, 183 Cal. 89, 190 P. 433, 440, should be applied, and the objection that the decree is invalid for uncertainty should not be allowed.

The interlocutory order of the superior court in the state of Washington was not subject to modification by the court. Remington's Compiled Stats. of Washington, § 988; Ruge v. Ruge, 97 Wash. 51, 165 P. 1063, L. R. A. 1917F, 721; State ex rel. Hansen v. Superior Court of Washington in and for Pierce County et al., 131 Wash. 13, 228 P. 702. Furthermore, a final decree of divorce which confirmed the interlocutory order was rendered on March 16, 1925, and no appeal lies from such final judgment. Remington's Compiled Stats. of Washington, § 988—1.

[8] Appellant further complains that the ruling of the trial court holding that the present action is one brought to recover on a foreign judgment produces the result that the decree of the Washington court is permitted to operate on property without its jurisdiction since the divorce decree incorporates and confirms the property settlement agreement by whose provisions appellant agreed to pay respondent for maintenance one-fourth of the weekly salary earned by him when his salary is less than $400 per week and the evidence shows that the only salary affected is salary earned in the state of California. Such an objection is untenable. The clear meaning of the language adverted to is that appellant agreed that he would pay for respondent's maintenance an amount equal to one-fourth of his weekly salary when it should be less than $400 a week. This meaning is manifest since the language of the agreement is "The party of the second part does hereby agree that he will pay * * * the following sums."

[9] It is further urged that the judgment of the Washington court which forms the basis for the present action is void as to that part of it which provides for the payment by appellant of money for respondent's maintenance because the property settlement agreement incorporated in the decree of the Washington court is an attempted assignment of future salary arising from an employment not at the time in existence or in contemplation. This objection is without merit. The property settlement agreement is an executory contract. It does not purport to create an assignment.

[10] Finally it is urged that the trial court erred in holding that the present action was one based upon a foreign judgment and that the action is in reality one based upon the property settlement agreement of the parties which is subject to the attack proposed by appellant that it was an agreement entered into in contemplation of divorce, in aid of divorce, and therefore contra bonos mores. This point must also be decided adversely to appellant's contention. The agreement was merged in the judgment which was rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction. It is supported by the conclusive presumption that every fact necessary to sustain it was properly brought before the court. Julier v. Julier, 62 Ohio St. 90, 56 N. E. 661, 78 Am. St. Rep. 697.

For the reasons hereinabove set forth, the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: BARNARD, P. J.; MARKS, J.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 25, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 26, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⟹1047(3).

In action on contractor's bond, striking out of testimony showing street improvement proceedings were had in accordance with 1911 statute held harmless error (St. 1911, p. 730; St. 1919, p. 487).

> While the ruling was error in that surety on the bond had the right to show under what act the improvement was being done, and though complainant showed that improvement was had in accordance with St. 1911, p. 730, reversal was not required, where there was no question but that the work done and contracted to be done was a public improvement as to which St. 1919, p. 487, applied.

2. Municipal corporations ⟹346.

That statute requiring bond from street work contractors gave materialmen broader remedy than statute requiring bond of public work contractors did not affect validity of bond given under latter statute by street work contractor (St. 1911, p. 738, § 19; St. 1919, p. 487, §§ 1, 2).

> St. 1911, p. 738, § 19, requires street work contractors to file bond in sum not less than one-half of total amount to inure to benefit of persons performing labor on, or furnishing materials to be used in work of improvement, and Public Works Act (St. 1919, p. 487, § 1), specifies that every contractor to whom is awarded contract for improvement of building, road, excavating, or other mechanical work shall file bond in sum not less than one-half total amount payable by terms of contract, conditioned that if contractor fails to pay for materials, or other supplies or for performance of work, surety will pay same, and section 2 provides for filing of claim within time prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1187.

3. Municipal corporations ⟹346.

Bond of street work contractor held to be statutory bond (St. 1919, p. 487).

> The bond began with recital of Act May 10, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487), and in stating condition of obligation, specifically referred to Public Works Act 1919 approved May 10, 1919, and provided that if contractor or subcontractor failed to pay for any materials, provisions, provender, or other supplies, or teams used in, upon, or about performance of work contracted to be done, or for any work or labor done thereon, surety would pay same.

4. Municipal corporations ⟹347(1).

Materials for street improvement were furnished and used in "public work or improvement" so that sureties were liable on bond given under statute respecting public works (St. 1919, p. 487).

Street improvement contractor's surety held estopped to question filing of claims where procedure followed language of bond (St. 1919, p. 487).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dailey S. Stafford, Judge.

Action by B. Nicoll & Company against the National Surety Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals.

Affirmed.

Arthur M. Ellis and Thomas S. Bunn, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. E. Spencer, of Beverly Hills, and Alfred E. Dennis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

The plaintiff had judgment on a surety bond executed by the appellant for and on account of materials furnished the defendant George A. Simpson Company, in the performance of certain work. From this judgment the surety company appeals.

The complaint alleges the furnishing of materials and the failure of the Simpson Company to pay therefor. The questions before the court are whether the action can be maintained, and whether, under the circumstances, the surety company is bound by its obligation.

So far as material for our consideration, the complaint and the undertaking set out therein executed by the surety company are as follows:

"That on or about the 5th day of August, 1926, in the County of Los Angeles, State of California, Geo. A. Simpson Company, as contractor, entered into a contract with T. R. Mini, as street superintendent of the city of Burbank, California, wherein and whereby said Simpson Company agreed to do and perform certain work and labor and furnish certain materials for the said city of Burbank for the improvement of that certain street in said city known and designated as Winona Avenue from the street in said city known as Hollywood way to the westerly limits of the city of Burbank, by grading and paving the same and installing water pipes therein in pursuance of and in accordance with the resolution of intention of the Board of Trustees of the said city of Burbank, numbered 785, adopted on or about April 1, 1926. That on said day the defendant herein did make, execute and deliver unto the said city of Burbank and the said street superintendent thereof, a bond to secure the payment of all materialmen, laborers and mechanics who might thereafter perform work and labor or furnish material to the said Geo. A. Simpson Company on said work, in the penal sum of $15,000.00; that said bond was filed in the office of the city clerk of said city and was approved by the Board of Trustees of said city of Burbank on August 5, 1926; that said bond is in words and figures as follows, to-wit:

"National Surety Company of New York
"Capital and Surplus over $14,000,000
"Contractor's Bond

"Under act covered in Chapter 303, 1919 Statutes May 10, 1919.

"Know all men by these presents: That Whereas Geo. A. Simpson Company, of Burbank, State of California, as contractor and principal, has this day entered into a contract with T. R. Mini, Street Supt. City of Burbank, as per plans and specifications thereof now on file in the office of the said city of Burbank, and to perform all work and furnish all the material in accordance with the specifications therefor, as is more fully set forth in said contract, to which said contract reference is hereby made; and

"Whereas, an act of the legislature of the State of California, entitled 'An act to secure the claims of materialmen, mechanics or laborers employed by contractors upon the said State, municipal or other public works, covered in Chapter 303, 1919 Statutes, approved May 10, 1919,' and its amendments, requires such contractors to file with the body by whom such contract was awarded a good and sufficient bond to secure the claims to which reference is made in this act, now these presents

"Witnesseth, That the said Geo. A. Simpson Company, as contractor and principal, and National Surety Company of New York, as surety, are held and firmly bound unto all materialmen who may furnish material or supplies to the said contractor, for the said work contracted to be done, and all mechanics and laborers who may perform work and labor of any kind or nature, in the sum of Fifteen Thousand and 00/100 ($15,000.00) gold coin of the United States, being not less than one-half of the total amount payable by the terms of this contract, for which payment, well and truly to be made, we bound ourselves, or heirs, executors, administrators, successors and assigns, jointly and severally by these presents.

"Sealed with our seals and dated this 28th day of July, A. D. 1926.

"The condition of the above obligation is such, that if the above bounden contractor in said contract, or his or its sub-contractor, fails to pay for any materials, provisions, provender or other supplies, or teams used in, upon or about the performance of the work contracted to be done, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, the surety on this bond will pay the same, in an amount not exceeding said sum hereinbefore specified, provided that any and all claims shall be filed and proceedings had regarding the same, as provided for by the terms of said act; otherwise, this bond shall be null and void.

The bond was duly acknowledged by the parties thereto. The claim of the plaintiff was filed within the time as prescribed by the act of 1919, but not within the time prescribed by the act of 1911.

[1] Upon this appeal it is contended by the appellant that the bond executed by it is valid under the terms of the act of 1911, and must be construed as a bond given only under that act, and therefore that the plaintiff has no standing in court by reason of not having filed its claim within the time limit therein specified. The language used by the appellant in this particular is as follows: "Considering the bond as a 1911 act bond, as the appellant represents it is, the bond is a valid contract, but the failure of the plaintiff to file his claim with the superintendent of streets within thirty days after the date of the recording of the assessment, was fatal to recovery thereunder."

The appellant sets forth in its answer a portion of the resolution adopted by the board of trustees of the city of Burbank, as follows: "Section 6. That the proceedings for the aforesaid improvement shall be had and taken under and in accordance with the act of the legislature of the State of California, designated and known as the 'Improvement Act of 1911, approved April 7, 1911,' and all acts supplementary thereto, or amendatory thereof." And in support of its answer attempted to introduce testimony showing that the proceedings relative to the improvement on Winona avenue were taken and had in accordance with the provisions of said act. This testimony was all stricken out by the trial court, and the act of the court in so doing is assigned as error. We agree with the appellant that the ruling of the court in this particular was erroneous. The appellant had a right to show under what act the improvement was being done, the amount of the contract, and other particulars which might be taken into consideration in determining whether the bond executed by the surety company could be held enforceable. This view, however, does not necessitate a reversal of the judgment. While it may be conceded that there is sufficient in the complaint to lead to the conclusion that the improvement was had under and in accordance with the provisions of the act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730) and that the bond in this case was not given in literal accordance with the provisions of section 19 of the act of 1911, as it read at the time of the execution of the contract and bond involved herein, there is no question but that the work done and contracted to be done on Winona avenue was a public improvement. Following the admission and argument in support of appellant's theory that the bond must be construed only as a bond given under the act of 1911, appellant contends that the recitals in the bond that it was executed in pursuance of the Public Works Act, approved May 10. 1919, must be disregarded; and also it is further argued that if the bond is construed as given under the act of 1919, then it is not valid for any purpose.

[2-4] While it has been held frequently that mere recitals in a bond or undertaking that it is given in accordance with a certain act will be disregarded if it appears from the undertaking that it was given under a different act, such cases however, are not pertinent here. The bond in question begins with the recital of the Act of May 10, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487), commonly called the "Public Works Act," which recital, if standing alone, might be disregarded, but when we come down to the condition of the obligation, we find specific references to the Public Works Act of 1919, which stamp the obligation as being given under that act. If held to be a bond given under the Public Works Act, is it enforceable?

Two cases are specially relied upon by the appellant in support of its claim that as such a bond, it is invalid. The first is that of Evans v. Shackelford, 64 Cal. App. 750, 222 P. 846, wherein this court considered at some length the questions also involved in the instant action in reaching a conclusion that the bond there involved was one given under the provisions of the Public Works Act. But it was not held in that case that the bond was invalid. The plaintiff was denied relief because he had not filed his claim in accordance with the provisions of the Public Works Act. This case is not an authority in support of appellant's contention that as such a bond, it is unenforceable.

The second case strongly urged upon our attention is that of Hoffman v. Kennedy, 52 Cal. App. 612, 199 P. 341. In that case it was held that the bond was invalid by reason of the fact that it did not cover sufficiently the provisions required to be in such a bond by section 8a of the Drainage Act under which the work was being performed. That case, however, is readily distinguishable from the one at bar. A quotation from the syllabus illustrates this fact: "A bond not running to the county, but to any and all persons performing labor or furnishing materials and not conditioned for the faithful performance of the contract, and a bond in the penal sum of one-fourth of the contract price and conditioned in accordance with the public works act of 1897, as amended in 1915, failed to comply with the requirements of section 8a of the Drainage Act of 1903, and no recovery can be had thereon by subcontractors." Section 19 of the act of 1911 specifies that every contractor, etc., to whom is awarded any contract in street work, before executing the said contract, shall file with the superintendent of streets a good and sufficient bond in a sum not less than one-half of the total amount, etc., executed by the principal and two sureties, and shall be made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons, companies, or corporations who perform labor on, or furnish materials to be used in the work of improvement, etc. The Public Works Act (St. 1919, p. 487, § 1) specifies that every contractor, person, etc., to whom is awarded a contract for improvement etc., of any building, road, excavating, or other mechanical work shall, before entering upon such work, file with the managers, trustees, officers, board of supervisors, etc., a good and sufficient bond in not less than one-half the total amount payable by the terms of the contract, the bond to be executed by the contractor and at least two sureties, etc., conditioned that if the contractor or his subcontractor fails to pay for any materials, provisions, provender, or other supplies, etc., for or about the performance of the work, the surety will pay the same. Section 2 of the act then provides for the filing of a statement or claim, together with a statement that the claim has not been paid, within the time prescribed by section 1187 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The fact that under the provisions of section 19 of the act of 1911, materialmen or laborers are given remedies which are not accorded them under the provisions of the act of 1919, as insisted upon by the appellant, is wholly immaterial so far as the obligation of the surety is concerned. Both the act of 1911 and 1919 provide for the giving of a bond or an undertaking to secure the payment to persons who have furnished materials. The fact that one of the sections is broader than the other, as to the extent of the materialmen or laborers who may have an action upon the bond, does not affect the validity of the bond if the person prosecuting the action has furnished that which is included within the terms of the section of the statute under which the obligation is executed by the surety.

The opinion in the case of Hoffman v. Kennedy, supra, shows that the court was constrained to render the decision which it did by reason of the fact that the bond, while not a common-law bond, did not conform sufficiently with any statute to constitute it a statutory bond, and therefore amounted to only a written instrument upon which no liability existed. The bond under consideration does conform to the Public Works Act of 1919, and may therefore be held to be a statutory bond upon which the sureties are liable, if the materials which were furnished were furnished and used in a public work or improvement. Such is the case here, even though the improvement is upon a street and not upon a building.

[5] The appellant cites the cases of Baum v. Whatcom County, 19 Wash. 626, 54 P. 29; Miles v. Baley, 170 Cal. 151, 149 P. 45; Milliron v. Dittman, 180 Cal. 443, 181 P. 779; Adams v. Williams, 97 Miss. 113, 52 So. 865, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 855, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1129, and a number of others to the effect that erroneous references or recitals, considered as surplusage, found in a bond, would not invalidate the same if it conformed to the act of 1911, and that it would bind the surety to the extent contemplated by the statute, and no further. These cases are all applicable, in support of the undertaking in this case, if based upon the act of 1919. The really vital point in this case is as to whether the claim or statement constituting the basis of the plaintiff's action was filed on time and with the proper officers. If the act of 1919, upon which we think the bond in this case is based, applies, then by its very terms the sureties are bound. In the condition of the obligation given by the appellant we find the following: "* * * Provided, that any and all claims shall be filed, and proceedings had regarding the same, as provided for by the terms of said act." (Reference being to the Public Works Act approved May 10, 1919.)

Having specifically obligated itself in this particular, we think that the appellant is estopped to raise any question as to the filing of claims, if the procedure in relation thereto followed the language of the bond. While not directly in point, the reasoning of the following cases would lead to such conclusion: Tormey v. McIntosh, 43 Cal. App. 411, 184 P. 1012; Lake v. O'Brien, 54 Cal. App. 543, 202 P. 158; Togni v. Taminelli, 11 Cal. App. 14, 103 P. 899; Boyd v. Liefer, 144 Cal. 336, 77 P. 953; 4 Cal. Jur. 367; 4 R. C. L. 67. Other authorities to the same point might be cited, but these illustrate the rule which we are setting forth, to wit, having, in clear and unambiguous language specifically directed when and how the claims should be filed, upon which it would consider itself bound, the appellant is now estopped to disclaim liability when the stated conditions have been strictly complied with.

The judgment is affirmed.

111 Cal. App. 538

WALKER et al. v. VAN VALKENBURGH, Superintendent of Streets.

Civ. 543.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Feb. 3, 1931.

1. Municipal corporations ⚷278(½).

City electing to proceed under state statute in constructing electrolier system could not proceed partly under act and partly under some other plan (St. 1911, p. 730; Fresno City Charter, § 46).

2. Municipal corporations ⚷340.

Failure of contractors installing improvement to follow ordinance, if defect, was informality cured by curative act under which city proceeded (St. 1911, p. 768, § 82, and p. 743, § 21, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1661, § 15).

> Contractors installed electrolier system for city, proceeding under St. 1911, p. 730, page 768, § 82, and page 743, § 21, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1661, § 15, which provided that no assessment, warrant, or proceedings should be held invalid for error, informality, or other defects, where intention of council to do work has been actually published, and that act should be liberally construed, and that no informality or omission of officer of city in any procedure taken under act not affecting jurisdiction of city council to order improvement should avoid proceeding or assessment for cost of work. Ordinance of city of Fresno with which contractors did not comply provided general plan for licensing of electrical inspectors, and provided that no work could be installed nor materials furnished by those not having licenses.

3. Municipal corporations ⚷362(1).

Eight days' delay in completing improvement was mere informality not defeating contractors' right to payment, where contractors asked for extension which city refused (St. 1911, p. 768, § 82, and p. 743, § 21, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1661, § 15).

Mandamus by R. H. Walker and another, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Walker & Martin, against C. C. Van Valkenburgh, Jr., as Superintendent of Streets of Fresno, a municipal corporation.

Writ granted.

Simpson & Simpson, of Los Angeles, and Walter Sorensen, of Fresno, for petitioners.

Claude L. Rowe, of Fresno, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

This is an original petition filed in this court praying for a writ of mandate commanding respondent to make and issue an assessment to cover the sum due for work performed and materials furnished in the completion of a contract under the Improvement Act of 1911, and attach thereto a diagram of such assessment, together with a warrant for the amount due.

The city of Fresno is a municipal corporation organized as such under a freeholders' charter. The respondent, C. C. Van Valkenburgh, Jr., was, at all times material to this proceeding, acting superintendent of streets of the city of Fresno. Petitioners were contractors who performed the work of constructing and installing an electrolier system on certain streets of the city of Fresno.

The case comes before us on an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that all the proceedings taken by the city were in due form and in accordance with the provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911, save, however, two controversial exceptions, and that the contract was fully performed in accordance with the plans and specifications. Respondent maintains that these exceptions justify his refusal to proceed with the assessment.

It is admitted that the peremptory writ of mandate must issue, unless it be found that the provisions of an ordinance of the city of Fresno apply to the proceedings in question here, and unless it be further found that the failure of the contractors to secure the necessary licenses and permits thereunder and to complete the work within the time fixed by the contract be found fatal to the rights of petitioners. This ordinance created the offices of electrical inspector and assistant electrical inspectors, and provided their duties and compensation, and provided also for the issuance of permits for electrical work and for the inspection thereof, for the examination of master and journeyman electricians and the issuance of certificates thereto, and required the filing of master electrician's bonds.

It is admitted that the petitioners did not complete the work within the time required in their contract, and that it was not completed until eight days thereafter; that they applied for an extension of time for the completion of such work, which application was denied by the city commission of Fresno.

It is further admitted that petitioners and their employees were not licensed as electrical, or assistant electrical inspectors, nor master or journeyman electricians, nor did they or any of them pass the examination required by the ordinance of the city of Fresno under which such licenses or permits could be issued. This ordinance provides a general plan for the licensing, by the city, of electrical inspectors, assistant electrical inspectors, master electricians, journeyman electricians, and apprentices. It is provided that no work can be installed nor materials furnished by those not having such licenses. Respondent urges that this ordinance was passed under the general police power given by the Constitution and laws to the city of Fresno for the protection of life and property therein, and that, as this is a legal exercise of the police power given to the city, its provisions should be construed as forming a part of the general procedure established by state law governing local improvement proceedings under the provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730). Petitioners urge that this ordinance applies to the installation of electric wires, equipment and appliances in and about buildings and cannot be construed to apply to the construction of an electrolier street lighting system. While the language of the ordinance and its general purposes would lend considerable weight to this argument, we do not find it necessary to decide this question here.

Section 46 of the charter of the city of Fresno provides as follows:

"The Commission is hereby authorized and empowered to construct, reconstruct, repair, maintain and improve streets and highways, and to open and close streets, and to make, acquire, construct, reconstruct, repair, operate and maintain all other public improvements of whatsoever kind or character in accordance with the laws of the state of California now existing or hereafter enacted when the Commission elects to follow such state laws, the city being specially and generally empowered to avail itself of such state laws, and nothing in this section contained shall be construed as an abridgement or limitation of the general power of the city to avail itself of State laws.

"The Commission shall also have power by ordinance to provide a plan or scheme for the payment of all or any part of the cost of the improvement, construction, reconstruction, repair, operation or maintenance of any public street, highway or place, and of any special lighting or electrolier system, and of the cost of any street opening or closing by the levy and collection of special assessments upon abutting, adjoining, contiguous and other property specially benefited in accordance with the benefits accruing to such property by reason thereof."

[1] Under the terms of this charter provision it is evident that the city of Fresno may follow any of the state improvement acts which may be applicable in installing its local improvements. The city has failed to exercise the power seemingly given to it by the charter, and has passed no ordinance providing a plan or scheme for the payment of the cost of the construction of an electrolier system within the city. It therefore must proceed under the provisions of a state statute. In the installation of the work in question here, it elected to proceed under the Improvement Act of 1911. Having thus elected so to do, the city was bound to follow the provisions of that act, and could not proceed partly under the act and partly under some other plan or scheme of its own. Cole v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 617, 182 P. 436; Gadd v. McGuire, 69 Cal. App. 347, 231 P. 754.

The Improvement Act of 1911 provides a detailed, comprehensive, and complete plan for the construction of and payment for local improvements. It is complete in itself. Among other things it provides for the appointment of inspectors to inspect the work during its progress and to see that it is done in accordance with the contract and the plans and specifications. When such inspectors are appointed under the provisions of this act and perform their duties in accordance with its requirements, the purposes of the act are fulfilled. We are of the opinion that the city of Fresno has no more authority to provide a separate plan for the appointment and licensing of such inspectors and for the examination and licensing of electricians engaged in the work of performing the terms of the contract and installing the electrolier system than it would have to attempt to dispense with some of the necessary requirements of the Improvement Act of 1911. It must either proceed under and in accordance with the provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911 or adopt a plan or scheme of its own, if authorized so to do. It having failed to adopt such a plan or scheme, it cannot, by ordinance or otherwise, change or add to the provisions of the state law under which it is proceeding. City of Long Beach v. Lisenby, 175 Cal. 575, 166 P. 333; People v. City of Long Beach, 155 Cal. 604, 102 P. 664.

[2] Assuming, but not holding, that the requirements of the ordinance were binding upon the contractors, we are of the opinion that, under the curative provisions of sections 21 and 82 of the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 768, § 82, and page 743, § 21, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1661, § 15), their failure to conform to and follow the provisions of the ordinance was an informality which would not defeat their right to their pay under their contract. It will be necessary for us to consider these two sections of the Improvement Act of 1911 in considering the second contention of respondent. The authorities hereafter cited are authority for our conclusion that the failure of the contractors to follow the provisions of the ordinance, if a defect, is an informality cured by these sections.

Respondent contends that petitioners' delay of eight days in the completion of their work, after the time limit specified in their contract, will defeat their right of recovery herein. Under many of the earlier decisions of the Supreme Court construing the provisions of local improvement acts of California, this contention of respondent finds support. However, in many of these local improvement acts the Legislature has softened the rigor of these earlier decisions by the insertion of amendments containing curative provisions under which many of the defects which were formerly held fatal to the proceedings are now regarded as immaterial and unimportant informalities.

The curative provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911 are found in sections 21 (formerly 26) and 82 of the act. They are, in part, as follows:

"Sec. 21. No assessment, warrant, or diagram, and no proceedings prior to the assessment, shall be held invalid by any court for any error, informality, or other defect in the same, where the resolution of intention of the council to do the work, has been actually published as herein provided. * * *"

"Sec. 82. This act shall be liberally construed to the end that its purposes may be effective. No error, irregularity, informality, and no neglect or omission of any officer of the city, in any procedure taken hereunder, which does not directly affect the jurisdiction of the city council to order the improvement, shall avoid or invalidate such proceeding or any assessment for the cost of work done thereunder. The exclusive remedy of any person affected or aggrieved thereby shall be by appeal to the city council as herein provided."

In discussing the effect of section 82 in the case of Rutledge v. City of Eureka, 195 Cal. 404, 234 P. 82, 86, it was said (quoting the section):

"This is a most comprehensive curative provision. It is more than a curative act.

A curative act is retrospective. Here the same statute which prescribed certain requirements provides that failure to comply with such requirements shall not avoid the assessment. It is competent to provide in the law itself that a disregard of the provisions not essential to confer jurisdiction on the council to order the work may in turn be disregarded."

These curative sections were also discussed in the case of City Street Improvement Co. v. Watson, 50 Cal. App. 687, 195 P. 967, 968, in which it was said:

"'In any proceeding designed to subject the property of an individual to the burden of tax or assessment, certain elements are essential to constitute compliance with the mandates of the state or federal Constitutions. It is agreed on all hands that no curative act can deprive a property owner of the right to resist a pretended assessment which, if enforced, would deprive him of his property without due process of law or otherwise infringe his constitutional rights. But short of this, there is no more reason for denying to the statute before us than to that involved in Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 P. 81, the effect of foreclosing any attack based upon the failure to pursue regularly or at all those steps which the Legislature was not bound to make a part of the statutory procedure. As is pointed out in Chase v. Trout, supra, the applicability of curative statutes is not to be determined solely by inquiring whether the steps omitted or defectively performed were "jurisdictional." The term "jurisdictional" has been used in various senses. The power to levy an assessment or impose a liability on private property is derived solely from the statute, and must be exercised in the manner laid down in the statute. In this sense, the jurisdiction of the board extends only to its right to act in the manner prescribed by the Legislature. But with respect to any steps which are not constituionally necessary, the Legislature may, in the very act which requires these "jurisdictional" steps to be taken, declare that unless objection is made at a certain time or in a certain way, a failure to take these steps shall not affect the validity of the proceeding. This is the plain meaning of the holding in Chase v. Trout, supra, and we do not doubt that it is equally applicable here.' Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irr. Dist., 173 Cal. 660, 161 P. 113.

"The foregoing was quoted with approval and applied to the 'curative' clauses of the Improvement Act of 1911, in Watkinson v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 55, 186 P. 753, and the court further said in pointing out the distinction between the so-called jurisdictional requirements called for by the statute and those jurisdictional requirements which are necessary for a compliance with 'due process of law': 'This very question of what defects in street improvement proceedings could be cured under such provisions as those of section 16 and section 66 of the present act was considered at length in Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 P. 81. The argument was there made that no so-called "jurisdictional defect could be thus cured." In response, however, to this argument the decision made a distinction between those so-called jurisdictional requirements which are called for by statute and those jurisdictional requirements which are necessary for a compliance with the constitutional provision that property shall not be taken without due process of law, or with other constitutional provisions, and it was held that, while failure to comply with jurisdictional requirements of the later class could not be cured, a failure to comply with those of the former class might be cured by action of the Legislature, since the Legislature had the right, in the first instance, to omit such requirements entirely. The discussion on this point is thus summed up in Chase v. Trout, supra (146 Cal. 359, 80 P. 84): "The correct proposition is that, as the Legislature has power to devise any scheme for the assessment and levy of taxes for local improvements, provided such scheme includes such notice and opportunity for hearing to the owner of property taxed as will be sufficient to constitute the due process of law required by the Constitution, and otherwise complies with constitutional limitations and restrictions, so the Legislature, by a curative clause in the law establishing the scheme, may provide that the issuance of a bond, or the execution of a deed, in the enforcement of such levy or assessment, shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of the performance of all the required steps in the proceeding, excepting those that are necessary to constitute the due process of law, or to comply with any other constitutional prerequisite. As to all these other statutory steps or acts, the same power which prescribes them is competent to declare that their nonobservance shall not be fatal to the validity of the tax, and that no inquiry may be made concerning them. This is substantially the effect of the statute in question here."' See, also, Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 568, 89 P. 352; Board of Education v. Hyatt, 152 Cal. 515, 93 P. 117; Wilcox v. Engebretsen, 160 Cal. 292, 116 P. 750; Schaffer v. Smith, 169 Cal. 764, 147 P. 976. * * *

"From the overwhelming weight of authority from Chase v. Trout down, we are compelled to conclude that the assessment cannot now be declared to be invalid on account of the delay of two days in obtaining an extension of time in which to complete the work. It will be admitted that, leaving out of view the curative provisions of the act, the authorities are ample and uniform to the effect that the superintendent of streets and the city council have no power to revive or validate a dead contract, and that orders of extension made after the expiration of the time within which such contracts are by their terms to be performed are void. [Citing cases.] However, in none of these cases was the effect of the curative provisions of a statute such as are contained in the Improvement Act of 1911 given any consideration. These curative provisions were considered in the Chase v. Trout Case, and that case has never since been questioned."

To the same effect are the cases of Bou v. Willits, 61 Cal. App. 32, 214 P. 519, and In re East Bay, etc., Water Bonds, 196 Cal. 725, 239 P. 38.

A delay in securing an extension of time in which to complete the work until after the expiration of the time limit for completion specified in the contract was held an informality which was cured by the curative provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911 in the cases of Oakland Paving Co. v. Whittell Realty Co., 185 Cal. 113, 195 P. 1058, and Tibbits Paving Co. v. Firth, 53 Cal. App. 771, 200 P. 976.

[3] If a delay in securing an extension of time within which to complete the contract is a mere informality which is cured by the curative provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911, we are of the opinion that the same rule should apply to the delay in the completion of the work where the contractor has in due time asked for an extension of time, which request had been denied by the governing body of the city.

The prayer of the petitioner is granted, and it is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate be issued and directed to respondent, directing and requiring him to forthwith make and issue an assessment to cover the sum due for the work performed and specified in the contract herein referred to, including all incidental expenses, in conformity with the provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911, and to attach thereto a diagram exhibiting each street or street crossing, lane, alley, place, or court, property, or rights of way on which any work has been done, showing the relative location of each lot to the work done, numbered to correspond with the numbers of the assessments, together with a warrant to be attached thereto, all pursuant to the provisions of said Improvement Act of 1911, and to file said assessment, diagram, and warrant in the office of the city clerk of the city of Fresno, and to do and perform any and all acts necessary and proper under the provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911, to make a valid assessment and diagram and warrant for the payment for the work done and materials furnished and incidental expenses under the terms of the contract and proceedings hereinbefore referred to.

PEOPLE'S FINANCE & THRIFT CO. OF VALLEJO v. SHAW-LEAHY CO. et al.*

Civ. 7495.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing March 7, 1931. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 6, 1931.

1. Bills and notes 🔑155.

Accelerating clauses in trade acceptance, providing that note should mature at option of holder in event acceptor suffered fire loss or failed to meet at maturity any prior trade acceptance, held not to destroy negotiability of instrument.

2. Bills and notes 🔑385.

Transferee of negotiable trade acceptance, with acceleration clauses, had no duty to notify acceptor prior to fixed maturity date that it had instrument.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. T. B. Warne, Judge.

Action by the People's Finance & Thrift Company of Vallejo against the Shaw-Leahy Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, the Shaw-Leahy Company appeals.

Affirmed.

Stanislaus A. Riley, of San Francisco, for appellant.

O'Hara, Hatch & Pope, of Vallejo, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Respondent obtained judgment against the corporate defendants above named in an action to recover on a trade acceptance; and one of the defendants, Shaw-Leahy Company, has appealed; the single question presented for determination being the negotiability of the trade acceptance.

The instrument bears date November 8, 1924, and was made payable on February 12, 1925. It was given by appellant to the defendant Martin S. Barrett Company (hereinafter referred to as defendant) in payment of certain goods sold by the latter to appellant at an agreed price of $475. Under the terms of the sales contract, appellant was given the right to return the goods or any part thereof at any time prior to the maturity date of the trade acceptance; and on December 1, 1924, it exercised its right in this regard and returned the goods, which were accepted by the defendant. Thereupon by mutual consent the sales contract was rescinded and appellant demanded the surrender of the trade acceptance. In response to the demand defendant represented that for business reasons it desired that the instrument remain with the bank until the maturity thereof, promising that it would pay the same at that time; and appellant assented to the proposition. The truth of the matter was that two weeks previously and on November 15, 1924, defendant assigned and transferred said trade acceptance to respondent for a valuable consideration, but appellant did not learn of such assignment until more than a year and a half thereafter. When the trade acceptance fell due, defendant failed to keep its promise to pay the same, and more than two years thereafter respondent brought this action against appellant and defendant to collect the amount thereof. The instrument in question reads as follows: "Trade Acceptance. The obligation of the acceptor of this bill arises out of the purchase of goods from the drawer. Upon the acceptor hereof suspending payment, giving a chattel mortgage, suffering a fire loss, disposing of his business or failing to meet at maturity any prior trade acceptance, this trade acceptance, at the option of the holder, shall immediately become due and payable. No. 728. San Francisco, Calif., date—Nov. 8, 1924. $475.00. On February 12, 1925, pay to the order of Martin S. Barrett Co., 55 New Montgomery St. San Francisco, Calif.—Four Hundred seventy-five and No/100 Dollars. Value received and charge the same to the account of Martin S. Barrett Company, 55 New Montgomery Street, San Francisco. Shaw-Leahy Co. 416 Market Street, San Francisco, Calif. Martin S. Barrett, Drawer, President." And across the face of the instrument was written: "Payable at Anglo-California Trust Co., Market and Sansome streets, S. F. Shaw-Leahy Co., Inc. D. R. Shaw."

[1] The question as to the negotiability of the instrument arises from the provision thereof accelerating its maturity date; and appellant contends as a matter of law that in order to preserve negotiability the events and contingencies specified in the acceleration clauses must be such in their nature that the happening thereof will be brought about by some act or omission on the part of the acceptor, that is, which will depend upon his future volition; also that the same must relate to some business act incidental to the collection of the instrument. As will be noted, the provision of the instrument in question declares that the same is payable on February 12, 1925, but shall mature immediately upon the happening of any one of the five events or contingencies set forth therein; and while appellant concedes that there are cases sustaining negotiability of instruments embodying acceleration clauses similar in substance to clauses 1, 2, and 4 of the instrument under consideration, it is claimed that clauses 3 and 5 thereof, relating to the events of "suffering a fire loss" and "failure to meet at maturity any prior trade acceptance," do not fall within the scope of the foregoing rules, and therefore are destructive of negotiability.

Much of the confusion existing in the decisions of courts of the various states relating to the law of negotiable instruments which led to the adoption in nearly all of the states of the uniform negotiable instrument law seems to have continued particularly with reference to the effect upon negotiability of certain forms of accelerations clauses; and evidently any attempt to reconcile the conflicting cases would be both interminable and impossible. As said by the Supreme Court of this state in the case of Utah National Bank v. Smith, 180 Cal. 1, 179 P. 160, 161, in quoting the language of the supreme court of the state of Utah (Felt v. Bush, 41 Utah, 462, 126 P. 688): "* * * The negotiable instruments law was intended to give legislative sanction to the majority rule to which reference has been made and was conceived by its authors and adopted by the different state Legislatures for the express purpose of harmonizing the conflicting decisions which had been rendered on the subject of negotiable instruments and the rights of those interested therein whose rights were acquired before maturity. As we view it, therefore, it is our plain duty to follow the numerous decisions that have directly passed upon the negotiable instruments law, and have construed it in accordance with the majority rule. The question is one of business expediency, and not of logic or equity as applied to an individual case."

The acceleration clauses contained in the instrument in the present case are identical in form with those construed by the Supreme Court of Idaho, in the case of McCornick v. Gem State Oil & Products Co., 38 Idaho, 470, 222 P. 286, 34 A. L. R. 867, which state, like California, has adopted the uniform negotiable instrument law, and it was held that said clauses were not destructive of negotiability. Appellant has advanced no convincing reasons to show that the decision in that case is unsound or contrary to the weight of authority; and we are of the opinion, therefore, that it is determinative of the present controversy.

The arguments appellant makes in furtherance of its legal contentions are based mostly upon certain language used in an article appearing in a law review published by one of the eastern universities, portions of which article are quoted in appellant's brief. But it is evident from an inspection thereof that the author, after reviewing the conflicting decisions, assumes only to set forth his individual views as to what the law upon this particular subject ought to be, some of which are in harmony with the law as declared in adjudicated cases, and others are in conflict therewith. The author's view that negotiability is destroyed by acceleration clauses relating to extrinsic facts is admittedly based upon the English rule announced in the case of Alexander v. Thomas, 16 Q. B. 333; but the author frankly concedes that "numerous decisions in this country repudiate the English case and uphold negotiability" (citing among other cases "those collected in 1 Daniel Negotiable Instruments, § 43; 8 Corpus Juris, 138, note 75; and Van Arsdale-Osborne Brokerage Co. v. Martin, 81 Kan. 499, 106 P. 42"). For example, it has been held that negotiability is not destroyed where the instrument provides that the maturity date shall be accelerated if certain property is sold (Nickell v. Bradshaw, 94 Or. 580, 183 P. 12, 11 A. L. R. 623), or in case of the death of the maker before maturity (Miller, as Ex'r, v. Western College of Toledo, 177 Ill. 280, 52 N. E. 432, 42 L. R. A. 797, 69 Am. St. Rep. 242; Bristol v. Warner, 19 Conn. 7; Martin v. Stone, 67 N. H. 367, 29 A. 845); or upon the completion of a building (Stevens v. Blunt, 7 Mass. 240; Goodloe v. Taylor, 10 N. C. 458); or if certain machinery is sold (Ernst v. Steckman, 74 Pa. 13, 15 Am. Rep. 542; Cisne v. Chidester, 85 Ill. 523; Charlton v. Reed, 61 Iowa, 166, 16 N. W. 64, 47 Am. Rep. 808); or upon the delivery of certain property to the payee (Dobbins v. Oberman, 17 Neb. 163, 22 N. W. 356). And the cases of McCornick v. Gem State Oil & Products Co., supra, and Ernst v. Steckman, supra, are authority for the proposition that it is not essential that the events be such that the happening thereof depends upon the future volition of the acceptor, or be wholly under his control, but that they may relate to the happening of contingencies beyond the control of both the acceptor and the holder. True, there are cases holding that negotiability is destroyed where acceleration is placed entirely under the control of the holder, or made dependent upon his whim or caprice, regardless of any act of the acceptor, such as accelerating maturity whenever the holder "deems himself insecure" (Moyer v. Hyde, 35 Idaho, 161, 204 P. 1068, 28 A. L. R. 695; First Nat. Bank v. McCartan, 206 Iowa, 1036, 220 N. W. 364), or upon the institution of suit or attachment proceedings against the maker or indorser (Great Falls Nat. Bank v. Young, 67 Mont. 328, 215 P. 651). But as will be noted that is not the situation here. Therefore, it would appear that aside from the decision in McCornick v. Gem State Oil & Products Co., supra, there is ample authority to sustain the contention that accelerating clauses such as "suffering a fire loss" and "failure to meet at maturity any prior trade acceptances" are not destructive of negotiability.

Appellant places much reliance also upon the case of Great Falls National Bank v. Young (Mont.), supra, but as will appear from the decision itself the contrary views therein expressed are based upon the published article above mentioned, and are not only incompatible with the legal principles enunciated by the Supreme Court of Idaho in the case of McCornick v. Gem State Oil & Products Co., supra, but are also in direct conflict with the established rule followed in the states of Oregon and Iowa. Furthermore, the decision in the Montana case is somewhat questioned in the fourth edition of Brannan's Negotiable Instruments Law (p. 54); and the construction the Supreme Court of Montana places upon the term "determinable future time," as used in the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law (Civ. Code, § 3082, subd. 3, and section 3085, subd. 2) is evidently at variance with the one adopted by the Supreme Court of this state in the case of Utah State National Bank v. Smith, supra, wherein it is said: "A matter is determinable 'that may be accurately found out, settled, or decided. Standard Dictionary. That is, 'capable of being determined, definitely ascertained, decided upon, or ended.' Webster's New International Dictionary. A future determinable time could be one determinable at some time in the future, as well as one determinable at present, or in advance." For the reasons stated we are of the opinion that the decision in the Montana case should not be followed in preference to the decision in the Idaho case.

The language used in deciding the case of Westlake Mercantile Corp. v. Merritt, 204 Cal. 673, 269 P. 620, 61 A. L. R. 811, cited by appellant, has no application to the questions at issue here. There the instrument provided: "The obligation of the acceptor hereof arises out of the purchase of goods from the drawer, maturity being in conformity with original terms of purchase" (italics ours); and it was held in substance that the clause was more than a mere statement of the transaction which gave rise to the instrument, as is permitted by the Negotiable Instrument Law (subdivision 2, § 3084, Civ. Code); and that pursuant to the italicized portion of the provision maturity of the instrument was made subject to the terms of an extrinsic contract of purchase, and that consequently negotiability was destroyed because the source of the acceptor's obligation to pay did not arise from the instrument itself, but grew out of a collateral transaction; in other words, that one of the principal elements of negotiability is certainty of payment, and that therefore since the italicized words rendered payment conditional or uncertain, they were destructive of negotiability.

[2] Appellant further contends that respondent is estopped to assert any rights against appellant under said trade acceptance because of the failure of respondent at any time prior to August, 1925, to notify appellant of its claim to said trade acceptance. We find no merit in the point, for if, as held, the trade acceptance be negotiable, it was admittedly acquired for a valuable consideration prior to the maturity date thereof and also before the rescission of the sales contract pursuant to which the trade acceptance was given; and consequently under such circumstances there would seem to be no legal duty imposed upon respondent to notify appellant prior to the fixed maturity date of the instrument that it was the owner and holder thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WILEY.

Cr. 1138.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 7, 1931.

1. Criminal law 🔑624.

That verdict as to sanity of accused was not signed by same member of jury, as foreman, who signed previous verdict establishing defendant's guilt of murder, did not invalidate verdict (Pen. Code, § 1026).

2. Criminal law 🔑871(2).

Signing of verdict by jury foreman is mere means of authenticating finding of jury.

3. Criminal law 🔑871(2).

In absence of statute requiring verdict to be signed by jury foreman, verdict may be authenticated by any jury member.

4. Criminal law 🔑624.

In murder prosecution, where same jury tried guilt and insanity of accused, requiring accused to assume burden of proving his insanity was proper, without requiring further evidence of crime than was introduced on issue of guilt.

5. Criminal law 🔑633(1).

Where accused in murder prosecution failed to request appointment of alienists, he was not prejudiced by court's failure to appoint them (Pen. Code, § 1027).

> Pen. Code, § 1027, provides that, when defendant pleads not guilty by reason of insanity, the court must select and appoint two alienists to examine the defendant and investigate his sanity. Not only did accused fail to request appointment of alienists, but there was no objection to evidence of the alienists who did testify on the part of accused.

6. Criminal law 🔑633(1).

Refusing request of defendant, pleading insanity as defense, for appointment of two alienists, is error (Pen. Code, § 1027).

7. Criminal law 🔑633(1).

Examination of accused, pleading insanity, by alienists appointed by court, is not jurisdictional proceeding and may be waived (Pen. Code, § 1027).

8. Criminal law 🔑1171(1).

In murder prosecution, curtailment of accused's counsel's attempt to discuss result of verdict of "not guilty by reason of insanity" was not prejudicial error.

> Accused's counsel attempted to tell jury in his closing argument that, in event accused was found "not guilty by reason of insanity," he would not necessarily be discharged from custody, but the court would direct that he be confined in the state hospital for the criminal insane, unless it appeared that accused had recovered his sanity since committing the offense. The argument was interrupted and objected to by the prosecutor, who then erroneously stated, in the course of a colloquy with the court, that the verdict in question would necessarily make accused "a free man." The court also erroneously conceded this to be true.

9. Criminal law 🔑717.

In murder prosecution, attempt of accused's counsel to discuss result of verdict of "not guilty by reason of insanity" was improper, as it invaded province of court.

10. Homicide 🔑237.

Evidence held to support finding that alleged murderer was not insane at time of killing because of beating he received.

11. Criminal law 🔑720(9).

Prosecutor's argument in murder trial held not prejudicial.

> Accused defended on the ground of insanity. The prosecutor's argument was to the effect that accused must be held responsible for his conduct, that a witness stated that accused appeared to be perfectly normal, cool, and collected, not excited, after the homicide, and that accused knew what he was doing when he committed the homicide.

12. Witnesses ⚷277(2).

Where accused testified drinking and abuse night before homicide unbalanced him, cross-examination on conduct or recollection at shooting was proper.

> Accused contended that, as result of certain beatings received from the homicide victims, he was rendered unconscious, and that the following morning he committed the homicides before regaining full consciousness, and while suffering from traumatic psychosis, and in examination in chief offered supporting testimony.

13. Criminal law ⚷720(1).

Where defendant testifying as to his sanity failed to testify whether he comprehended nature of acts at time offense was committed, prosecution could comment on it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Charles Wiley was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Hugo McKinley and L. B. Schlingheyde, both of Modesto, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder of the first degree and was sentenced to imprisonment for life. He became intoxicated and went on a rampage. He shot and killed three men. His excuse for the killing was that these men had beaten him the night before the fatal shooting until he became insensible and then robbed him of his money. His defense to the charge of murder was that the beating which he received caused temporary insanity, and that he therefore failed to appreciate the nature of the act which resulted in the killing.

At the trial the defendant denied his guilt and separately pleaded insanity. The jury found him guilty as charged and imposed the penalty of life imprisonment. The same jury subsequently found that he was sane at the time of the shooting. At the trial of the issue with respect to his sanity the verdict was signed by a member of the jury, as foreman, other than the one who signed the previous verdict which found him guilty of murder. The jury was polled at both trials and the members were unanimous in the rendition of their verdicts.

The appellant's attack is directed only to an asserted invalidity of the verdict as to his sanity. It is claimed this verdict is void because: (1) It was not signed by the same foreman who signed the verdict finding him guilty of the charge of murder; (2) the burden of proving his insanity was placed on the defendant without first requiring the prosecution to prove a prima facie case of guilt; (3) the court failed to appoint alienists as required by section 1027 of the Penal Code; (4) the argument of defendant's counsel was unduly restricted; and (5) the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct.

[1-3] The fact that the verdict as to the defendant's sanity was not signed by the same member of the jury, as foreman, who signed the first verdict establishing his guilt of the crime of murder, does not invalidate it. The signing of a verdict by a foreman is a mere means of authenticating the finding of the jury. There is no provision of the statutes requiring that the foreman of a jury, which is impaneled to try the issue of insanity, shall be the same foreman who is selected to try the chief issue as to the guilt of the accused. Section 1026 of the Penal Code provides that, in the event of a plea of insanity, that issue may be tried "either before the same jury [which tried the question of the guilt of the defendant as to the crime charged] or before a new jury, in the discretion of the court." Indeed, the law does not even require a verdict to be signed by a foreman. In the absence of such statute, we assume a verdict may be authenticated by any member of the jury. The form of a verdict is prescribed by statute and it does not require the signature of any member of the jury. The authenticity of the verdict is ascertained by requiring it to be orally declared in open court by the foreman. If demanded by either party, the verdict must be declared by each member of the jury as provided by section 1149 of the Penal Code. This is what is commonly termed polling the jury. In 16 C. J. 1100, § 2582, it is said: "In the absence of statute requiring it, a written verdict need not be signed by the foreman of the jury, or by any of the jurors, although it is the usual and better practice for one of the jury, particularly the foreman, to sign it."

[4] There is no error in requiring the defendant to assume the burden of proving his insanity at the time of the shooting without further evidence of the crime on the part of the prosecution. The case was tried by the same jury on both the issue as to the commission of the offense by the defendant and as to the plea of insanity. The evidence of the guilt of the defendant was already before the jury. It was said in Ex parte Merwin (Cal. App.) 290 P. 1076, 1077: "The cause presented by the information and the defendant's pleas thereto was 'a single cause and the trial thereof a single trial.'"

[5-6] The defendant was not prejudiced by the failure of the court to appoint two medical experts pursuant to section 1027 of the Penal Code to examine the defendant with respect to his sanity. This right to such an examination on the part of the defendant was waived. The last-mentioned section provides in part: "When a defendant pleads not guilty by reason of insanity the court must select and appoint two alienists, at least one of whom must be from the medical staffs of the state hospitals * * * to examine the defendant and investigate his sanity. * * *"

This selection and appointment of alienists by the court was not made. That requirement on the part of the court, when it is requested, is mandatory. It is a humane provision and was enacted in the interest of fairness for the benefit of an impecunious defendant whose sanity, at the time of the commission of an alleged offense, is an issue at the trial. An examination of the accused by such impartial medical experts who are selected by neither of the partisans to the action, but by the court, is most likely to be free from bias. Upon request the defendant is entitled to the fulfillment of this requirement of the statute. It would constitute error to refuse such request.

[7] The examination of an accused by alienists which are appointed by the court is, however, not a jurisdictional proceeding and may be waived. In the present case it was waived. There was no request of the court, on the part of the defendant, to appoint such alienists and no objections to the proceedings in this regard. Six alienists were examined as witnesses at the trial regarding the sanity of the defendant. Four were summoned by the defendant and two were called by the prosecution. Both of the expert witnesses who testified for the prosecution were members of the medical staff of the Stockton State Hospital. One of these alienists was Dr. M. H. Smyth who had served on that staff for thirty years, and at the time of the trial was acting as superintendent of that institution. Under such circumstances, in the absence of a request for the appointment of alienists, and in the absence of objection to the evidence of those who did testify on the part of the defendant, he was not prejudiced by the failure of the court to appoint the alienists as provided by the statute.

[8] During the closing argument of defendant's attorney he attempted to inform the jury that, in the event "the defendant is found not guilty by reason of insanity," the accused would not necessarily be discharged from custody, but upon the contrary, under the provisions of section 1026 of the Penal Code, the court would then "direct that the defendant be confined in the state hospital for the criminal insane," unless "it shall appear to the court [from the evidence at the trial] that the defendant has fully recovered his sanity [since the commission of the offense]." This is a correct statement of the law. This explanation of the law was evidently intended to alleviate the fears of jurors that their verdict of "not guilty by reason of insanity" might result in endangering society by discharging a maniac from the custody of the officers. This argument was interrupted and objected to by the district attorney who then erroneously stated, in the course of a colloquy with the court, that in the event of a verdict of "not guilty by reason of insanity" the defendant would thereupon necessarily become "a free man." The court also erroneously conceded this to be true. It is now asserted by the defendant that this curtailment of his argument was prejudicial error and resulted in a miscarriage of justice. We think not.

[9] The attempt on the part of defendant's counsel to discuss the procedure which might follow as a result of their verdict amounted to an invasion of the province of court and was clearly improper. The jury was not concerned with the question of the defendant's state of mind at the time of the trial, except so far as his mental condition at that time might furnish evidence of his sanity or insanity at the time of the commission of the crime with which he was charged. The jury was subsequently correctly instructed by the court that "you are to determine * * * whether the defendant was sane or insane on April 28th, 1930, at the time he killed Joe Bartley, Deloice Fultz and Jack Murphy." The jury was further instructed: "Evidence of the defendant's sanity or insanity before and after the date of the killing is admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving the sanity or insanity of the defendant on April 28th, 1930, and for no other purpose."

It was not contended the defendant was insane at the time of the trial. The evidence of his insanity during any period of time was very slight and unsatisfactory. As a boy, in common with others, he was taught with difficulty and held an antipathy for schools. When he grew to manhood he became a mere laborer, but avoided working whenever it was possible. He became dissipated and associated with tramps. He was evidently a common itinerant. In 1915 he was committed to a state hospital for inebriacy. The night before the shooting he was intoxicated and engaged in a drunken quarrel with his itinerant companions at their camp near Crows Landing. A fight ensued between them that night. As a victim of their beating the defendant claims to have been left unconscious at a culvert near by. The circumstances of the shooting indicate a deliberate and atrocious plan to kill his companions for no better reason than that they had beaten him severely and perchance robbed him of a small sum of money. After the killing he started up the river along a trail carrying the rifle with which he had accomplished the homicide. Meeting Mr. Hutchinson, with whom he was acquainted, he said: "I have three of them laid out down there * * * (you) telephone to the sheriff." Hutchinson testified the defendant's face was bruised from the beating he had received. In response to the question, "Did he appear to be perfectly cool and collected and rational and at himself?" he replied, "Yes sir." Mr. Nunes, who owned a dairy ranch in that vicinity, was walking along the pathway on the levee to feed some stock which were kept in a corral, when he heard the three shots which were fired by the defendant. Soon afterwards the defendant came along the pathway, and, in response to an inquiry from Nunes as to the occasion for the shooting, he said: "They beat me up." Nunes testified: "They left him unconscious, he said, 'And when I waked up I get a gun and shot them and killed them, and I want you to go and telephone for the sheriff.'" There is evidence that the defendant said he regained consciousness and got up from the place where he lay near the culvert; that he went to the cabin and procured the rifle, and approaching the door of the other cabin where two of his associates were sleeping he confronted one of them and raising his rifle said: "You took my money and I'm going to kill you." Thereupon he shot and killed him. He immediately fired upon the other occupant of the cabin with fatal result. Going to the cabin where the third victim slept he shot and killed him.

[10] Dr. De Lappe, who examined the defendant at the jail, soon after his arrest on the day of the shooting, testified that the accused had both eyes blackened and had "rather a large contusion on the back of his head." Substantially all that the defendant's first expert medical witness testified to, which might tend to support the plea of insanity, was that such a contused wound as the defendant had might result from a blow severe enough to cause unconsciousness for a period of eight or ten hours; that such a blow might cause concussion of the brain without actually fracturing the skull. Other alienists then testified that such concussion of the brain might result in temporary insanity, or acute mania, during which period the patient might not comprehend the nature of an act which he performed. The inference from their testimony is that a person so afflicted might even shoot and kill another without realizing what he was doing, or that it was wrong to do so. This evidence is entirely hypothetical. The record amply supports the verdict of the jury to the effect that the defendant sustained no such concussion of the brain as a result of the beating which he received and that he was perfectly sane at the time of the shooting.

[11] Finally and most insistently the defendant asserts that the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in arguing to the jury as follows: "He [the defendant] must be held responsible for his conduct. Why did he go over there to Hutchinson's, first? Why did he go to Nunes and say, 'I have killed three men?' Nunes said he appeared then to be perfectly normal, cool and collected, not excited. He knew what he had done. You will observe that * * * when I attempted to cross-examine this defendant in respect to what occurred after he became unconscious, I was blocked. * * * He knows better than any man * * * whether he knew right from wrong, he knows what he was doing. * * * Nowhere do you hear a voice in this courtroom (asserting) that this defendant on the day that he killed those three men, didn't know what he was doing." This argument was assigned as prejudicial error, and the court was asked to instruct the jury to disregard it. The court refused to so instruct the jury. We are of the opinion this was neither improper argument nor prejudicial. When the defendant became a witness in his own behalf on the trial involving his sanity at the time of the commission of the offense with which he was charged, he related the circumstances of his association and conflict with the three men whom he afterwards killed. His story ended with the statement: "Jack and Murphy grabbed me and throwed me down and Slim commenced beating me in the face. He says, 'Take his money off of him * * * and throw him into the river.' * * * Jack, he was getting my money out, * * * and I got it (the purse) in my hand. * * * He (Slim) told Murphy to help him, and finally wrenched it out of my hand, and that was the last I remember." On cross-examination the district attorney asked the defendant: "Q. Where were you when you said you became unconscious? * * * When you awakened the next morning, you were near the culvert, were you not?" To this question the court sustained an objection on the ground that it was not proper cross-examination. The examination as to the conduct of the defendant was not pursued further.

[12, 13] In assigning the foregoing argument of the district attorney as prejudicial, the defendant in his brief says: "Defendant testified in chief as to certain drinking indulged in, and as to beatings administered to him on April twenty-seventh. It was the contention of the defense that as a result of these beatings, the defendant was rendered unconscious, and remained that way for a period of from eight to ten hours. The following morning he committed the homicides before regaining full consciousness, and while suffering from traumatic psychosis."

It was therefore competent to cross-examine the defendant upon his conduct or recollection as to his acts on the morning of the shooting. His testimony left the inference that, because of the beating which he had received, he did not know what he was doing and was irresponsible for his conduct. Clearly, the question, "When you awakened the next morning, you were near the culvert, were you not?" was competent. The court erroneously sustained the defendant's objection to this question. Because of the defendant's improper objection, the prosecution was precluded from proceeding to ascertain from the witness the extent to which he claimed to be ignorant of his acts and conduct on the morning of the shooting and the duration of time this pretended lapse of memory lasted. It would have been proper cross-examination for the district attorney to have asked the defendant to relate just what he did recall after he claimed to have become unconscious; to have asked him why he returned to the cabin; whether he recalled a purpose to punish his assailants for stealing his money; how he knew where to find the rifle with which he killed his victims and all the circumstances which might tend to show whether he was conscious or unconscious, sane or insane, at the time of the shooting. In the absence of this testimony on the part of the defendant, the prosecution had a perfect right to argue from his theory of the record, as it stood, that the defendant was conscious of his acts; that he fully comprehended the nature of the transaction and knew it was wrong to shoot his companions. Indeed the defendant told Hutchinson immediately after the shooting, "It's too bad, too bad I done it, I am a good American citizen, too bad I done it." This indicates knowledge of the evil of the homicide.

There was no prejudicial error in the district attorney declaring, in the course of his argument, that he was "blocked" in his effort to show by the defendant on cross-examination that he comprehended and knew exactly what he was doing on the morning of the killing. There was no error in his saying, as his conclusion from the record as it stood, that the defendant did know "better than any man * * * whether he knew right from wrong," or the nature of the acts which he performed at the time of the killing. Nor was it error for him to say he had heard no voice in the courtroom asserting that the defendant did not know what he was doing at the time of the shooting. To be sure the defendant's attorney was undoubtedly claiming his client did not know what he was doing when he fired the fatal shots. This was the entire theory of his defense. But clearly the district attorney was referring to the fact that no witness, expert, or nonexpert had specifically said the defendant did not then know what he was doing. There is no error in commenting upon the fact that a defendant who became a witness in his own behalf regarding his own sanity failed to testify as to whether he did or did not comprehend the nature of his acts at the time of the commission of the offense with which he is charged. The fact that an erroneous ruling of the court aided the defendant in avoiding these statements, made them none the less competent. It would be a preposterous rule that would permit an accused, who relied upon the defense of insanity, to testify to the conduct of others which he claims caused the mania and then close the door to an inquiry from him as to whether in fact it did or did not result in rendering him irresponsible for the acts which he performed. In the examination of one upon the issue of insanity, a wide latitude is allowed.

The challenged argument was not improper. There is no miscarriage of justice in this case.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiff brought this action against defendant bank to enforce an express trust and to obtain a judgment declaring the respective rights of plaintiff and the several defendants. The trial court sustained the demurrer of the defendant bank and defendant Gay Engineering Company to plaintiff's amended complaint without leave to amend, and, from a judgment thereupon entered in favor of said defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Plaintiff is the assignee of one Raymond, the original sole beneficiary of the trust in question, while the defendant bank is the trustee. Defendant Gay Engineering Company is the purchaser at a sheriff's sale on execution in an action brought against Raymond in which sale the sheriff sold to said defendant corporation all right, title, and beneficial interest of Raymond in said trust. The facts as alleged in the amended complaint so far as material on this appeal will be chronologically set forth. In March, 1922, Raymond, who was the owner of certain real property, conveyed said property to the defendant bank by deed absolute in form, but said conveyance was intended to be and was received in trust for the sole use and benefit of Raymond. On the same day the defendant bank executed a declaration of trust covering said property, which declaration was accepted and approved by Raymond. The declaration of trust provided for the subdivision and sale of said property by the defendant bank as trustee and the payment to Raymond of the net proceeds of such sales. In September, 1922, and before any of said property had been sold, an action was commenced by one Browne against Raymond and an attachment was levied upon all moneys, goods, credits, effects, debts due or owing, or any other personal property belonging to Raymond in the possession or under the control of the defendant bank. In March, 1923, Raymond assigned to plaintiff for a valuable consideration all of his right, title, and interest in and to said trust. In the case of Browne v. Raymond, above referred to, judgment was obtained against Raymond in March, 1924, for approximately $16,000, and a writ of execution was thereafter issued and levied upon all moneys, goods, credits, effects, debts due or owing, or any other personal property belonging to Raymond in the possession of or under the control of the defendant bank. Subsequently the sheriff, after notice given, conducted a sale in which he offered to sell to the highest bidder all of the right, title, and beneficial interest of Raymond in and to said trust. Defendant Gay Engineering Corporation bid $11,000, which was the highest bid received. This amount was paid, and the sheriff executed and delivered to said defendant a certificate of sale. In April, 1927, the defendant bank repudiated and disclaimed all responsibility, obligation, and liability to plaintiff under said trust.

From the above statement it appears that the attachment of Raymond's interest as beneficiary of the trust preceded Raymond's assignment of his interest to plaintiff. If his interest as such beneficiary was subject to attachment and subsequent sale on execution, it is conceded that the demurrer was properly sustained. Appellant contends, however, that Raymond's interest as beneficiary of the trust was neither subject to attachment nor sale upon execution. We are of the opinion that appellant's contention may not be sustained.

[1, 2] Under the law of this state the interest of Raymond as beneficiary of the trust in question was not an interest in the real property, but was personal property. The creation of the trust vested in the trustee the whole estate in the real property, subject only to the execution of the trust (Civ. Code, § 863), and Raymond as beneficiary retained no interest in the land which was subject to attachment by levy upon the real property. Ward v. Waterman, 85 Cal. 488, 508, 24 P. 930. It has been said that the interest of the beneficiary consists of "merely a chose in action, an interest in a fund of money to be realized in the future by the sale of real property. By the making of the trust agreement he had converted any * * * interest in the real property which he possessed into a right only to receive money in lieu thereof, and this right was undoubtedly personal property." Marble Company v. Merchants' National Bank, 15 Cal. App. 347, 351, 115 P. 59, 61. See, also, Craven v. Dominguez Estate Company, 72 Cal. App. 713, 237 P. 821; Ward v. Waterman, supra; Civ. Code, § 663; Code Civ. Proc. § 17, subd. 3.

[3] In our opinion the interest of Raymond as beneficiary of the trust must be treated as personal property not capable of manual delivery, and the Code sections are sufficiently broad and general in their terms to bring such interest within the category of property subject to attachment and sale on execution. Section 541 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "the rights or shares which the defendant may have in the stock of any corporation or company, together with the interest and profit thereon, and all debts due such defendant, and all other property in this state of such defendant not exempt from execution, may be attached, and if judgment be recovered, be sold to satisfy the judgment and execution." Section 688 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads in part: "All goods, chattels, moneys, and other property, both real and personal, or any interest therein, of the judgment debtor, not exempt by law, and all property and rights of property seized and held under attachment in the action, are liable to execution. Shares and interests in any corporation or company, and debts and credits, and all other property, both real and personal, or any interest in either real or personal property, and all other property not capable of manual delivery, may be levied upon or released from levy in like manner as like property may be attached or released from attachment." Section 542, subd. 6, relating to the attachment of personal property not capable of manual delivery provides: "Debts and credits and other personal property, not capable of manual delivery, must be attached by leaving with the person owing such debts, or having in his possession, or under his control, such credits and other personal property, * * * a copy of the writ, and a notice that the debts owing by him to the defendant, or the credits and other personal property in his possession, or under his control, belonging to the defendant, are attached in pursuance of such writ." Section 691 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to sale on execution, provides: "The sheriff must execute the writ against the property of the judgment debtor, by levying on a sufficient amount of property, if there be sufficient; collecting or selling the things in action, and selling the other property. * * *". Section 699 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads: "When the purchaser of any personal property not capable of manual delivery pays the purchase-money, the officer making the sale must execute and deliver to the purchaser a certificate of sale. Such certificate conveys to the purchaser all the right which the debtor had in such property on the day the execution or attachment was levied."

It is true that, in the early stages of the law relating to attachment and execution, many forms of valuable property rights by reason of their intangible nature could not be reached in this manner. The early conception of attachment and execution seems to have contemplated the levy upon and seizure of tangible property, and it was very generally held that choses in action, stock in corporations, the interest of a pledgor, equitable interests and other forms of what might be termed intangible property were not subject to levy. But with the development of the law, both statutory and otherwise, and the combining of courts of law and equity jurisdiction, it is now possible to reach on attachment and execution practically every type of property, tangible and intangible, belonging to the judgment debtor. Code Civ. Proc., §§ 541, 542, 688, 699; 15 Cal. Jur. 1015 et seq.; Fish v. Fowlie, 58 Cal. 373; Le Roy v. Dunkerly, 54 Cal. 452; Kennedy v. Nunan, 52 Cal. 326; Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635, 35 P. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314; Hoxie v. Bryant, 131 Cal. 85, 63 P. 153; Dubois v. Spinks, 114 Cal. 289, 46 P. 95; Treadwell v. Davis, 34 Cal. 601, 607, 94 Am. Dec. 770; Edwards v. Beugnot, 7 Cal. 162; Farmers' Nat. Gold Bank v. Wilson, 58 Cal. 600; Lackmann v. Kearney, 142 Cal. 112, 75 P. 668; Raymond v. Blancgrass, 36 Mont. 449, 93 P. 648, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 976; State v. District Court, 74 Mont. 355, 240 P. 667; Johnson v. Dahlquist, 130 Wash. 29, 225 P. 817; Beswick v. Dorris, (C. C.) 174 F. 502; Gordon v. Hillman, 107 Wash. 490, 182 P. 574.

That the interest of the beneficiary might be reached by the garnishment process was indicated in Ward v. Waterman, supra. Under a similar trust, it was there held that the beneficiary's interest could not be reached by levy upon the real property, but the court said on page 508 of 85 Cal., 24 P. 930, 935: "According to the allegations of his complaint the writ was levied, not by garnishment, but by direct levy, as upon real estate, upon all the interest of Waterman in the land. As we have already seen, Waterman had no interest in the land, legal, equitable, present, or prospective." It further appears that a pledgor's interest can be reached by garnishment of the pledgee, but not by levy upon the property pledged. Dubois v. Spinks, 114 Cal. 289, 46 P. 95; Treadwell v. Davis, 34 Cal. 601, 94 Am. Dec. 770; Edwards v. Beugnot, 7 Cal. 162; Jones on Pledges, § 376; Warner v. Fourth National Bank, 115 N. Y. 251, 22 N. E. 172. We see no reason why the interest of a beneficiary of a trust may not be reached in a similar manner by garnishment of the trustee.

Appellant relies upon Hassie v. God Is With Us Congregation, 35 Cal. 378, and Redondo Beach Company v. Brewer, 101 Cal. 322, 35 P. 896. These cases are not in point, and the language used in the opinions cannot be considered authoritative in the light of the numerous decisions above referred to. See, also, Brainard v. Rogers, 74 Cal. App. 247, 239 P. 1095; Philbrook v. Mercantile Trust Company, 84 Cal. App. 187, 257 P. 882; Youtz v. Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank, 31 Cal. App. 370, 160 P. 855; opinion of Supreme Court on denying hearing in Algeltinger v. Healy-Tibbitts Company, 23 Cal. App. 608, 611, 139 P. 436, 438.

As the interest of Raymond as beneficiary of the trust passed to defendant Gay Engineering Company by virtue of the attachment and sale on execution, it follows that the complaint of plaintiff as the subsequent assignee of Raymond failed to state a cause of action, and the demurrer thereto was properly sustained. It therefore becomes unnecessary to consider the further points urged by respondents in support of the judgment.

Judgment is affirmed.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants and from an order of the trial court denying a new trial. The defendant E. D. Leavitt & Co., a California corporation, secured from the commissioner of corporations a broker's certificate and filed a bond in the sum of $5,000, as required by section 5 of the Corporate Securities Act (Act 3814, p. 1376, Deering's Cons. Supp. 1925–27). The surety on the bond was the defendant Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company. Thereafter Leavitt & Co. employed one LeNaire to sell stock of the South Coast Gas Company. His instructions were to sell for cash or marketable securities only and with a deposit of not less than 30 per cent. at time of taking the order. From the record it appears that the agent's authority to make a contract of sale for his principal was limited only to securing the approval of the principal if any marketable securities were taken, but was full and complete if the sale was for cash. LeNaire secured an order for twelve shares of the stock from plaintiff at $100 per share, plaintiff giving him a deposit of $40 cash and a check for $60, payable to the agent. LeNaire turned the check into the company for credit to the plaintiff and wrote on the subscription, "Due 300.00 to be paid 10/4/27," the $300 plus the $60 check making the first payment required. The cash he kept for himself, saying nothing to his employer about it. The books did not show for what the $60 credit was given. Later on LeNaire explained that the credit was in error and instructed that it be transferred to one Benjamin. On October 7, 1927, a few days after the order was taken for the twelve shares of stock, he succeeded in prevailing upon plaintiff to subscribe for an additional thirty shares at $100 per share. The first payment of $900 in this transaction was made up of a credit of the $100 which plaintiff gave LeNaire on the first subscription and her check in his favor for $800. The balance of the purchase price plaintiff agreed to pay in six equal installments on or before the 10th day of each month following the date of the subscription, with interest at 7 per cent. About the 12th of October, 1927, LeNaire approached plaintiff with the proposition that, if she would deed a lot which she had in Garden Grove to a man named McDonald, to whom the former was in debt, he (LeNaire) would take it at a valuation of $2,100 and would himself pay the balance due on plaintiff's subscription for the stock from $6,000 in dividends on certain stock of his that he had coming from E. D. Leavitt & Co. and others. Plaintiff executed the deed as requested the afternoon of October 12th, and in the evening of that day LeNaire came to her home and offered his note dated October 12, 1927, for $2,100 payable one year after date. Plaintiff testified that she told him she did not want the note, but that he left it among some papers on her table, where she found it a day or two afterwards and kept it in her possession until the time of trial. Neither the first nor second subscription taken by LeNaire from plaintiff was turned into the defendant Leavitt & Co., nor was any of the money paid LeNaire by plaintiff, with the exception of the check for $60. A few days after the last transaction LeNaire disappeared and is now a fugitive from justice.

The complaint alleged, in substance, that defendant Leavitt & Co., acting through its agent LeNaire, on or about the 7th day of October, 1927, falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that, if she would pay LeNaire $900 and convey said Garden Grove lot to his nominee at an agreed consideration of $2,100, he (LeNaire), would have issued to her thirty shares (half preferred and half common) of the South Coast Gas Company's stock, fully paid, and that relying on such representations she entered into the transaction; that said representations were made for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff, were known to be false, and were made without any intention of performing the same. The complaint then alleges the making of the bond by the codefendant surety company, conditioned upon the principal, E. D. Leavitt & Co., and any and all of its agents and employees strictly complying with the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act and honestly and faithfully applying all funds received and honestly and faithfully performing all obligations and undertakings in the purchase and sale of securities by them, and, further, paying all damages suffered by any person damaged or defrauded by reason of the violation of any of the provisions of said act, "or by reason of any fraud connected with or growing out of any transaction contemplated by the provisions of the act"; following which is the allegation that the bond has been breached by the defendants and plaintiff damaged by the acts alleged in the sum of $3,000.

The complaint does not allege nor does the evidence show any misrepresentation as to the value of the stock. The trial court found, in substance, that it is not true that defendant E. D. Leavitt & Co. through its agent made the representations alleged; that it is true that plaintiff agreed to purchase the thirty shares of stock and paid to LeNaire, as agent of the defendant company, the sum of $900 on account of said subscription; that said LeNaire acted entirely outside the scope of his authority in receiving real property to provide money for the payment of the balance of said subscription, and that said defendant corporation is not bound by his actions; that defendant E. D. Leavitt & Co. has received from plaintiff the sum of $900 as a first installment on her stock subscription and no more, and that the latter has not been cheated out of said sum of $900, or said lot, by defendant E. D. Leavitt & Co.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the court erred in finding as above set forth, and urges that judgment should have been rendered in her favor for the $900 and the value of the land, or at least for the sum of $900. As we have pointed out, the evidence shows the deal was made with the agent several days before the lot was mentioned. With regard to the lot and the payment by LeNaire of the balance of her subscription plaintiff testified as follows, on redirect examination:

"Q. Where did he represent he was going to get the money to pay for this stock for you? A. From the Leavitt & Company and other public utilities where he had stock in. * * *

"Q. And the deed was going then, as I understand it, to J. K. McDonald, to pay off the debt. Did he say he was going to get any money on the deed, also from J. K. McDonald? A. He did not say he was.

"Q. He was not going to raise, then, any money on the deed? A. He did not say anything about it, if he was."

It would seem from the uncontradicted evidence that plaintiff made the second subscription for stock and paid the first installment of $900 thereon without the inducement of any misrepresentations by the agent. The lot transaction as shown by the undisputed evidence was purely personal between plaintiff and LeNaire and had nothing to do with the defendant Leavitt & Co. It was entirely beyond the scope of his employment and could not bind his principal even if he tried so to do, so we fail to see how there could be any recovery, so far as the value of the lot is concerned, on the basis of agency (Ackerman v. Channel Commercial Co., 53 Cal. App. 259, 199 P. 1101), or upon the bond (Filarski v. Covey, 75 Cal. App. 353, 242 P. 874). With regard to the $900 paid to the agent in the line of his duty, it would seem to have been paid on a valid existing obligation; and it not appearing that plaintiff has rescinded the same, or that she had any grounds of rescission, or that E. D. Leavitt & Co. is not fully able to carry out its part of the agreement, we see no error in the findings and judgment of the trial court in regard thereto.

[3] Counsel for appellant contend that under section 5 of the Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1925, p. 967, § 3) defendant corporation is liable for all the acts of its agent, even though without the scope of his employment. We have quoted heretofore substantially the provisions of the bond in question, which follows the requirements of the act, and it is sufficient to say that the conditions required to be in the bond are tied directly into transactions under the act, which the lot deal is not. "Strict compliance with the provisions of this act," "faithful and honest performance of all obligations and undertakings in the purchase or sale of securities," "payment of all damages suffered by any person damaged or defrauded by reason of the violation of any of the provisions of this act, or by reason of any fraud connected with or growing out of any transaction contemplated by the provisions of this act," is the language used, and the lot deal could not be any stretch of the imagination be held to be within the provisions of the act or a violation of any of them, or to be a transaction "contemplated by the provisions" of the act.

[4] With regard to the attempted appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, it is sufficient to say that such an order is nonappealable. Section 963, Code Civ. Proc.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment following an order sustaining the demurrer of the defendant W. J. Colter to plaintiffs' complaint without leave to amend. It was alleged that on November 14, 1925, the defendants H. S. Callahan and Augusta C. Callahan entered into a written agreement with the defendant W. A. Playter under and by the terms of which Playter was given the privilege of exploring for and developing oil on certain real property owned by the Callahans and to that end to furnish the materials and equipment for the drilling of wells thereon. The lease it was alleged contained the following pertinent clauses:

1. "The lessee shall not suffer, or permit any laborers or material men's lien or liens of like nature, to arise or exist upon or against the leased land, by reason of his operation under this indenture, and shall hold the owner harmless against any and all such liens. In like manner, the owner shall be solely responsible for, and liable for materials and labor for its enterprises permitted by this indenture, and shall likewise not suffer or permit any lien to arise or exist upon or against said leased land, or any part thereof, and shall hold the lessee harmless against any and all such liens. The party responsible for such liens shall have the right to contest the same; and in the event of such contest, shall not be deemed in default during the continuance of litigation; but shall promptly pay any judgment against it, him or them, or the land in said action; or in case of appeal, shall furnish appeal bond, or otherwise cause the stay of execution, pending appeal; and after decision of the appeal, clear the leased land of any such adverse judgment. If either party shall be in default regarding any such lien or judgment, the party not in default may, at such party's option, after five (5) days written notice to the party in default, elect to pay off the same, and clear the leased land therefrom; and in that event, the defaulting party shall immediately reimburse the other for all sums so expended."

2. "All provisions, covenants, agreements and stipulations contained in this indenture, by which either of the parties hereto are bound, shall in like manner be binding upon the heirs, successors and assigns of the parties so bound, and those which are for the benefit of either of the parties, shall in like manner inure to the benefit of the heirs, successors and assigns of the parties so benefited, and all such provisions, covenants, agreements, and stipulations shall run with the land."

On May 5, 1926, the defendants H. S. Callahan and Augusta C. Callahan agreed to sell the real property to the plaintiffs and assigned and transferred to them all of their interest in the lease formerly executed to the defendant W. A. Playter. The agreement of sale was completed on May 24, 1926. In the meantime, and on December 1, 1925, the original lessee, the defendant W. A. Playter, contracted with the Union Tank & Pipe Company for oil well casing to be used and which was used in the drilling of an oil well on the property at the agreed price of $3,529.50. On May 4, 1926, the Union Tank & Pipe Company filed and recorded its claim of lien for the sum mentioned, and its assignee commenced an action to foreclose that lien on July 30, 1926, which action resulted in a judgment of foreclosure in the sum of $3,942.73, rendered on February 7, 1928, pursuant to which the property was sold by the sheriff on May 21, 1928.

On April 1, 1926, the original lessee W. A. Playter sold and assigned his interest in the lease to the defendant W. J. Colter, who went into possession of the leased premises and operated the same for several months thereafter, producing oil and gas therefrom.

The sole question with which we are concerned is whether the complaint states a cause of action against the respondent W. J. Colter. It is argued by respondent that the covenant to hold lessor harmless against liens is not a covenant running with the land and was not made so by the second quoted provision of the lease by which it was expressly stated that the covenant should bind the "heirs, successors and assigns" and "run with the land." But let us assume that the parties did by contract agree that the covenant should run with the land and be binding upon the naked assignee, in what position do we find the respondent Colter? Indulging the assumption, we find that he did by his acceptance of the lease bind himself to hold the lessor and his successors harmless against any liens arising "against the land, by reason of his operation under" the indenture. (Italics ours.) We are here confronted, however, with the necessity, if the judgment is to be reversed, of finding an implied undertaking, at least, on the part of the assignee, not merely to hold the lessor harmless against operations of his own, but operations of his predecessor. The language of the covenant cannot be stretched to that length. Nor are we called upon to decide whether the leasehold interest could be forfeited or otherwise subjected by a different kind of proceeding to the payment of the lien. The action is to recover from the respondent personally.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Trial 🔑397(6).

In contractor's action to foreclose mechanic's lien, court held to have found by implication that specifications referred to in contract were not ones owner claimed were referred to.

The court found that no plans or specifications were attached to the contract, or otherwise identified at that time to the satisfaction of the court, except two outlines of the first floor plans, three exterior elevations, and an estimate sheet or budget which was basis for the contractor's guaranty, while the owner contended that the plans and specifications referred to consisted of some forty-two pages and included those found by the court to have been attached to the complaint.

Judgment will not be reversed for failure to make express finding on issue, if finding thereon is necessarily implied from findings made.

Error, if any, in failing to make further findings, held not reversible where, if more complete findings had been made, they would have been adverse to appellant.

Action by J. A. Wolvin, doing business under the firm name and style of J. A. Wolvin Company, against the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Pasadena. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Morin, Newell & Brown and Edward R Milliken, all of Pasadena, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien brought by the contractor against the owner for contractor's fee or commission and for the amount remaining unpaid for labor and material. The plaintiff had judgment, from which the defendant has appealed.

In January, 1922, the appellant, in contemplation of the erection of a church building, employed T. B. Barber as its architect, and thereafter in March, 1922, Barber conferred with respondent, describing in a general way the kind of building desired, and asked for assistance in arriving at an estimate of its cost, no written specifications having been made at this time. Barber had with him blueprints showing three of the floor plans and three elevations and a booklet, which showed a picture of the contemplated building. Thereafter, during the month of March, 1922, Barber and respondent made up an itemized statement of the cost of the building, setting out therein the various things which would be required in such construction, including a commission of $25,000 to be paid the contractor for his services, the total cost of the building including the said commission being estimated to be $470,000.

Respondent testified that on May 28, 1922, he had a conference with the members of the church board and at this conference he laid before them the itemized estimate theretofore prepared by himself and Barber. Some time later respondent was requested to submit his proposition to appellant for the construction of the building, and on June 27, 1922, he wrote a letter to appellant's board of directors in which he offered, in accordance with the plans and specifications prepared by Barber, to construct the church building at a guaranteed cost of $470,000, including therein a commission of $25,000 for his services as contractor, donating $5,000 of this commission to the church, and also stating in said letter that this price included $7,050, covering the premium on a bond, that this bond was unnecessary, as payment would be made each month for materials and labor furnished and suggesting that, instead of a bond, appellant should hold the said commission until the building was completed and accepted, thereby saving to appellant that sum of $7,050.

On July 12, 1922, respondent received a letter from Don C. Porter, who was chairman of appellant's building committee, accepting respondent's offer, as contained in his letter of June 27, 1922, and stating that respondent was duly employed to construct the church building on the terms and conditions stated in his said letter, and that he was authorized to proceed with said work after July 14, and that, if a more formal contract was desired, the same would be entered into after Barber, who was then absent, returned.

Respondent testified that on July 15th he received from Barber, the architect, plans for the foundation and basement for one-half of the building, and some specifications consisting of twelve pages, the said twelve pages of specifications being the ones attached to the complaint; that shortly after July 15, 1922, respondent began work on the foundation of said building and thereafter continued work of constructing said building. On August 26, 1922, appellant and respondent executed a written contract for the construction of the church building, by the terms of which respondent agreed to provide labor and material and do all things necessary to the proper construction and completion of the building, as shown and described in the drawings and specifications prepared by Thomas B. Barber, architect. He also guaranteed that the cost of such construction would not exceed the sum of $437,950, exclusive of respondent's commission for services, which was placed at the sum of $25,000, less a donation of $5,000 to the church. The contract also provided that the owner, through its architect, could make changes in the drawings and specifications and require additional work, but in the event any additions or alterations were made in the plans, thereby increasing the cost of the building, such cost should be added to the cost of the building.

There is a conflict in the evidence as to the particular drawing and specifications to which the contract referred, respondent maintaining that they were the ones attached to his complaint and consisted merely of rough and incomplete sketches, showing the alterations and incomplete floor plans, consisting of some twelve pages, which had been given him by the architect on July 15, 1922; while on the other hand, appellant contends that the drawing and specifications to which the contract referred, consisted of some forty-two pages and included the twelve pages attached to the complaint. Appellant also contends that the court erred in failing to find which set of drawings and specifications were referred to in the contract. The finding of the court was as follows: "The court finds that no plans or specifications were attached to the contract of August 22, 1922, or otherwise identified at that time to the satisfaction of the court, except the two outlines of the first floor plans. three exterior elevations and an estimate sheet or budget referred to, which while not attached to the contract, or otherwise authenticated by the parties was the basis for plaintiff's guarantee, and that the contract, so far as it mentioned a guarantee of the cost of the structure, was ambiguous, uncertain and incomplete and from the evidence offered the court finds that it was the intention of the parties, in the agreement of August 26th, wherein a guarantee of the cost of construction was involved, to guarantee the cost of such building respecting the material to be used and the character of the building to be constructed as the parties represented by the architect for the church and the plaintiff agreed upon prior to June 27th, 1922."

The respondent produced evidence to the effect that the plans and specifications which appellant claims were the ones referred to in the contract of August 26, were not exhibited to him at the time said contract was executed, nor were they attached to the said contract, nor did he have any knowledge of them until about the 12th of October, 1922, when they were brought to his notice.

[1, 2] While the court did not expressly find that the plans and specifications referred to in the second contract were not the ones claimed by appellant to have been referred to therein, it did by implication so find.

It is well established that a judgment will not be reversed because of a failure to make an express finding upon an issue, if the finding therein is necessarily implied from the findings made. 24 Cal. Jur. 974; Shepard v. Yale, 94 Cal. App. 104, 270 P. 742.

[3] The next contention of the appellant is that the court erred in permitting respondent to introduce, over its objection, evidence of the negotiations and transaction between the parties leading up to the execution of the contract of August 26th. This objection was based upon the well-recognized rule that when the terms of the agreement are reduced to writing, no evidence other than the contents of the writing is admissible. Code Civ. Proc. § 1856. Subdivision 1 of this section provides an exception to this rule as follows: "Where a mistake or imperfection of the writing is put in issue by the pleadings." The drawings and specifications to which the contract of August 26, 1922, referred, were not signed by the parties, nor did they bear any distinguishing mark by which they could be identified. The answer of appellant denied that the rough and incomplete drawings and specifications attached to the complaint were the ones to which said contract referred, but on the contrary alleged that drawings and specifications attached to appellant's answer were the ones to which reference was made therein, thereby putting in issue the question as to what drawings and specifications were referred to in said contract. Under these circumstances, evidence of the transactions between the parties leading up to the contract which tended to throw light upon this question was admissible.

The court found that appellant, by its architect, did not observe the limitations of the plans for the building, as contemplated on June 27, 1922, but departed therefrom in many respects, and that solely by reason of the departure of appellant from the agreed plans and material upon which respondent's guarantee was based, the cost of the structure was caused to run greatly in excess of the guarantee. And that no definite plans sufficient in character to enable the definite cost of the building to be ascertained, were furnished by appellant, or its architect, to respondent at any time on or prior to August 26, 1922, nor thereafter, except from time to time, as the building progressed and these findings are supported by the evidence.

The evidence produced on the part of respondent was to the effect that within a few days after he began work on the building, changes in the plans as then outlined, and additions thereto, began to be made and thereafter continued to be made until the building was almost completed, and that these changes and additions were responsible for the increased cost of the building. We are of the opinion that the offer of respondent of June 27, 1922, and the acceptance of such offer by appellant of July 12, 1922, constituted the contract upon which the guarantee of respondent was based.

The said offer of respondent that he would construct the building in strict accord with the plans and specifications prepared by the architect had reference to the drawing and estimate sheets which the architect had previous to that time prepared, and which had been exhibited to the appellant's building committee prior to said offer by respondent, for at that time there were no other plans and specifications of said building in existence, and, in accepting the said offer by the letter of July 12, 1922, appellant did so with knowledge that the only plans and specifications that had up to that time been prepared by its architect were the drawings and estimates that had been exhibited to them at their said meeting on May 28, 1922.

[4] Appellant maintains that the finding relating to its counterclaim is insufficient. This finding is as follows: "The court finds that the evidence fails to establish the allegations of defendant's counterclaim."

Admitting that this finding may be subject to criticism, yet from the facts found and the judgment ordered, it is evident, in the light of the entire record, that if more complete findings had been made, they would have been adverse to the contention of appellant. Such being the case, the failure to find further on this issue is not ground for reversal. Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 217 P. 750; Kling v. Gustafson, 101 Cal. App. 58, 281 P. 407; Reveal v. Stell, 56 Cal. App. 563, 205 P. 875.

[5] The evidence throughout the trial was conflicting, but it sufficiently supports the allegations of the complaint, its amendment and the findings, and such being the case, the judgment rendered thereon is binding on this court. 2 Cal. Jur. 921.

Appellant alleges that numerous other errors than those considered in this opinion were committed by the court in the trial of this case. We have examined these alleged errors and, in our opinion, none of them are sufficient to warrant a reversal.

Judgment affirmed.

All concur.

O. A. GRAYBEAL CO. v. COOK et al.

Civ. 4225.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Feb. 3, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 5, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 2, 1931.

1. Usury 🔑13.

"Forbearance," as applied to debt under Usury Law, means to wait, or abstain or desist from (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3, subd. 2).

> "Forbearance" would therefore mean a waiting to collect debt, or agreement to give further time, or not to insist on payment of debt at date of maturity.
> [Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Forbearance," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Usury 🔑13.

"Loan," to which Usury Law applies, ordinarily means contract whereby one delivers money to another, who agrees to return equivalent sum (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3, subd. 2).

> "Loan" is also defined as the delivery by one person and receipt by the other of a given sum of money, upon an agreement, express or implied, to repay sum lent, with or without interest.
> [Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Loan," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Usury 🔑13.

Where parties intend that one shall deliver money to another, who agrees to return equivalent sum, transaction will be considered loan within Usury Law, irrespective of form (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3, subd. 2).

4. Usury 🔑12.

When form of transaction does not disclose loan, and therefore does not explicitly violate Usury Law, question whether usurious intent exists becomes material (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3, subd. 2).

5. Usury 🔑142(4).

To recover usury penalty, where contract is fair on face, clear and satisfactory evidence is necessary (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3, subd. 2).

6. Pleading 🔑237(6).

If amended complaint to recover usury penalty was defective in not alleging dates of maturity of notes, refusing amendment conforming to evidence was abuse of discretion.

7. Principal and agent 🔑92(2).

Where agent is authorized to receive payment, payment to agent is payment to principal as matter of law.

8. Usury 🔑140.

That borrower is corporation does not preclude it from recovering statutory usury penalty (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3, subd. 2).

9. Usury 🔑26.

That mortgagor, after persuading third person to take assignment of notes and mortgage, guaranteed payment of notes, did not necessarily constitute usurious loan, but was circumstance to be considered (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3, subd. 2).

10. Usury 🔑26.

Respecting usurious intent, technical insufficiency of alleged borrower's guaranty of notes, which were assigned to lender by original holder, did not diminish evidential value of guaranty (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3, subd. 2).

11. Usury 🔑117.

Evidence supported finding that transaction wherein mortgagor paid bonus to third persons, inducing them to take assignment of notes and mortgage, and to perform other services, was not loan, precluding recovery of usury penalty (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3, subd. 2).

> Evidence disclosed that mortgagor desired to subdivide land into lots, and had already entered into contracts for deeds with various purchasers; that mortgagee refused to join in filing and recording of subdivision map, or to release lots from mortgage lien to enable mortgagor to give deeds; that brokers procured defendants, who agreed to advance necessary moneys and take assignment of notes and mortgage for bonus of $50,000, of which $37,500 was to be distributed among defendants, who testified that transaction was not loan, but merely purchase of notes and mortgage, with agreement to join in recording subdivision map and to release lots as sold.

12. Usury 🔑26.

That third person, if holder is willing, buys note at discount, is not usurious transaction, irrespective of third person's profit (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3, subd. 2).

13. Usury 🔑13.

Under finding that transaction was not loan, mere payment of bonus by mortgagor, to induce third persons to purchase notes and mortgage, was not violation of Usury Law (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3, subd. 2).

14. Appeal and error ⚷1071(3).

Where judgment rests on justifiable finding, which is only finding necessary to support judgment, fact that other findings are unsupported by evidence is immaterial.

15. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1).

Finding on conflicting testimony is conclusive (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a).

16. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1).

Appellate court, although believing preponderance of evidence favors unsuccessful plaintiff, is not justified in setting aside judge's findings and drawing others based on plaintiff's testimony (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a).

PER CURIAM.

This cause is before us on appeal from a judgment entered in favor of the defendants in an action where the plaintiff sought to recover a penalty, as provided by the second subdivision of section 3 of the Initiative Act, adopted at the general election, held on November 5, 1918, covering the subject of usury. Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, part 1, p. 1384, Act 3757.

By reason of the fact that the findings of the trial court simply negative the allegations of plaintiff's amended complaint, it is necessary to summarize the different paragraphs set forth in said complaint.

The first and second paragraphs of the complaint are undenied and uncontroverted. The second paragraph of the complaint sets forth that certain premises owned by the plaintiff were incumbered by notes and mortgage in the aggregate sum of $267,380; that the notes and mortgage to secure the same were held and owned by the Associated Oil Company. The third paragraph alleges that the plaintiff desired to borrow the sum of $250,000 for the purpose of paying off and having said notes and mortgage satisfied, that the plaintiff was able to pay the sum of $20,000, or thereabouts, on said notes, leaving the sum of $250,000 to be raised by the loan. The fourth paragraph sets forth that on or about the month of June, 1924, the defendants promised and agreed to loan to the plaintiff the sum of $250,000 and to accept as security therefor a mortgage on said tract of land, the mortgage on said land to be paid off and satisfied; that the plaintiff was to pay the defendants' interest on said sum of $250,000 at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum; that the plaintiff accepted all of the terms and conditions of said promise and agreement on the part of the defendants, and to furnish the difference between the $250,000 and the amount necessary to pay the sum of $267,380 due to the Associated Oil Company.

The fifth paragraph sets forth that after said promise and agreement on the part of the plaintiff and the defendants, and while proceeding to consummate the deal, the defendants informed the plaintiff that, because of contracts for the sale of portions of said land, having been executed by the plaintiff and which were then in force, said contract should become a first lien on said tract of land, or portions thereof, with priority over the new mortgage to be given by the plaintiff to the defendants; that it was then agreed between the defendants and the plaintiff that, instead of the plaintiff executing a new mortgage on said tract of land to secure said sum of $250,000, the plaintiff should have assigned to the defendants, as security for said loan of $250,000, said notes and mortgage then on said tract of land. The sixth paragraph sets forth that in pursuance of said agreement the plaintiff proceeded to negotiate with and to secure from Associated Oil Company an assignment of said mortgage and notes to the defendants; said Associated Oil Company to be paid in full the entire amount then due on said notes and mortgage; that in addition to the sum of $250,000 then due on said mortgage, there was due a further sum of $22,593.79; that at the request of the defendants, the transaction between the plaintiff and the defendants was placed with and intrusted to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach in escrow; said Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach being named and selected by the defendants as their trustee and agent and authorized and instructed to receive and accept said matter in escrow and to act therein as agent and trustee of the defendants.

The seventh paragraph of the complaint sets forth that, pursuant to said promise and agreement, the defendants deposited and placed in escrow with said Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach the sum of $250,000, and the plaintiff deposited with said

Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach the sum of $22,593.79, said bank being instructed to pay the same to the Associated Oil Company for the transfer and assignment of said notes and mortgage; that said notes and mortgage were assigned and transferred to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach. The eighth paragraph of the complaint sets forth that, as a condition upon which the defendants would loan to the plaintiff the sum of $250,000, the defendants would require that plaintiff guarantee the payment of said notes and the performance of all the conditions contained in the mortgage.

Paragraph 9 of the complaint sets forth that, in the instructions executed by the plaintiff and the defendants and given to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach, the defendants authorized and directed said Marine Trust & Savings Bank to act for them as their agent and trustee, to receive payment from the plaintiff of said loan of $250,000, and to pay the same to defendants, and likewise authorized and directed said bank to execute a declaration of trust, specifying that it held the title to such notes and mortgage for the benefit of defendants, stating the amount of the beneficial interest therein of each defendant.

The tenth paragraph of the complaint sets forth that, during the negotiations for said loan, the defendants demanded the further sum of $50,000 as a fee or bonus for loaning said money, together with an agreement to pay interest on said $250,000, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum (being an increase of ½ of 1 per cent., the notes and mortgage called for only 6½ per cent.). The eleventh paragraph sets out that, at the time of the negotiations, the financial condition of the plaintiff was such that it was required to yield to the demands of the defendants to pay the additional sum of $50,000.

The twelfth paragraph of the complaint sets forth that, after the defendants had agreed to loan the plaintiff the sum of $250,000, it was agreed that the plaintiff should execute a second mortgage on the property to secure the $50,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and that the plaintiff at that time did execute a note and mortgage for said sum of $50,000 to secure the payment of said sum to the defendants; that this mortgage was executed to the defendants Wm. M. Cook and W. E. Babb, for and on behalf of the defendants, and was assigned by them to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach. The thirteenth paragraph of plaintiff's complaint sets forth the payment of the $250,000, the $50,000, and the interest thereon.

The fourteenth paragraph sets forth that the defendants knowingly and intentionally exacted and demanded of the plaintiff as a bonus and consideration of said loan of $250,000, as aforesaid, that the plaintiff pay the sum of $50,000 and interest thereon, which amounted to the sum of $2,632.21, and that such payments were all made to secure the satisfaction of the notes and mortgage assigned by the Associated Oil Company to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach, as aforesaid. The fifteenth paragraph sets forth, among other things, that payment of said $50,000 and interest thereon was without any consideration, and for the express intent and purpose on the part of the defendants to compel the plaintiff to pay an unlawful and usurious rate of interest for the loan to it by the defendants of said sum of $250,000. After setting forth the detailed amount of interest paid and penalty alleged to be usurious, the plaintiff prays that the same be trebled, and sets forth the amount claimed in the sum of $198,021.75.

The findings filed by the trial court are as follows: Findings Nos. 1 and 2 are to the effect that paragraphs 1 and 2 of the amended complaint are true. Findings Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6 are to the effect that paragraphs 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the plaintiff's complaint are untrue. Finding No. 7 is that all of the allegations of paragraph 7 of plaintiff's complaint are untrue, except that the sum of $272,593.79 was paid by said Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach to the Associated Oil Company, and that, in consideration thereof, the said Associated Oil Company assigned and transferred to said Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach the notes and mortgage referred to in the complaint. Finding No. 8 is simply that paragraph 8 of plaintiff's complaint, and all the allegations thereof, are untrue. Finding No. 9 is to the effect that all of paragraph 9 of the plaintiff's complaint is untrue, save and except that it is true that in the written escrow instructions to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank, which were severally executed by the several defendants, said Marine Trust & Savings Bank was authorized and directed to execute a declaration of trust specifying that it held title to the notes and mortgage for the benefit of the several defendants, and that it should thereafter issue certificates of beneficial interest to each of the defendants and collect the payments to be made, and as made disburse the same quarterly to the several defendants or their respective assignees. Finding No. 10 is to the effect that all of paragraph 10 of plaintiff's complaint is untrue. Finding No. 11 is simply to the effect that all of paragraph 11 of plaintiff's complaint is untrue. Finding No. 12 is to the effect that all of paragraph 12 of the plaintiff's complaint, save and except that plaintiff did execute a note for the sum of $50,000 and a mortgage on said property to secure the same with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum to Wm. M. Cook and W. E. Babb as payees thereof, and that said Cook and Babb did assign said note and mortgage to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank as trustee for the several defendants, is untrue. Finding No. 13 is to the effect that all of paragraph 13 of plaintiff's complaint is untrue, save and except that prior to the commencement of this action the plaintiff paid to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach as trustee for the several defendants the sum of $250,000, together with interest thereon in the sum of $13,375.12, and, also, the further sum of $50,000, with interest thereon, in the sum of $2,632.21, and that, upon the payment of said sums, said notes and mortgage were satisfied and released. Finding No. 14 is to the effect that all of the allegations of paragraph 14 of plaintiff's complaint are untrue. Finding No. 15 is likewise to the effect that all of the allegations of paragraph 15 of plaintiff's complaint are untrue.

As a conclusion of law from the foregoing findings, the court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything from the defendants, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The record shows sufficient testimony to justify the finding of the following facts: That prior to the opening of the negotiations involved in this action in 1924, the O. A. Graybeal Company was a corporation, of which Graybeal, Miller, and Lindsay comprised the executive officers. The company was at that time the owner of a large tract of land, which it had purchased for the purpose of subdividing and reselling the same in city lots. This land was subject to an existing mortgage which had been executed by George H. Peck, a previous owner, to secure three promissory notes aggregating $267,380. These notes matured as follows: One in October, 1924, one in October, 1925, and one in October, 1926. The notes and mortgage were held by the Associated Oil Company. The notes drew interest at the rate of 6½ per cent. per annum. The mortgage contained no provision requiring the mortgagee to join in subdividing the premises, nor was there any release clause in the mortgage. The appellant had surveyed the land, subdivided it into lots and streets, and had prepared for filing and recordation a map of such subdivision. Up to this time the Associated Oil Company had refused to join in the filing and recording of the map.

Likewise no agreement had been entered into or arrangement made for the release of any of the lots from the mortgage. Appellant, however, had proceeded and sold upon contract lots according to such unrecorded map; the value at which the lots were so sold aggregated about $650,000. Many of the contracts upon such lots had been and were being paid up by the purchasers, who were demanding deeds which appellant was unable to give them because of its inability to record its map and to procure a release of the lots from the mortgage. The real estate commissioner of California was investigating the situation. The urgency was, therefore, very great that some one be found either to loan the money to the appellant with which to pay off the Peck notes and mortgage, or who would purchase the Peck notes and mortgage and take an assignment thereof from the Associated Oil Company, and, also, to find some one who would join in the immediate filing and recording of the subdivision map and to enter into a plan for the acceptance of partial payments and the release of lots from the lien of the mortgage. In this contingency Graybeal and Miller, and a man by the name of Senter, took up with Cook and Babb, real estate dealers and investment brokers, having an office in Long Beach, the proposition of refinancing.

According to the testimony of Babb and Cook, the proposition was to employ them as agents or brokers to procure a purchaser or purchasers for the Peck notes and mortgage, who would be willing to accept installment payments, agree to the filing and recording of the plat or map of the subdivision and the release of lots. After one or two interviews, Cook stated that they had just completed an arduous season and were about to take their vacations, that the job was a difficult one, but, if they would "make it easy enough for them, they would undertake it," explaining that, by "making it easy enough for them," he would want the sum of $50,000 to handle the deal, that of this sum $2,500 would be paid to Senter, that Babb and Cook would want $10,000 for their commission, and that the remainder of the $50,000, to wit, $37,500, would probably have to be prorated among the purchasers of the Peck notes as an inducement to persuade them to produce such a large sum of money, and to agree to receive back their money "in small dribs," and to join in the subdivision map and the execution of partial releases. To this there is testimony to the effect that Graybeal and Miller stated they would be glad to pay $50,000 for this service, as they expected to make between $750,000 to $800,000 out of the deal. Babb and Cook then asked for time to investigate, and proposed that an option be executed giving Babb and Cook time within which to find purchasers for the Peck notes, the option providing for the payment of said sum of $50,000. Some discussion also took place at these conferences as to the extension of time upon the Peck notes, and it appears that an arrangement was made by which Babb and Cook were to advance the necessary sums of money to make payment for extensions if so requested. No advances of this kind were made, however, by Babb and Cook. The several conferences resulted in the following conclusion: The different defendants mentioned in this action paid to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach the necessary money to make up the $250,000. The plaintiff paid to said bank the additional sum of $22,592.79. These amounts, aggregating $272,592.79, were paid to the Associated Oil Company and the notes and mortgage assigned to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank of Long Beach. Trust agreements and declarations were executed as hereinbefore stated showing that the bank was acting as trustee and agent for the respective parties, to receive payment from the plaintiff and to disburse such payments to the defendants in this action in proportion to their respective interests. In due course of time, as herein stated, the Peck notes and the $50,000 note to Babb and Cook, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, were paid by the plaintiff to the bank and the bank released the Peck mortgage.

On the part of the appellant, as alleged in its amended complaint, it is claimed that application was made to Babb and Cook for a loan, and that the transaction took the form of a purchase of the Peck notes and assignment of the mortgage securing the same simply to evade the provisions of the Initiative Act defining usury.

On the part of the respondents it is insisted that the subject of loan was never mentioned, that it was never considered by any of the defendants, that it was a straight purchase of the Peck notes and assignment of the mortgage securing the same, and that the $50,000 covered by the note and second mortgage given to Babb and Cook assigned to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank was simply a bonus or gratuity to induce them to enter the syndicate formed for purchasing the Peck notes and mortgage and for the agreement to release lots from the lien of the Peck mortgage, as full payments were made thereon by the different purchasers.

The trial court, in its findings, did not directly characterize the transaction as being either a loan or a purchase, did not find whether the Peck notes were discounted, or whether a bonus or gratuity was paid by the plaintiff. All that the trial court did find was that the transaction did not amount to a loan. In other words, the findings of the trial court are to the effect that the allegations of the plaintiff's amended complaint, in so far as it sets forth a loan, are untrue. While a number of issues are presented to this court for consideration, there is only one vital question, to wit: Was the transaction, so far as the defendants are concerned, a purchase of the Peck notes and mortgage, or was it a loan in the form of a purchase?

[1-3] The Usury Act to which we have referred fixes a penalty only to a loan or forbearance of money, etc. There is no pretense in this case that there was any forbearance. The word "forbearance" means, according to 26 C. J. 794, "to abstain or desist from; to give up, a term which is equivalent to 'wait,'" when used in reference to a debt. In other words, it would mean a waiting to collect a debt or to agree not to insist upon payment at the date of maturity of the debt or to give further time. Nothing of that kind appears in the case, so it may not be further mentioned. The word "loan" as defined in 38 C. J., page 126, ordinarily means the following: "A contract by which one delivers a sum of money to another and the latter agrees to return at a future time a sum equivalent to that which he borrows; the delivery by one party and the receipt by the other party of a given sum of money, upon an agreement, express or implied, to repay the sum loaned, with or without interest." If such is the intent of the parties, the transaction will be considered a loan without regard to its form.

[4, 5] When the form of the transaction does not show a loan, and, therefore, does not explicitly exhibit a violation of the Usury Law, the question of intent becomes material. Thus the note found in Ann. Cas., 1913C, page 1327, is pertinent: "'There are two cardinal rules in the doctrine of usury,' said the court in Nichols v. Fearson, 7 Pet. 103, 8 L. Ed. 623, 'which we think must be regarded as the commonplace to which all reasoning and adjudication upon the subject should be referred. The first is, that to constitute usury there must be a loan in contemplation by the parties; and the second, that a contract which in its inception is unaffected by usury can never be invalidated by any subsequent usurious transaction.'" It is then said that, when a thing is valid in its inception, the fact "that a promissory note which is sold at a discount exceeding the lawful rate of interest is indorsed by the seller does not make the transaction usurious, if the sale is made bona fide, and not as a cover for a loan." In 39 Cyc. page 922, the rule relating to the subject of intention, supported by a long list of authorities, is thus set forth: "But when a contract is honest on its face, proof of the existence of a corrupt intention to evade the usury laws is important as showing that the transaction is really a cloak to disguise usurious dealing, just as good faith and absence of such a corrupt intent will justify the court in upholding a transaction suspicious on its face." And on page 1057 and 1058 of the same volume, we find the text likewise supported by a number of authorities, reading as follows: "When a transaction honest in form is alleged to be a mere cloak to cover usury, the existence of the corrupt usurious intent behind the device is a question for the jury. * * * It is for the jury to determine whether a usurious purpose lurks behind what purports to be a sale of property, or a note legal on its face but given for a larger sum than was actually advanced upon it, or commissions purporting to be paid to the lender or his agent for services rendered or expenses incurred in connection with the loan." And, as stated in the text, "it is only when there is no dispute as to the facts, the question whether such facts constitute usury is a question of law to be determined by the courts." To the same effect is the text found in 27 Ruling Case Law, pages 211 and 212. The rule is likewise well established, and set forth in Houghton v. Burden, 228 U. S. 161, 33 S. Ct. 491, 57 L. Ed. 780, to wit: "The defense of usury to a suit upon a contract fair on its face must be established by clear and satisfactory evidence." This rule is likewise applied to the proofs necessary to be made by a plaintiff when prosecuting an action for the recovery of a penalty under the usury laws.

[6] A few minor objections raised by the respondents affecting the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action may be here considered. The first objection is that the complaint does not set forth facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The clerk's record fails to disclose that there was any demurrer filed to the plaintiff's amended complaint. In behalf of this objection, it is urged by the respondents that no date is set forth as to the maturity of the three notes held and owned by the Associated Oil Company and assigned to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank. The record, however, establishes these facts: No special demurrer was directed, as we have said, to this technical deficiency in the amended complaint. Assuming that the amended complaint was defective in this particular, it was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court to refuse to permit the plaintiff to file an amendment to its complaint conforming to the proofs. An examination of the proposed amendment to the plaintiff's complaint shows that the dates of maturity of the notes were specifically set forth.

[7] It is likewise objected that the testimony does not show payment of the notes and the interest thereon to the defendants in this case. The agreement which we have hereinbefore referred to executed by the respective parties named the bank as a trustee to hold the notes for and on behalf of the defendants. The trustee was authorized to receive payments and cancel the notes and mortgage, and, as payments were made from time to time to distribute such payments to the respective defendants, according to their interests. This agreement constituted, in law, the bank the agent to receive payment for and on behalf of the defendants. It can hardly be questioned that, when the principal appoints an agent and authorizes him to receive payment for and on behalf of the principal, that payment has been made to the principal as a matter of law, when made to the agent.

[8] It is likewise urged by the respondents that the Usury Law does not apply to corporate borrowers, and, in support of this contention, the case of In re Washer, 200 Cal. 598, 254 P. 951, is cited. A reading of this case clearly demonstrates that this contention is untenable. We are not dealing with any note issued and sold by any corporate power. The provisions in the Usury Law relative to the issuance and sale of corporate securities are not involved in this case, and the contention of the respondents in this particular appears to be entirely without merit.

Likewise presented for our consideration is the minor subject of the guaranty called for in the agreements and executed on behalf of the plaintiff guaranteeing the payment of the three notes assigned by the Associated Oil Company to the Marine Trust & Savings Bank. On the part of the appellant three cases are cited which support the rule that, when notes are transferred under circumstances similar to those presented here, and a guaranty of payment is demanded and executed, the transaction takes on the character of and is therefore held in law to be a loan. Supporting this rule are the cases of Campbell v. Reed, Mart. & Y. (Tenn.) 392, and others noted. However, this case appears to be overruled by the case of Cantrell v. Ford (Tenn. Ch. App.) 46 S. W. 581. In Cowles v. McVickar, 3 Wis. 725, the rule contended for by the appellant is upheld. Likewise in Sedbury v. Duffy, 158 N. C. 432, 74 S. E. 355, the giving of a guaranty is held to transmute the transaction into a loan. All the other cases cited by the appellant are really contrary to the rule contended for.

[9, 10] As opposed to the three cases supporting the appellant's contention, the authorities are so numerous as to preclude their citation. These authorities generally follow the rule as found in Lloyd v. Keach, 2 Conn. 175, 7 Am. Dec. 256, 257, and approved in Belden v. Lamb, 17 Conn. 441; Brittin v. Freeman, 2 Har. (17 N. J. Law) 191; Cram v. Hendricks, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 569; Nichols v. Fearson, 7 Pet. 103, 8 L. Ed. 623, and Dickerman v. Day, 31 Iowa, 444, 7 Am. Rep. 156, that the giving of a guaranty is simply an item of testimony or evidence which the trial court may consider in determining whether the transaction is in fact a loan, or, what it purports to be, a purchase and sale of a negotiable instrument. In this connection, it is urged by the respondents that the instrument executed as and purporting to be a guaranty of payment of the Peck notes is defective, and is not an instrument capable of being enforced. As bearing upon the question of intent, we do not very well see how any technical insufficiency of the instrument executed as a guaranty can be considered and determined upon this appeal, or how it could be determined by the trial court in the trial of this action. As bearing upon the question of intent, and in determining what the court should hold the transaction to be, a guaranty would have exactly the same effect, even though its technical legal sufficiency might be open to question.

[11] As we view the circumstances presented upon this appeal, there is but one crucial question, to wit: Does the evidence support the finding of the court that the transaction was not a loan? As we have heretofore stated, there is no finding in specific language that the transaction was a purchase and sale of the Peck notes. The finding is simply to the effect that the allegations of the complaint that the transaction was a loan are untrue. If the testimony of the appellants' witnesses, taken in connection with the surrounding circumstances of the transaction, the apparent fact that the bonus or fee exacted by Babb and Cook to make the negotiations "easy," and the division of $37,500 among the several defendants, according to their interests in the syndicate formed to take over the Peck notes, as a gratuity or bonus for the putting up of the money to take over the Peck loan be weighed in the balance, and the finding made by the trial court that the transaction was really a loan, and was taken in the form of a purchase and sale as a covert contrivance to evade the provisions of the Usury Law, it cannot very well be denied that such a finding would have been well supported by the testimony set forth in the record in this case. On the other hand, if the testimony introduced on the part of the plaintiff be disregarded and set aside, and the testimony on the part of the defendants and given by the defendants, when examined by the plaintiff under the provisions of section 2055 Code of Civil Procedure, be accepted as a true version of the transaction then, and in that case, we think the record shows sufficient testimony to support the finding of the court that the transaction was not a loan.

A large number of authorities have been cited by respective counsel to the effect that the holder or owner of a negotiable instrument may sell and discount the same for any sum or price he may be willing to accept, and, though it gives to the purchaser a rate of interest largely in excess of 12 per cent. per annum, the transaction is not usurious; that is, when a negotiable instrument has been given legal inception, its sale and purchase is subject to the law relating to the sale of ordinary personal property, that is, the seller may sell for what he is willing to take and the purchaser may buy for the least sum the seller will accept. In this case, however, there is no question of discount. The Associated Oil Company received full payment for the three notes.

The testimony of Cook and Babb is to the effect that the only subject ever discussed was that of sale and purchase of the Peck notes and mortgage, that the subject of loan was not mentioned.

Mr. Craig, one of the defendants, testified substantially as follows:

"Q. What was said at that conversation? A. He told me that he wanted to raise $250,000 to buy a mortgage, and told me what the mortgage was.

"Q. What did he say about the mortgage? A. He said it was a mortgage that was backing up some notes of Mr. Peck's on land on Western avenue, and he said there was a $50,000—he said that the parties owning the land could not get releases; the mortgage was held by the oil company and they would not give partial releases, and he had to have releases because he had sold lots, and they were getting paid up, and he had to produce his deeds, and that if we bought the mortgage he was willing to pay a $50,000 bonus for getting the release of these lots in small portions—release of small amounts of land as he sold the lots.

"Q. Was the subject of loaning any money to the owner of that land discussed by you or Mr. Cook in that conversation? A. The only thing discussed with me was buying this mortgage."

The witness further testified that the only intent he had in the matter was to buy the Peck notes and mortgage. The witness further testified that he understood there was to be a payment for the release of the lots, that he was told the bonus amounted to $50,000, that he understood Babb and Cook were to retain the sum of $12,500.

The defendant Bixby testified that he had never seen Mr. Graybeal until he saw him in the courtroom, and then testified as follows: "Q. Referring to the time of the transaction, at that time was this transaction ever mentioned to you in the form of making a loan to the O. A. Graybeal Company, or any other corporation, upon the land? A. No, it was simply us going in with others and buying the mortgage." The witness Bixby further testified: "This mortgage, the Peck mortgage, was to be purchased; that the purchasers were to agree to give partial releases as requested by the O. A. Graybeal Company upon a schedule to be arranged; that $50,000 was to be paid for granting—extending this privilege of releasing—making partial releases, and that the $50,000 was to be secured by a second mortgage, and when a lot was to be released from the first mortgage it was also to be released from the second mortgage on certain payments."

The witness Babb testified that the subject of making a loan to the Graybeal Company was not discussed. His version is as follows: "They came into our office by appointment. They said they had—what I mean by that, I don't know which one said it on their side in particular—but they said they had bought a tract of land up there that had a mortgage on it and sold lots in which they could not get satisfactory releases from the parties holding the mortgage, and wanted to know if we could get someone or several persons who would participate in the purchase of the mortgage and would give them partial releases. We told them what we would handle the proposition for, to-wit: the sum of $50,000."

Cook and Babb both denied the testimony introduced by Graybeal to the effect that during the conversations relative to the negotiations it was stated that it should be put in such a form as to escape the usury laws, or, as worded by the witness, "to make that part legal which in law was illegal", or to "legitimize an illegitimate transaction."

The testimony of Cook was to the effect that Graybeal and Miller came to him and asked him to handle the transaction, to find purchasers for the Peck notes, and that he would handle the transaction for the sum of $50,000. The language of the witness, as set forth in the supplement, is as follows: "I said to them that I was leaving on my vacation on the 19th of July, and that it was a very short period in which to accomplish the transaction they were asking me to accomplish, but if they wanted to make it easy enough for me to do it, or for us to do it, that we would look into the thing and see whether we could recommend it or not. Up to that time we had not seen the property and knew nothing of its value except what they had told us. One or the other of them asked me what I meant by 'making it easy enough', and I told them that it would cost them $50,000. I told them $2,500 would be for Mr. Senter. I told Miller and Graybeal that we would want $10,000 as a fee for our efforts in the enterprise and that the balance of $37,500 would be used in payment to those who would invest in the mortgage in consideration of their taking their money back in small dribs from time to time and granting the partial releases on rather favorable terms. * * * One or the other of them said, 'that is all right. We are making $750,000 or $800,000 in this deal, and we are glad to pay the $50,000 to get it in the shape we want to.'"

Without going into the testimony in further detail or set it out in this opinion, it is sufficient to say that the testimony of all of the defendants is to the effect that the $50,000 exacted as a fee by Babb and Cook, after deducting the sum of $12,500, was distributed among the defendants in proportion to their contribution to the general fund necessary to buy the Peck notes and mortgage, as a bonus for making the purchase. The testimony, in relation to the release of the respective lots as they were paid off by purchasers, establishes the fact that partial payments were to be made upon the notes from time to time, as purchasers of lots made their payments. The testimony also shows that the costs of executing the releases were otherwise provided for, which costs were, in fact, only nominal.

Having been found by the court not to be a loan, is it permissible for one against whose land there exists an indebtedness, evidenced by promissory notes secured by mortgage, to offer to or pay a bonus or gratuity to a purchaser in order to induce him to purchase a certain note or notes and mortgage, and agree to perform services not provided for in the original mortgage, such as the release of a portion of the mortgaged premises from time to time? Upon this question the authorities are almost negligible.

The only cases called to our attention bearing upon this subject are the following, and a diligent search fails to disclose any others. In Siewert v. Hamel et al., 91 N. Y. 199, the holding of the court is as follows (We quote for convenience from the syllabus.): "The purchase of a debt by one at the instance of the debtor for less than its face, the debtor himself with the knowledge of the purchaser paying the creditor the discount, is not per se usury. It must be made to appear that the transaction originated in an agreement for a loan, as there can be no usury disconnected with a loan." In the case at bar, the Peck notes and mortgage are entirely free from any imputation of usury. See, also, Lesley v. Johnson, 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 359; also, Donnington v. Meeker, 3 Stockt. (11 N. J. Eq.) 362.

[12, 13] The law is well settled that the defendants in this case, had the Associated Oil Company been wiling, could have purchased the Peck notes at a discount, irrespective of the amount of money earned by them through such a transaction. This being true, we do not well perceive how it could be held upon this appeal, in face of the finding of the court that the transaction was not a loan, that the mere payment of a bonus or gratuity on the part of the appellant to the defendants, in order to induce them to purchase the notes and mortgage, can be held to be a violation of the Usury Law to which we have referred.

[14] Another contention is made by the appellant not heretofore considered, to wit: That a number of allegations of the plaintiff's amended complaint found to be untrue by the court are true in fact and established by uncontradicted evidence and, therefore, that the judgment should be reversed. This, however, is not a tenable position. If the judgment rests upon a finding supported by sufficient testimony, and the only finding necessary to support the judgment, the fact that there are other findings not supported by the testimony becomes immaterial. As stated in Thayer v. Tyler, 169 Cal. 671, 673, 147 P. 979, 980, "it is only when a judgment rests for its validity upon a finding which is not supported, or which negatives a fact admitted by the pleadings, that injury is worked and a reversal must follow"—citing a number of cases.

[15, 16] Only one finding in this case is absolutely necessary for the support of the judgment, to wit, that the transaction was not a loan. This the court has found. The finding of the trial court against the contention of the appellant upon conflicting testimony is binding upon appeal. Had the court found the transaction to be a loan, a simple computation would show its usurious character, and, if we were to agree that the evidence preponderates in favor of its contention, we would not be justified in setting aside the findings of the trial court and drawing findings of our own, based upon the appellant's testimony, as contended by it. under the provisions of section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The judgment is affirmed.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by Sarah L. Burtt, as executrix of the last will and testament of George L. Burtt, deceased, against the Bank of California National Association, as executor of the last will and testament of Edith L. Bull, deceased, and others, in which defendants filed cross-complaint. From judgment on the cross-complaint for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Thomas A. Keogh, John T. Thornton, Dozier & Kimball, and Dreher & McClellan, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

T. C. Van Ness and Hartley F. Peart, both of San Francisco (John D. Gallaher, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

WASTE, C. J.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages in the sum of $5,427.14, alleged to have been occasioned to certain onions when the building in which they were stored collapsed. While the complaint contains averments of misrepresentation in the letting of the building, plaintiff's principal theory appears to be that the collapse of the structure is traceable to its noncompliance with the building laws. The defendants, owners and lessors of the building, denied the material allegations of the complaint, and cross-complained for damages, alleging that the collapse of the building was due solely and proximately to the plaintiff's negligence in overloading it. From a judgment on the cross-complaint for $8,028.95, with interest and costs, the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal, contending that the building was an illegal structure and a nuisance per se, and that the defendants are therefore liable as a matter of law for all damages resulting to plaintiff, regardless of any question of negligence or misrepresentation as to the soundness of the building.

The respondents' evidence tends to show that on or about September 30, 1920, the appellant contacted their agent relative to the leasing of the two-story structure here involved, stating that he had twenty-five carloads of onions he would like to store immediately, as he was required to remove them from the docks without delay. Respondents' agent, being uncertain as to the ability of the structure to carry the weight of such a quantity of onions, stated he would seek the advice and opinion of the board of public works as to the carrying capacity of the building. Upon inquiry there, he was informed that the building was sufficiently strong to carry twenty-five carloads of onions if they were properly stacked and distributed. This information was transmitted to the appellant, who had already commenced storing the onions. Thereafter, and without respondents' knowledge, appellant stored forty-three carloads of onions in the building. On two distinct occasions prior to the collapse of the structure the ground floor began to sag, but appellant failed to notify the respondents or their agent of this fact until, finally, the first and second floors of the building gave way under the excessive weight, causing the damage to the building for which respondents recovered the judgment appealed from. Among other witnesses, the respondents called a qualified structural engineer, who testified that in his opinion twenty-five carloads of onions could have been safely stored in the building without unduly stressing or straining its joists or girders.

Upon this and other competent evidence produced by the respondents, the trial court found that the building was at all times entirely adequate and fit for the storage of a reasonable number of carloads of onions, namely, twenty-five carloads, the amount appellant stated he intended storing; that respondents did not make any false or untrue statements concerning the building for the purpose of inducing appellant to enter into the lease, nor did they represent that the building was in good or sound condition or suitable for appellant's purposes; that before entering into the lease the appellant personally examined and inspected the building; that, acting upon his own initiative and judgment, appellant negligently and without respondents' consent stored an excessive and unreasonable quantity of onions in the building; and that the subsequent collapse of the building was without fault on the part of the respondents and was due solely and proximately to appellant's careless and negligent storing of an unreasonable and excessive quantity of onions.

[1, 2] These findings, founded as they are on substantial evidence, will permit of no judgment other than one for the respondents on their cross-complaint. And this is so even if we assume, without deciding, that the building, as urged by appellant, was not constructed as required by law, for there is no finding that any weakness or defect in the construction of the building caused or contributed in any way to its collapse. The principle that a violation of a statute or ordinance is negligence per se is subject to the limitation that the act or omission must proximately cause or contribute to the injury in order to bar a recovery. Skaggs v. Wiley (Cal. App.) 292 P. 132; Dewhirst v. Leopold, 194 Cal. 424, 431, 229 P. 30; Williams v. Southern Pac. Co., 173 Cal. 525, 539, 540, 160 P. 660; 19 Cal. Jur. 636, § 67. Even though the structure failed to comply with the building laws, the trial court might reasonably conclude, as it did, that the sole proximate cause of the damage to the onions and building was appellant's negligence in unreasonably and excessively overloading the building, and that such injury and damage would have resulted from such overloading even if the structure had satisfied all building law requirements. The question was one for the trial court under all the circumstances, and we cannot say that its finding that the accident was directly traceable to and was the sole and proximate result of appellant's negligence, in unreasonably and excessively overloading the building, is without support in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHENK, J.

By information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county the defendant was charged with the murder, on February 21, 1930, of his wife Vera Gingell, in the first count, and of Sigurd Bjorneby, in the second count. The jury returned a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree on each count, and in each verdict fixed the extreme penalty. From the judgment on each verdict, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant presents this appeal.

The defendant and Vera Ramsey were married at Portland, Or., on December 24, 1919. In 1924 they moved to Los Angeles, where they resided together as husband and wife until June 5, 1926, when the defendant departed for Washington, D. C., where he had formerly lived, his wife following him to that city in November of the same year, and they resided there for three years. In November, 1929, the wife left Washington, D. C., by train to New York, thence by boat to New Orleans, thence by train to Los Angeles. Because of lack of funds the defendant did not accompany his wife, but proceeded later by stage, arriving in Los Angeles on January 18, 1930. He registered at the Hayward Hotel and telephoned his wife, who was living at 253 South Lake street with Jean Chappelear, a friend under whom, as a department manager, the wife had worked as a saleslady in a department store during her former residence at Los Angeles. According to the defendant's testimony he was without funds to rent an apartment for himself and wife, so he rented a room for himself at 1039 South Hope street. He continued to live at that place until the night of the tragedy. He had known Jean Chappelear in the former years of his residence at Los Angeles and was dissatisfied with his wife's living with her. He had heard rumors that his wife was attending parties and going out with other men, whereupon he proceeded to spy upon the Chappelear apartment for the obvious purpose of satisfying himself of the actions of his wife and of the identity of her male company. His activities in this respect were carried on to such an extent that he was discovered several times watching his wife's apartment and was ordered by third parties to stay away from that vicinity. On one occasion he followed a man leaving the apartment to the latter's home and upon investigation found him to be Sigurd Bjorneby, the deceased, a man of foreign birth, 34 years of age, who had been employed on a whaling vessel, but having his residence in San Francisco, and who had been visiting his brother at Los Angeles from December 20, 1929, until the time of the homicides.

Although the defendant and his wife maintained separate habitations after their return to Los Angeles they saw each other frequently and cohabited as husband and wife. Their association was without strife, except as to accusations on the part of the husband as to the wife's association with other men and going out on parties. There is some evidence of counter accusations of the same sort on the part of the wife. After consultation the two decided that the wife would move from Jean Chappelear's apartment. Accordingly they spent much of the day of February 19th looking for an apartment acceptable to the wife. They finally decided on a single apartment, No. 32, on the fourth floor at 1225 West 6th street, where $10 was paid as rent for one week and a receipt for the money was issued to "Miss Gingell." Nothing was said at the time as to any one else occupying the apartment with her. The next day, the 20th, the defendant helped his wife pack her personal belongings at Jean Chappelear's apartment and conveyed some of them by suitcase and traveling bag to the new place. Later on in the day he borrowed an automobile from his employer, who conducted a market in Glendale, and by that means transported a wardrobe trunk to the new place, at which time he asked the apartment house manager for and was given the key to the apartment for the purpose of placing the trunk therein. When he was given this key he also stated to the landlady that he would probably bring some more things later in the evening, and, as it might be late, he requested and received a key to the outside door. The landlady testified that at no time did either of them state that they were husband and wife. The defendant testified that the landlady was so informed. The wife registered as "V. Gingell" and notified the landlady early that evening that she would probably be called on the telephone by the name of Ramsey from the motion picture studio where she had been employed.

The defendant was working at a Glendale market as a meat cutter. He returned with the borrowed automobile to his work at Glendale about 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the 20th and worked until his regular quitting time at 7 o'clock, when by prior arrangement his wife called him on the telephone, at which time she told him that she was going on a party or at least to a show and then to a friend's house for a late dinner after the party. After the homicides the defendant stated that he suspected that his wife was not telling him the truth and determined to find out. He returned to his room on Hope street, Los Angeles, had his supper, and armed himself with a 45-caliber United States Army revolver which he had obtained many years before from an ex-marine and had since kept in his possession. He then walked to Sixth and Witmer streets, where he called his wife's apartment on a drug store telephone about 9:15 o'clock. The wife answered and told him that there were four in her apartment; that they were just ready to leave for a little house party, and that they had decided not to go to a show. From then on he watched the apartment from a point on the opposite side of the street where he stationed himself behind a signboard and where he could see the light in the window of his wife's apartment. No one entered or left the apartment house after he commenced his watch whom he suspected of going to or leaving the apartment. At 11:45 the light in the apartment was turned out, whereupon the defendant entered the apartment house, proceeded to the fourth floor and rapped on the door of apartment 32. After the second rap and no answer he unlocked and opened the door, turned on the light and saw his wife and Bjorneby in bed together. The defendant exclaimed "'What's the idea' or something like that," whereupon the wife replied that it was none of his business. Bjorneby jumped out of bed and the defendant asked him to sit down, that defendant wanted to talk to his wife. The defendant testified that Bjorneby did not sit down but started toward him with a clenched fist and in a menacing manner and that he (the defendant) thereupon drew his gun and shot one shot into the air. Bjorneby then sat down on the bed. The defendant then asked his wife to dress and go with him to his room, whereupon the wife said: "Take that damn gun and get the hell out of here and leave us alone." He repeated his request to his wife to dress and join him and received a similar answer. Bjorneby rose again, so the defendant testified, and started toward him, and his wife jumped out of bed and started toward him, when "I then lost control of myself and started firing." Four shots were then fired, the first two into the body of Bjorneby, the second of which entered his head and killed him instantly. The other two shots entered the body of the wife, the second of which entered her head, rendered her unconscious, and she fell to the floor. The defendant immediately left the apartment, returned to the street and walked to the corner of Sixth and Lucas streets, looking for an officer. He then proceeded to Seventh and Lucas and entered the Commodore drug store where Officer Elmer Hoffman happened then to be. The defendant walked over to the officer, touched him on the arm and asked him to come outside. When the two arrived on the sidewalk the defendant handed the officer the gun, stated that he had committed a crime and wanted to surrender. The officer called the Georgia street police station and shortly two officers from the detective bureau appeared in an automobile. At the suggestion of one of them the four went to the scene of the homicides, where they found the two bodies lying on the floor, the one dressed in her night clothes and the other in his underwear. Vera Gingell was still unconscious but breathing. She was taken to a hospital, but soon expired.

After ten or fifteen minutes spent in viewing the premises the defendant was taken to the Georgia street station, where he was interrogated and his statements taken down in shorthand and later transcribed. He was again taken back to the apartment and further questioned. Photographs were taken at the scene of the homicide, after which the defendant was taken to Central police station, where he was further interrogated.

Taking up the points raised by the defendant in the order in which they are presented, it is first contended that the deputy district attorney in charge of the case was guilty of misconduct in his cross-examination of the defendant and in his argument to the jury.

[1] In his statement to the officers on the night of the homicides, which statement was for the most part admitted in evidence, the defendant said that he did not want his wife to live in the vicinity of the Jean Chappelear apartment "on account of the gang she was running with." On cross-examination the deputy district attorney propounded the following question: "Can you tell us what you meant by 'the gang she was running with'?" An objection without stating the grounds therefor was interposed by the defendant's counsel and the court said "sustained." Then followed the question by the prosecutor, "Do you want to explain that?" To which objection was again interposed and a request made to the court to admonish the prosecutor for asking improper questions after the court had ruled the same objectionable. The prosecutor then said: "The witness has the right to explain anything," after which the court stated, "Objection sustained." It is this last remark of the prosecutor that is claimed to be misconduct. We find nothing objectionable in the remark, except perhaps a breach of decorum in interjecting it after the court had rightly or wrongly sustained the insufficient objection of the defendant's counsel. The objection might well have been overruled, as the question on cross-examination had a legitimate bearing on the mental attitude of the defendant just prior to the homicides and the relationship of the defendant with his wife at that time. The defendant contended at the trial that his relationship with his wife was harmonious and free from contention. In his statement before the trial he said that his wife accused him and that he had accused her of "cheating"; that she took it seriously a couple of times and that at one time she had attempted to commit suicide by taking poison. The prosecutor endeavored to cross-examine the defendant on his prior statements concerning these matters, by questions which appear from the record to have been appropriate. However, the defendant's objections thereto were sustained. Under the circumstances we cannot say that the course pursued by the prosecutor was misconduct.

[2] Among the further specifications of misconduct is the following statement of the prosecutor in his opening argument: "Under the circumstances I don't see how it can be contended that this is anything but a first degree murder, not one first degree murder, but two first degree murders. We know the law that for one murder a man may be given the extreme penalty. At one time not long ago the law said that the jury had to find mitigating circumstances or it was their duty to impose the death penalty. The law knows that jurors frequently hesitate to do that and now it makes it optional with the jury. If the jury wishes, they may impose for one murder the death penalty or life. The defendant cannot serve two life terms in the penitentiary, and maybe a life term doesn't mean a life term either; maybe it means a very few years." On objection and request for admonition the court said: "Sustained. The jury is instructed to disregard that last statement of counsel." It may be assumed and declared that the statement referred to had no proper place in the argument, but the incident falls far short, considering the whole record, of requiring the reversal of the judgments. See People v. Reilly, 208 Cal. 385, 281 P. 606.

[3] In his closing argument the prosecutor stated: "I wish the cold lips of Vera Gingell could tell you her story. I wish she could tell you of the infidelity of the defendant in this case. He silenced her lips. He tells his story. Could any one doubt that he lied from the witness stand? When a witness is false in one part of his testimony, it is all to be distrusted. Counsel argued that there was a letter that I should have offered to the jury. He knows that the court read the letter and ruled it was immaterial. If it is immaterial, the State can't offer it and the defense can't offer it. * * * Perhaps I know what Vera Gingell would testify to if she were here to go on the witness stand; perhaps I know that if Vera Gingell were here to testify that it would be of no value to the defendant in this case. Counsel knows we can't put in such a thing; counsel knows that we can't put in her statements before that time. He says, why didn't I put that immaterial letter in evidence. The court ruled that that letter had nothing to do with the case."

Counsel for the defendant interposed an objection to the foregoing statement on the ground that it was not a correct statement of the law and requested that the jury be so instructed. In ruling upon the objection the court said: "The jury will receive the law from the court and not take any statement of counsel as the law in this case, except in so far as that statement may coincide with the law as given to you by the court." And the court further and at length admonished the jury to disregard statements made by counsel for both parties with reference to the letter. There had been during the course of the trial a sharp controversy between counsel as to the existence and contents of a letter written by the defendant to his wife before the tragedy. This letter was in the hands of the district attorney, and its production was called for by the defendant. After considerable maneuvering the court called for the letter and it was produced for the inspection of the court. Its introduction in evidence was refused apparently on the ground that it contained self-serving declarations. The letter is not set forth in the record so we are in the dark as to its contents and may not therefore rule upon its admissibility. Evidently counsel for the defendant in his argument, which is not in the record, commented on this letter and criticized the prosecutor for not producing it. Undoubtedly the reference to this letter by defense counsel provoked the reply of the prosecutor. There is no other reasonable explanation for it, and none has been suggested. At any rate, the court sustained the objection and admonished the jury at length not to consider the statement of the prosecutor.

[4] In reply to the argument of defense counsel advancing the honesty and rectitude of the defendant's character the prosecutor said: "He (counsel for defendant) leaves out the elements that could come from the mouth of Vera Gingell and Sigurd Bjorneby. He talks about the lecherous hands of Sigurd Bjorneby. I wonder how many times the hands of this defendant had been engaged in a similar enterprise?" Objection to this argument was sustained and the jury was instructed that "such statement is not evidence in the case and it is not to be considered by you for any purpose in reaching your verdict. Such statement is to be as though you had never heard it." It is urged that the reference to what Vera Gingell would testify to and as to what could be shown as to the defendant's conduct toward his wife, if she were alive, was especially reprehensible, because, so the defense claims, there was no evidence as to mutual unfaithful conduct. In the statement taken by the officers the following questions were asked of the defendant and answers given as follows:

"Q. You were both cheating? A. We were accusing each other.

"Q. You had accused her and she accused you? A. Yes.

"Q. Did it ever get serious? A. A little trouble; every family has a little trouble.

"Q. Was she cheating on you and you cheating on her? A. Both a little bit."

It is true that when the original statement made to the officers was offered in evidence, objection to the foregoing questions and answers was sustained; but the prosecution was permitted to use them for purposes of cross-examination, and when the defendant was asked if those questions were asked and the answers so made, the defendant stated that he "did not remember." On this state of the record we find no misconduct in the comment made thereon sufficient to justify a reversal.

[5] Again the prosecutor in his closing argument stated: "It is a matter of common knowledge and principle that there are more murders committed annually in America than any civilized nation on the globe. It is also a matter of common knowledge that the murder wave is on the increase in America. There are various reasons ascribed therefor. One is the looseness of the law. Another is lack of efficiency in the prosecution on the part of the officers of the law. Third, and last, is the reluctance and hesitancy upon the part of the jurors to properly act in enforcing the law." It has been held in many cases that the range of discussion, illustration, and argumentation is very wide, and that matters of common knowledge may be referred to and allusion may be made to the prevalence of crime and the duty of the jury. People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 102, 122 P. 435, and cases there cited. Furthermore, no objection to this statement was interposed.

It is expressly not contended by counsel for the defendant that any one of his specifications of misconduct standing by itself would be reversible error in the light of the court's admonitions, but it is asserted that, taken together, they should prompt the conclusion that the defendant did not have a fair trial. An inspection of the rather voluminous record discloses that counsel have singled out what might, dissociated from the context and associated arguments, be stressed as an overstepping of the bounds by the prosecution. But we are not convinced that singly or collectively they rise to the importance urged by earnest counsel in that behalf.

It is next contended that the court erred in giving certain instructions and in refusing to give certain other instructions proposed by the defendant. The court charged the jury generally and at length on the law of homicide, setting forth therein the definitions of murder of the first degree, murder of the second degree, manslaughter, and self-defense, and called attention to the distinctions to be drawn in fixing the degree of the crime, if a verdict of guilty should be found. In these general instructions was included the following: "If the accused was engaged in the performance of an unlawful act, and if the deceased attempted in a lawful manner to prevent the performance of such unlawful act, and if, while so endeavoring to prevent the same, the defendant in anger, and solely for the purpose of revenge, or to enable him to carry out his unlawful design, so interfered with by said deceased, attacked the latter with a deadly weapon, intending to kill said deceased, and did, under such circumstances, carry such intention into execution, the fact that defendant was in a passion would not mitigate or excuse such homicide, but the crime committed would in such case be murder in the first degree. It is not less murder because the act is done suddenly after the intent to commit the homicide is formed. It is sufficient that the malicious intention precedes and accompanies the act of homicide."

[6] The foregoing portion of the general instruction is objected to, not because it does not state the law correctly, but because, it is contended, there are no facts in the case to which it could be made applicable. It is perhaps debatable whether such facts do or do not exist in the record. The prosecution's case was tried on the theory that the deceased wife had refused to live with her husband, and that she lived separately for that reason. There was evidence from the mouth of the defendant himself to support an argument on that theory. He stated before the trial that when his wife left Washington, D. C., he feared she would not live with him again. At the trial he testified that a permanent separation was never contemplated, and that they lived apart only because he was not financially able to provide a place suitable to the wife for both to live. There was also evidence to support the conclusion that the defendant obtained the key to her apartment without the wife's knowledge and in order that he might enter her apartment unbeknown to her. The wife had worked temporarily at a moving picture studio, and the evidence is quite clear that she intended to continue in this work under her maiden name, and that this was one of the reasons why she desired to live apart from her husband. But, assuming that the defendant had a legal right to enter his wife's apartment at any time, we are unable to conclude that he was prejudiced by this portion of a lengthy instruction which in its entirety correctly sets forth the law of homicide and the evident purpose of which was to call attention to the distinctions which the jury should draw in considering the evidence and in fixing the degree of the crime. See People v. Matthew, 194 Cal. 273, 283, 228 P. 424; People v. Quimby, 6 Cal. App. 482, 92 P. 493.

The defendant further complains of the refusal of the court to give three certain instructions relating to the circumstances under which the homicides might be found to be manslaughter. It is unnecessary to set them forth in full. It was sought thereby to have the jury instructed that the sight of adultery committed by defendant's wife may be provocation which will justify that heat of passion sufficient to reduce the crime to manslaughter, "provided the knowledge of the adultery of the wife is so recent as to preclude the idea of cooling time or premeditation and provided further that the defendant at the time of the commission of the alleged homicides was acting under the influence of passion aroused by the sight of his wife's infidelity." These instructions were "refused except as given in other instructions." The other instructions on the subject were the following: "The court instructs the jury that, although the law provides that the provocation causing the sudden passion must arise at the time of the killing, it is your duty in determining the adequacy of the provocation, if any, to consider in connection with all the facts and circumstances in evidence in the case, the state of mind of the defendant and the alleged provocation therefor, and if you find that by reason thereof the defendant's mind at the time of the killing was incapable of cool reflection and that said facts and circumstances were sufficient to produce such state of mind in a person of ordinary temper, then the proof as to the sufficiency of the provocation satisfies the requirements of the law and so, in this case, you will consider all the facts and circumstances in evidence in determining the condition of defendant's mind at the time of the alleged killing and the adequacy of the cause, if, any, producing such condition. * * * The court instructs the jury that if in this case you do not believe from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant is guilty of murder as defined in these instructions, but you do believe from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, that on or about the 20th day of February, 1930, without authority of law and without a premeditated design to effect the death of Vera Gingell and Sigurd Bjorneby, or either of them, while in the heat of passion caused by a provocation apparently sufficient to excite uncontrollable passion in the mind of the defendant, such as would render him incapable of cool reflection [the defendant did] shoot and discharge leaden bullets into the bodies of Vera Gingell and Sigurd Bjorneby, or either of them, from a loaded pistol, and then and thereby inflicted wounds upon the bodies of said Vera Gingell and said Sigurd Bjorneby, or either of them, from the effects of which either of them died, then it will be your duty to acquit the defendant on the charge of murder, either in the first or second degree, and to find him guilty of the lesser degree of crime, to-wit: manslaughter."

[7] It is contended that nowhere in the instructions given is there any instruction or suggestion that the adultery of the wife suddenly discovered might be considered by the jury as a provocation for the deed or an extenuating circumstance to be considered by the jury in fixing the degree of the crime. To this we cannot agree. On the contrary, the instructions given would seem to have been more favorable to the defendant than the refused instructions in this respect. The refused instructions stressed the recent knowledge and sudden discovery of the adultery of the wife, resulting in the immediate resentment, anger, and passion sufficient to relieve the defendant of the crime of murder; whereas, the instructions given did not stress the recent knowledge and sudden discovery, but more generally directed a verdict of manslaughter instead of murder in the event that the homicide was found to be without premeditated design and while the defendant was acting "in the heat of passion caused by a provocation apparently sufficient to excite uncontrollable passion in the mind of defendant such as would render him incapable of cool reflection."

[8] Another instruction was refused and of which the defendant complains. This instruction, in the first portion thereof, treated of the reasonable time which the law allows for the subsidence of the anger aroused by the sudden provocation before the offense will be removed from the realm of manslaughter, and thus far it was unobjectionable and properly stated the law; but the instruction went on to say: "In applying this test all circumstances attending the homicides are to be taken into consideration, including the nature and extent of the provocation, the physical and mental condition of the defendant, his condition in life and peculiar situation at the time of the homicides, his education and his habits and his conduct and manner and conversation throughout the altercation." We think the foregoing quoted portion of the instruction was unsound and the entire instruction was therefore properly refused. The test was not the condition in life, education, habits, and conduct of this particular defendant, but rather the "cooling time" to be considered was the time within which an ordinary reasonable man would cool under like circumstances. A similar instruction was properly condemned in People v. Golsh, 63 Cal. App. 609, 616, 219 P. 456.

[9] The defendant insists that undue advantage was taken of him in his interrogation by the officers after his arrest, and therefore that his statement was inadmissible in evidence. We find nothing in the conduct of the officers that is subject to just criticism. True, he was questioned at intervals until nearly dawn of the morning after the tragedy, but that alone is not sufficient to render his statement inadmissible. A confession was not wrung from him. In fact, immediately after the shooting, he hunted out an officer, surrendered his firearm, and himself with the voluntary statement that he had committed a crime.

[10] Finally it is contended that, on the record, this court should reduce the degree of the crime from murder of the first degree to murder of the second degree or manslaughter. This contention would be entitled to favorable consideration if the record disclosed that the defendant, without previous warning, had discovered his wife in the adulterous embrace of her paramour, and in the heat of the anger and passion thereby engendered had slain them on the spot, without premeditation or design. But the record does not bear that interpretation. In the first place it shows beyond dispute the defendant's suspicions of the infidelity of his wife. He had shadowed her apartment in an endeavor to observe her conduct and learn the identity of her men company. He had discovered by his own means the identity of Bjorneby as at least one of his wife's associates.

There is also documentary evidence of premeditation and design. A week or so before the killing the defendant wrote a letter to his father-in-law as follows: "My dear Dad Ramsey:—After you have read this you will understand—I loved Vera too much to let her go on as she was—it was just another case of Birdie guess you understand even though it may be hard for you to believe tis true and I do too know you would rather see her where she is than doing such a wrong in the world —if I hadn't thought so much of Vera this would never happened but My God and Maker knows she drove me crazy night after night out with other men and all night too— thats why she would not live with me—I do hope you will pull yourself together now and don't take this too hard as it was the only thing to do and I have told her it would lead to this—Your son in Law Gus."

[11] The foregoing letter was not mailed, but was found in the defendant's possession after the homicides. At the time of his arrest he handed to officer Hoffman a letter addressed to Ray Ramsey, his brother-in-law, reading as follows: "Dear Ray Ramsey. Well Ray here is the worse. It had to be. I have cornered Vera and a Mr. Bjorneby in her apartment as the law found them only knocked out. Vera has been doing this thing for the past five years and God my judge knows I did all in my power to make her stop it but just like Birdie, there was no stopping, and I know you all would rather see her where she is than continue to do this thing. I told her I would give her up to a good man if she would do the right thing in this world, but she would rather do as she was, so forgive me and thank me through your prayers as I did only the right thing. Gus." The defendant stated to the officers after his arrest that he wrote the letter to his brother-in-law before the night in question. At the trial he testified that he wrote it on the brick wall of the Good Samaritan Hospital which was nearby and after the homicides had taken place. The jury had the right to believe, as they must have felt compelled to believe, that this letter was written before the homicides. It would seem to be entirely beyond belief that after the tragic moments of the shooting affair, and his immediate departure to hunt an officer and surrender himself, the defendant would or could stop and pen this letter on the brick side wall of a building. On the other hand, this letter is in the same tenor as the one addressed to the father-in-law, admittedly written before the tragedy. Both of these letters evidence a deliberate purpose to relate the past event of the shooting of the deceased wife, but which was to take place after they were written. The second letter was unquestionably intended to impart information as to the killing of both the wife and her paramour. The defendant sought to explain them by stating that they referred solely to his own contemplated self-destruction, but they cannot be so interpreted. On no possible theory can it be said that they refer to the fact of his suicide. On the contrary, both refer to the past act of homicide which had not yet taken place. This we feel impelled to conclude is conclusive evidence of the prior intent and premeditation which classifies the homicides as murder of the first degree. It was the province of the jury, under the evidence, to fix the degree of the crime, and the application to reduce the degree must be denied.

Other minor points made by the defendant have been considered and are found to be without merit.

The judgments and orders are, and each of them is, affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. R. Hughes, Judge.

Action by Ruth Mautino against the Sutter Hospital Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal herewith adopted, see 285 P. 369.

WASTE, C. J.

Plaintiff recovered damages for personal injuries in an action brought by her against the defendant Sutter Hospital Association. On appeal, the judgment was reversed by the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District. A hearing was granted in this court to permit of further consideration of plaintiff's status, i. e., whether she should be adjudged an invitee or an employee of the defendant. After such consideration and review of the matter, we find ourselves in accord with the view of the District Court of Appeal, and therefore adopt the opinion of that court written by Mr. Presiding Justice Finch, and concurred in by Associate Justices Thompson and Plummer, viz.:

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff when she fell on the floor of one of the rooms in defendant's hospital in which she was employed as a private nurse by the patient occupying the room. The verdict of the jury was in favor of the plaintiff for damages in the sum of $10,000. This amount was reduced by the trial court, with plaintiff's consent, to $6,235, and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for that sum. The defendant has appealed from the judgment.

The floors of all the rooms in the hospital are covered with battleship linoleum. Whenever a room is vacated and before another patient is placed therein "a thin coat of paste wax is applied over the surface of the dusted floor, and a large revolving motor with a brush attached to it is used for polishing or rubbing that wax into the surface." The evidence shows without conflict that battleship linoleum is the standard floor covering in general use in hospitals, and that the above-described treatment of the same is in accordance with usual and approved methods. The linoleum in the room in question had been so treated shortly before the patient was placed therein. The plaintiff is a graduate nurse with several years' experience. She had been employed frequently as a private nurse by patients in the defendant's hospital and was familiar with the floor coverings therein and the condition in which they were maintained. She was not in the employ of the defendant at the time of the accident, but in that of the patient who occupied the room. No witness but the plaintiff testified directly as to the manner in which the accident occurred. Other witnesses gave testimony tending to discredit that of the plaintiff, but it may be presumed in support of the judgment that her testimony is all true. She testified on direct examination as follows:

"I went to duty at noon September 28th and was relieved at 7 o'clock that night by the night nurse." The next morning "I came on duty at 7 o'clock and relieved the night nurse." About 9 o'clock "I slipped and fell. * * * I had taken care of the patient, * * * and I thought the man would sleep, so I sat in the chair by him in the corner, * * * I got up to go * * * outside of the room, and when I got just past the foot of his bed going toward the door, before I knew what had happened or anything, I was on the floor. I had slipped in some way, * * * and I couldn't get up. * * * September 28th, when I went to duty, I told the nurse that the floor was so slippery, * * * the head nurse on that floor. * * * It was slick, and I couldn't keep my feet, the day of September the 28th. It was equally as bad on September the 29th, if not worse. * * * It was highly polished and I couldn't really keep my feet, it was so slick. * * * I told them I would slip and fall—the head nurse."

On cross-examination she testified that she noticed that the floors "were slick * * * from the time" she "first went into the room" and continued to notice it "throughout the day"; that on account thereof "I walked flat footed"; that the floor was as slick on the morning of the 29th as on the previous day, "maybe a little more so."

Other witnesses testified that immediately after the accident the plaintiff said that something had been "spilled on the floor in the room, that she had slipped on it and fallen and hurt herself," but the plaintiff denied that she had made such statement. One of the witnesses for the defendant testified that, about an hour after the accident she "saw white spots on the floor where something had spilled on the wax" at about the place where the plaintiff fell. The plaintiff testified that the "white spot * * * on the floor was part of the dressing that came off my shoes" at the time of the fall.

[1-3] The court properly instructed the jury, at the plaintiff's request, that at the time of the accident she was "an invitee of the defendant." It is clear from the plaintiff's testimony that she had full knowledge of the condition of the floor during all the afternoon of September 28th and for two hours in the forenoon of the next day. It does not appear that the defendant's knowledge thereof was superior to that of the plaintiff. If it was negligence for the defendant to maintain the floor in the condition described by the plaintiff, there appears to be no escape from the conclusion that it was negligence for the plaintiff, with full knowledge of such condition, to continue in the use thereof.

"The authorities are entirely agreed upon the proposition that an owner or occupant of lands or buildings who directly or by implication invites or induces others to go thereon or therein owes to such persons a duty to have his premises in a reasonably safe condition and to give warning of latent or concealed perils. In the language of a recent opinion: 'The law is well settled that an owner or occupant of land who by invitation, express or implied, induces or leads others to go upon premises for any lawful purpose is liable for injuries occasioned by the unsafe condition of the land or its approaches, if such condition was known to him and not to them.' * * * The owner is not an insurer of such persons, even when he has invited them to enter. Nor is there any presumption of negligence on the part of an owner or occupier merely upon a showing that an injury has been sustained by one while rightfully upon the premises. The true ground of liability is the proprietor's superior knowledge of the perilous instrumentality and the danger therefrom to persons going upon the property. It is when the perilous instrumentality is known to the owner or occupant and not to the person injured that a recovery is permitted. * * * There is no liability for injuries from dangers that are obvious, or as well known to the person injured as to the owner or occupant." 20 R. C. L. pp. 55–57; Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 206, 211, 201 P. 462; Shanley v. American Olive Co., 185 Cal. 552, 555, 197 P. 793.

Some of the instructions were in conflict with the foregoing statement of the law among them the following:

"The court instructs you that the plaintiff's continuing to work in the room at defendant's hospital after having had knowledge of the slippery condition of the floor was not an act of negligence on her part, nor was she guilty of negligence by reason of continuing her work as a nurse in the room where the patient was confined, even after she had knowledge of the slippery condition of the floor. * * *

"If you find that the floor was so slippery that a prudent and reasonable person, complying with the regulations of the defendant, would, under the same circumstances, slip and fall to the floor, then the defendant would be negligent and your verdict must be for the plaintiff."

[4] The first of these instructions incorrectly states the law and assumes as a fact that the floor was slippery. The second would require a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, regardless of contributory negligence on her part, if the floor was in such condition that a prudent and reasonable person would slip and fall on it. Even if the plaintiff were free from contributory negligence, "not every accident that occurs gives rise to a cause of action upon which the party injured may recover damages from some one. Thousands of accidents occur every day for which no one is liable in damages, and often no one is to blame, not even the ones who are injured." S. S. Kresge Co. v. Fader, 116 Ohio St. 718, 158 N. E. 174, 175, 58 A. L. R. 132.

[5] The court instructed the jury that "it was the duty of the defendant to provide a reasonably safe place for her (plaintiff) to work and discharge her duties." While this instruction may not have misled the jury, it is not an accurate statement of the law. It is not the duty of an owner in such a case to keep his premises absolutely in a reasonably safe condition, but only to exercise reasonable care to keep them in a safe condition. "The responsibility of such owner for the safety of such person in such a case is not absolute; he is only required to use ordinary care for the safety of the persons he invites to come upon the premises." Shanley v. American Olive Co., 185 Cal. 552, 555, 197 P. 793, 794. "The owner of premises is not an insurer of the safety of an invitee, but he owes him the duty to exercise ordinary care in seeing that the premises are in a safe condition." Dobbie v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co. (Cal. App.) 273 P. 630, 633.

In respondent's brief it is said that the plaintiff occupied "a status enabling her to claim the same degree of protection as an employee in her place of employment," and that "the employer is bound to provide a reasonably safe place for his employee to work in." It clearly appears that the plaintiff's status was that of invitee, as the court instructed the jury at her request, and that she was in no sense an employee of the defendant.

[6] Respondent urges that the defendant did not plead contributory negligence. The answer alleges that plaintiff's injuries "were entirely and solely caused by negligence of the plaintiff herself and not by any negligence on the part of the defendant." It is not necessary to decide whether that allegation sufficiently avers contributory negligence, because, "where the evidence introduced by the plaintiff shows that he has been guilty of contributory negligence, 'the defense may be availed of, even though not set up by defendant.'" Hoy v. Tornich, 199 Cal. 545, 551, 250 P. 565, 568.

The judgment is reversed.

SINCLAIR v. CRABTREE et al.

S. F. 13386.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 17, 1931.

1. Trusts 🔑147(1).

Where beneficiary was to receive trust estate at 24 years of age, beneficiary's interest, whether vested or contingent, held alienable (Civ. Code, §§ 693, 699).

The trust estate was created by will which provided that the income should be used for maintenance and education of the beneficiary until she attained the age of 18; that thereafter until she attained the age of 24 the income was to be paid to the beneficiary, and at the age of 24 the trust was to cease and the trust estate pass to beneficiary.

2. Trusts 🔑147(1).

Beneficiary's complaint seeking to have conveyance of trust estate construed as equitable lien on trust fund held demurrable.

The beneficiary in her complaint set forth facts showing that trust estate was to become vested in beneficiary when she attained age of 24; that after she had attained age of 18 she conveyed her interest in trust estate; and complainant asked that the court construe the conveyance as equitable lien and to decree her to be owner thereof.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Frances Sinclair against George L. Crabtree and another. From the judgment, plaintiff and the named defendant appeal.

Reversed, with directions.

George D. Collins, of San Francisco, for appellant Crabtree.

Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, of San Francisco, for respondent Sinclair.

H. F. Chadbourne, of San Francisco, for respondent Wells Fargo Bank.

CURTIS, J.

In the estate of Cornelia Bowman, deceased, certain property consisting of money and corporate stock was decreed and distributed to the Union Trust Company upon the following trust conditions: "To invest and keep the said trust estate invested so that income might be derived therefrom and to use the income of the said trust estate according to its best judgment for the maintenance and education of Fannie Sinclair, the great-granddaughter of decedent, until she attained the age of eighteen years; the net income of said trust estate to be paid to said Fannie Sinclair, after she shall have attained the age of eighteen years, at convenient intervals until she attains the age of twenty-four years, and when said Fannie Sinclair attains the age of twenty-four years, the trust to cease and the trust estate to pass to, vest in, and be by said trustee paid over and delivered to said Fannie Sinclair."

Frances Sinclair, named in said trust provision of said decree as Fannie Sinclair, attained the age of twenty-four years on December 8, 1927. Prior thereto, however, and on the 30th day of October, 1923, and when she was over eighteen years old, and therefore of legal age, the said Frances Sinclair executed and delivered to George L. Crabtree what purported to be a conveyance of said trust property. The consideration paid by the said Crabtree for said conveyance was the sum of $8,300. The conveyance was absolute in form and purported to convey the legal title to said property and not as security for the money advanced. The value of the trust property at the date of said purported conveyance was the sum of $25,849.28, subject to a lien of $7,500 held by John A. Bergerot. After reaching the age of twenty-four years the said Frances Sinclair instituted this action for the purpose of having the rights of said parties in and to said trust property determined by a decree of court. In her complaint she set forth the facts as related above and offered to do equity and to allow judgment and decree to be entered against her providing for the payment of said sum of $8,300 to said George L. Crabtree, with whatever rate of interest the court might adjudge reasonable, but asked that she be declared the owner of said property, subject to the liens of J. A. Bergerot and defendant Crabtree. The defendant Crabtree answered, setting up said conveyance and claiming to be the legal owner of the whole of said trust property, subject only to the said lien of J. A. Bergerot. Upon the issues thus made by the pleadings, a trial was had and resulted in a judgment and decree that the defendant Crabtree had an equitable lien upon said trust property as security for the payment to him of the said sum of $8,300, with interest thereon at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum from the 30th day of October, 1923, to the date of said judgment, the interest amounting at the date of said judgment to the sum of $5,118.31, and that plaintiff was entitled to all the rest and remainder of said trust property, after the payment of the lien of said George L. Crabtree. The Bergerot lien had been paid prior to the entry of said judgment. From this judgment each party has appealed. The plaintiff has appealed from that part of said judgment wherein it is adjudged and decreed that interest shall be allowed on said sum of $8,300 at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, from October 30, 1923, to the date of said judgment. The defendant Crabtree has appealed from said judgment as a whole, his contention being that said judgment is erroneous in failing to adjudge him to be the legal owner of all of said property.

John A. Bergerot was made a party to the action by reason of his ownership of said lien of $7,500. As said lien has been paid, he is no longer an interested party herein. The Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Company is the successor in interest of the Union Trust Company. It has no interest in the result of this action except to have the question of ownership of said trust property determined by a decree of court.

The principal controversy involved herein grows out of the appeal of the defendant Crabtree, who will hereafter be referred to as the defendant, and for that reason we will devote our first consideration to the questions arising therein. Furthermore, should these questions be determined in favor of the defendant, it will not be necessary for us to pass upon the merits of plaintiff's appeal.

The rights of the parties hereto in and to said trust property depend entirely upon the meaning and effect to be given to the trust clause of the decree of distribution in the estate of Cornelia Bowman, deceased, which clause we have already set out in full herein. The contention of the defendant is that Frances Sinclair received by said decree a vested interest in said trust property, which passed to him by said conveyance of October 30, 1923, and that he thereby became the legal owner of said trust property, subject only to the prior lien held by J. A. Bergerot. Defendant further contends that even if Frances Sinclair by said decree became the owner of only a contingent interest in said trust funds at the date of the death of Cornelia Bowman, such interest could be conveyed by her after she became of legal age, and upon her arriving at the age of twenty-four years this interest became a vested interest and passed to the defendant by virtue of the prior conveyance to him by the said Frances Sinclair.

Plaintiff contends that her interest in said trust property prior to attaining the age of twenty-four years was only a contingent interest therein or a mere possibility; that it was not subject to alienation prior to her reaching that age; and that at most any attempted conveyance by her of her said interest, prior to the time she became twenty-four years of age, created only an equitable lien against said trust property, enforceable in a court of equity wherein the amount of defendant's recovery would be limited to the sum advanced by him with reasonable interest.

[1] As we view the case, the question as to whether the interest of Frances Sinclair in the trust property was contingent or vested is not a matter of controlling importance. It is conceded by the plaintiff that if her interest at the date of said conveyance was a vested interest in said trust property, said conveyance was a valid and legal transfer of said property to the defendant, and the latter thereby acquired a legal title to said property. She contends, however, that if her interest in said property under said decree of distribution was only a contingent interest she was incapable of transferring a legal title to said trust property until she attained the age of twenty-four years. In this contention we cannot agree. A future interest in property is declared by section 693 of the Civil Code to be either vested or contingent. By section 699 of the Civil Code it is provided that, "Future interests pass by succession, will, and transfer, in the same manner as present interests." In Gray v. Union Trust Co., 171 Cal. 637, 642, 154 P. 306, 309, the court held, speaking of certain trusts created under a deed executed by the plaintiff Gray: "Everything * * * which the law contemplates shall exist for the creation of equitable remainders or remainders in trust is found in this trust. Whether they be regarded as vested or contingent is immaterial, for in either case the estate and interest are alienable." In support of the foregoing ruling, the following authorities were cited: Davis v. Willson, 115 Ky. 639, 74 S. W. 696, 697; McDonald v. Bayard Sav. Bank, 123 Iowa, 413, 98 N. W. 1025, 1026, and Sikemeier v. Galvin, 124 Mo. 367, 27 S. W. 551.

In the first of these cases, the supreme court of Kentucky after referring to the rule of common law that, "as no title passed to the contingent remaindermen until the happening of the contingency, there could be no sale in the interim," called attention to the statute of that state and held as follows: "But section 6, art. 1, c. 63, Gen. St. (section 2341, Ky. St.), provides: 'Any interest in, or claim to, real estate may be disposed of by deed, or will, in writing.' This provision clearly embraces a contingent remainder interest in the land."

In the second of the cases just cited, the Supreme Court of the state of Iowa had this to say in regarding the right of the holder of a contingent remainder to alienate the same: "It may be conceded for the purposes of this case that the plaintiffs, at the time of making the quitclaim deed, were contingent remaindermen, having only a possibility of ever coming into possession; but, however remote and uncertain this remainder may have been, there was still a possibility, coupled with an interest, which might at some future time ripen into an estate. 1 Tiffany's R. P. 306. At the time the deed was executed, James McDonald was unmarried and without issue. If he died without issue, and the plaintiffs survived him, they would immediately come into possession of the estate under the provisions of the testator's will. True, this contingency might never happen, but there was a possibility that it might; and this possibility created, in our judgment, a contingency interest or concern in the land, which existed at the time of the conveyance. Godman v. Simmons, 113 Mo. 122, 20 S. W. 972. This interest was not a mere expectancy. In 2 Fearn on Remainders, p. 23, an expectancy or chance is defined as 'a mere hope, unfounded in any limitation, possession, trust, or legal act whatever—such as the hope which an heir apparent has of succeeding to the ancestor's estate. This is sometimes said to be a bare or mere possibility. It is a possibility in the popular sense of the term. But it is less than a possibility in the specific sense of the term "possibility." For it is no right at all, in contemplation of law, even by possibility, because, in the case of a mere expectancy, nothing has been done to create an obligation in any event; and, where there is no obligation, there can be no right, for "right" and "obligation" are correlative terms.' The interests of the appellants, then, were not mere expectancies. They have their foundation in the 'provision,' the 'legal act' of the will. Jeffers v. Lampson, 10 Ohio St. 101. If this be true, it follows that under this statute every conceivable interest in the estate, 'whether present or future, vested or contingent, and however acquired,' passed by the deed."

The statutes in these states, while differing in some respects from section 699 of the Civil Code of this state, are like it in the one respect in which we are concerned in this action. They all in effect empower the holder of the estate in remainder to alienate his interest in said state. The statutes of the states of Kentucky and Iowa provide generally that any interest in real estate may be disposed of by deed, which the courts of these states have held are broad enough to include the transfer of contingent interests in real property. The section of the Code of our state is more direct and specific and applies to future estates, and expressly provides that future interests pass by transfer in the same manner as present interests. That "future interests" in property include both vested and contingent interests, we think there can be no question. We are therefore satisfied that when Frances Sinclair executed and delivered to the defendant, after she became of legal age, but prior to the complete vesting in her of the absolute title to said trust property, the conveyance above referred to, she divested herself of all her interest in said trust property and that by said conveyance the defendant became the owner of said property, contingent only upon Frances Sinclair's attaining the age of twenty-four years. Upon her becoming twenty-four years of age, the defendant became the absolute owner of the present legal title thereto.

The contention of plaintiff that this case is governed by the rule enunciated in Bridge v. Kedon, 163 Cal. 493, 126 P. 149, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 404, we think cannot be sustained. That case involved a conveyance or assignment of the expectant interest by an heir in the estate of his mother, who was living at the date of said conveyance. It was held that such a conveyance, while it did not create any legal interest in the estate, would be enforced by the courts as an equitable assignment of the interest of the heir after the death of his mother. Such an assignment, it was held, would only be enforceable in a court of equity, and the recovery thereunder would be controlled by equitable principles. Accordingly, this court in that case affirmed the judgment of the trial court which upheld the assignment which was given to secure four promissory notes, one of which bore interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per month and the other at the rate of 2½ per cent. per month, but limited recovery to the principal of said notes and interest thereon at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum. Plaintiff contends that she is in the same position as the heir in that case was and that, therefore, her assignment was not a legal transfer of her interest in the trust property, but created only an equitable lien in favor of the defendant for the money advanced by defendant, and that defendant's right in said trust property should be limited to a lien thereon for the amount of money so advanced with reasonable interest. But as we have seen, plaintiff's interest in said trust property at the date of said conveyance was greater than that of an heir of his expectant interest in the estate of his ancestor. It was a future interest in said property, and even if but a contingent interest it was such an interest as might be the subject of a legal transfer by her. By this transfer the defendant became the legal owner of whatever right the plaintiff had in said trust property, which was the right to the corpus thereof upon the plaintiff attaining the age of twenty-four years.

Plaintiff has cited an excerpt from 23 Ruling Case Law, p. 574, to the effect that under the common law a contingent remainder could not be the subject of a transfer. Conceding that this was the rule at common law, this rule has been changed by the statutes of this state. Section 699, Civ. Code; Gray v. Union Trust Company, supra. Section 953 of Pomeroy's Equity (4th Ed.) is not applicable for the same reason.

[2] In this action the defendant interposed a general demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, which was overruled by the trial court. This ruling we think was erroneous. Plaintiff in her complaint set forth portions of the decree of distribution in the estate of Cornelia Bowman, deceased, which provided for the creation in her of said interest in said trust property. She then alleged the conveyance thereof to the defendant and asked the court to construe this conveyance as an equitable lien in favor of defendant upon said trust property and to decree her to be the owner thereof, subject to said lien. From what we have already said, it is clear that said complaint stated no cause of action against the defendants, or either of them. The demurrer should have been sustained.

The judgment herein is reversed, with directions to the trial court to sustain the defendant's demurrer to the complaint and to dismiss said action.

SAN FRANCISCO IRON & METAL CO. v. ABRAHAM et al.

S. F. 13567.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 18, 1931.

1. Attachment ⚷7.

Plaintiff in action for tort held not entitled to attachment (Code Civ. Proc. § 537).

2. Attachment ⚷47(4).

Plaintiff's count for money had and received was evidence on issue of right to attachment, but was not conclusive.

3. Attachment ⚷245.

Plaintiff's verified complaint at hearing of motion to dissolve attachment stood as affidavit.

4. Attachment ⚷5.

Plea in assumpsit for money had and received waived deceit and affirmed original contract under which no liability existed, and hence precluded right to attachment.

> Count in petition alleging assumpsit for money had and received affirmed agreement whereby defendant transferred to plaintiff all of his interest in partnership and plaintiff assumed all obligations of the partnership but by terms of which no sum of money was stipulated as payable from either party to the other.

5. Attachment ⚷7.

Complaint to recover money paid to copartnership held to state cause of action in deceit, precluding right to attachment (Code Civ. Proc. § 537).

> Complaint alleged formation of partnership and payment of money into funds of copartnership; that partnership became heavily indebted; that defendant partner offered to surrender interest in partnership if remaining partners would assume obligations of partnership; that defendant, in accordance with offer and without further money consideration, transferred interest in partnership to remaining partners, who agreed to assume obligations of partnership and to regard copartnership as dissolved. Action was commenced more than two years after last payment into funds of partnership was made by plaintiff.

6. Attachment ⚷92.

Attaching party should show he is fairly and strictly within his rights to be entitled to attachment, where there are other creditors who may be affected thereby.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco Iron & Metal Company against Nathan Abraham and others. From an order discharging an attachment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 287 P. 569.

Louis E. Goodman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Bianchi & Hyman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

A hearing in this matter was granted by this court for the purpose of giving further consideration to certain contentions urged by appellant petitioner as to the soundness of the conclusion arrived at by the District Court of Appeal. Such investigation leads us to the conclusion that the trial court did not abuse or misuse its power by discharging the attachment, and that the appellate court's decision as to the law of the case may well be affirmed. The opinion of Mr. Justice Sturtevant, Division Two, First Appellate District, with the noted correction as to the order of the counts of the complaint, which in no way affects the substance of the opinion, is adopted and approved as a part of our opinion. It follows:

"This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order made discharging an attachment. On the hearing of the motion the parties introduced in evidence the plaintiff's verified complaint, its affidavit for an attachment, its undertaking, plaintiff's verified amended complaint, defendants' notice of motion to discharge, defendants' affidavit, and the affidavit of L. H. Silberman, the vice president of the plaintiff.

"From the foregoing papers the following facts appear: Prior to November 1, 1926, N. Abraham was the owner of a store and doing business under the name of N. Abraham and Co. On that date Lou H. Silberman and Harry Silberman, as the agents of plaintiff, and N. Abraham formed a partnership and thereafter conducted the business of the store under the name of N. Abraham Mercantile Company. As for the contribution of the new partner or partners, the plaintiff paid into the funds of the copartnership $60,093.31. The new firm continued to transact business until the 1st day of December, 1927. At that time it was in financial embarrassment and the defendant proposed to give or take. By agreement of the parties, the defendant transferred to the plaintiff all of his interest and the plaintiff assumed all of the obligations of the partnership, but by the terms of the dissolution agreement no sum of money was stipulated as payable from either party to the other. The plaintiff's complaint is in two counts. The first count specifically pleads a cause of action as for deceit. The second count pleads a cause of action as for moneys had and received. It was stipulated at the trial that both counts are but different methods of pleading one transaction. It nowhere appears that the plaintiff rescinded the partnership contract, offered to rescind it, nor, even at this time, offers to place the defendant in statu quo.

[1] "The foregoing facts show that the plaintiff's grievance is a tort and under our statute it was not entitled to an attachment. Code Civ. Proc. § 537; Hallidie v. Enginger, 175 Cal. 505, 509, 166 P. 1. Moreover, searching the entire record, nothing appears showing any contract under which the defendant became indebted to the plaintiff '* * * upon a contract express or implied, for the direct payment of money. * * *' Code Civ. Proc. § 537; Willett & Burr v. Alpert, 181 Cal. 652, 662, 185 P. 976; Sturtevant v. K. Hovden Co., 60 Cal. App. 696, 698, 214 P. 244; Cal. Packing Corp. v. Kato, 45 Cal. App. 491, 493, 188 P. 57.

[2-4] "The plaintiff points to the count as for money had and received, asserts that count sounds in contract, and therefore claims that in any event it was entitled to take out a writ of attachment. In making this claim it is assuming that the court is passing on a demurrer, whereas the proceeding before the court is a motion to dissolve an attachment. The question is not what the plaintiff has pleaded, but what in truth and in fact is its grievance. The count for moneys had and received was evidence on the issue before the court, but no more conclusive than any other item of evidence before the court. [3] The plaintiff's complaint on the hearing of the motion before the court stood as an affidavit. Jacobs, Malcolm & Burtt v. Railway Co., 71 Cal. App. 42, 44, 234 P. 328. That is, the hearing on the motion before the court was similar to a hearing on a motion to dissolve an injunction. That the plaintiff's verified pleading stands as an affidavit on a motion to dissolve an injunction is made clear by the authorities. Falkinburg v. Lucy, 35 Cal. 52, 60, 61, 95 Am. Dec. 76; Heffion v. Bowers, 72 Cal. 270–272, 13 P. 690; Hiller v. Collins, 63 Cal. 235, 237; Christopher v. Condogeorge, 128 Cal. 581, 585, 61 P. 174. [4] Moreover, by pleading the count in assumpsit the plaintiff waived the tort and affirmed the original contract. But by the terms of that contract the defendant never bound himself to repay to the plaintiff the amount of its expenditures. Bechtel v. Chase, 156 Cal. 707, 711, 712, 106 P. 81. Therefore it was not entitled to a writ of attachment. We think that the trial court was clearly right in making the order dissolving the attachment."

The inadvertence above referred to consists in the reversal of the counts pleaded, naming the third count—the only one which states facts—as the first count, and referring to the first count for money had and received as the second count, disregarding the second count of the complaint based upon an alleged open book account as immaterial to the reasoning of the opinion.

[5] The parties to the contract of copartnership operated under the same as copartners for more than a year after entering into it, and it is respondent's contention that the $60,093.31, which appellant furnished, was his contribution or purchase price for one-half of the partnership business. The payments made by appellant for said one-half interest in said business began November 1, 1926, and were concluded in the month of June, 1927, but no action was commenced prior to February 26, 1929, more than two years after the last payment was made, and then only after appellant, heavily indebted to a named banking corporation, to which it assigned all of its right, title, property, and interest in and to the firm of N. Abraham Mercantile Company, and said bank had placed a bookkeeper or overseer, in conjunction with said Abraham, in charge of said copartnership business. It further appears by affidavit, which is not satisfactorily met by counter affidavit, that Abraham became dissatisfied with the injection of said overseer into the management of the business, and that therefore a meeting of the agents of said bank and said Abraham was had, at which meeting the latter offered to assume all of the assets of said business, or to surrender his right in and to said copartnership and its properties, provided that said remaining partners would assume the obligations of said copartnership; that, in accordance with the latter offer, said Abraham did set over and assign, without further money consideration, all of his right, title, and interest in and to said copartnership to said remaining copartners; that they accepted the same and agreed to assume all the obligations of said copartnership and to regard the copartnership as dissolved; and that said transfer was in full settlement of said copartnership affairs. The complaint upon its face furnishes sufficient justification for the court's action. There is no reasonable theory by which the complaint can be construed, other than that the deceit, set forth with much particularity and detail in the third cause of action, is the gravamen and forms the basis of the causes of action, scantily pleaded in the other two counts.

The rule is thus stated in 2 Ruling Case Law, § 18, p. 815: "* * * Nor * * * will the courts permit a cause of action sounding in tort to be converted into an action of contract by means of the form of the pleading. The same act or transaction may constitute a cause of action, both in contract and in tort, and a party may have an election to pursue either remedy. In that sense he may be said to waive the tort and sue in contract. But for the purpose of bringing the case within the attachment law a right of action in contract cannot be created upon the theory of waiving the tort that gave rise to the cause."

[6] The affidavit of said Abraham, which is full and specific in its averments, and which is not satisfactorily rebutted in important respects, further strengthens the contention that the action is in fact, as alleged in the third cause of action, one sounding in tort and not in contract. Where there are other creditors who may be affected by the attachment of property, as there appear to be in the instant case, the right to gain a preference over them by the exercise of the extraordinary writ of attachment, it should satisfactorily appear to the trial court that the attaching party is fairly and strictly within his rights. From the case as presented by the record, we cannot say that the trial judge exceeded or abused his power in dissolving the attachment.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ROGERS.

Rehearing Denied March 30, 1931.

Criminal law 🔑1169(3).

Admitting gun and officer's conversation with defendant, resulting in finding of gun after arrest on other charge, held harmless, where defendant's counsel first directly informed jury of other charge.

> In robbery prosecution, while officer was permitted to testify regarding conversation had with defendant and finding of gun which was admitted in evidence, there was nothing in direct testimony from which it could be argued that gun related to any former charge, unless it was showing thereby made that witness procured weapon from its hiding place four months before robbery charge was preferred against defendant. On cross-examination, defendant's counsel brought out that conversation was had after preliminary on other charge, and, on district attorney's objection to question whether conversation was in reference to other case, stated that defendant "was charged with another crime and he was tried and acquitted."

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

On petition for rehearing.

Rehearing denied.

For former opinion, see 295 P. 521.

Ralph D. Paonessa and Alexander L. Oster, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM.

On petition for rehearing appellant challenges our statement, concerning the disclosure to the jury of the fact that "appellant had been under prosecution upon another criminal charge," to this effect: "This disclosure, however, was not first made by the evidence in question, but by a statement of appellant's counsel made in the presence of the jury." In view of this challenge we deem it proper to state more fully why the error of the trial court in receiving in evidence the conversation of the police officer and the gun, if there was any such error, was harmless. When the police officer first took the stand, it was shown by him, without objection or motion to strike, that he arrested appellant on April 1, 1930, and took him into custody, whereas the charge of robbery was not made against him until in August of that year. Thus the jury was shown that appellant had been placed under arrest, at least, long before the pending charge was made against him. When the police officer was asked for a conversation with appellant, held after this arrest, counsel for appellant inquired of the district attorney whether the conversation "was in reference to this charge," a form of inquiry from which the jury might reasonably have inferred that some former charge had been made against appellant. The district attorney answered the query in the affirmative, doubtless believing that the conversation and the gun found pursuant to it were admissible under the rule stated in People v. Stoerkel, 87 Cal. App. 336, 262 P. 825. This is certainly an arguable question, and is the one we found it unnecessary to decide in the opinion in the present case. When it developed that the conversation asked for related to a gun, counsel for appellant sought leave to "take this witness on voir dire," whereupon the following occurred:

"The Court: As I understand it, anything he is testifying to hasn't anything to do with any other charge.

"The District Attorney: My question is specifically directed to the facts of this case and the gun as it applies (italics ours) to this particular charge and no other. * * *

"Counsel for defendant: With that understanding I will withdraw my objection."

No objection, however, had theretofore been interposed. The witness then repeated the conversation. In it appellant told the witness where he had concealed a gun. It was then shown that the witness had procured the gun from its place of concealment, a gun was identified by him as the one in question, and it was offered in evidence. There was not the slightest item in the testimony from which it could be argued that the gun related to any former charge, unless it was the showing thereby made that the witness procured the weapon from its hiding place four months before the robbery charge was preferred against appellant. After the gun was offered, the witness was cross-examined as to his identification of it, and it was received in evidence. The record shows the following at the beginning of the general cross-examination of the police officer:

"Q. Officer Sterritt, when did you first know of the present robbery charges? A. The day after the preliminary on the other charge. (Italics ours.)

"Q. So that up to the time of the preliminary on the other trial, any conversation that you had with the defendant was in reference to the other case (italics ours), was it not?

"The District Attorney: That is objected to as calling for the conclusion and opinion of the witness. * * *

"Counsel for Defendant: Why, this man was charged with another crime and he was tried and acquitted.

"The District Attorney: Just a moment; that is entirely uncalled for."

In these few lines the jury was first directly informed that appellant had been previously charged with crime.

Rehearing denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. F. Pullen, Judge.

Action by H. O. Adams against John Christopher, the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America, D. E. Burgess, and others, wherein defendant last named filed a cross-complaint. From an order overruling a demurrer to the cross-complaint, the second named defendant appeals.

Appeal dismissed.

R. C. Pardoe, of Stockton, for appellant.

Hubert H. Briggs, of Stockton, for respondent.

Justice Pro Tem. McDANIEL delivered the opinion of the court.

All the parties above named, excepting D. E. Burgess, denominated defendant and cross-complainant, respondent herein, and Indemnity Insurance Company of North America, defendant and appellant herein, have no further part in this litigation for the reason that they, by appropriate judgments, settlements, and stipulations, have disposed of their several controversies.

The appellant gave notice of appeal as follows:

"(Title of Court and Cause.)

"To the Honorable J. F. Pullen, Judge of said Superior Court, and to D. E. Burgess, Defendant and Interpleader in the above entitled action, and Hubert H. Briggs, his attorney:

"You, and each of you will please take notice that Indemnity Insurance Company of North America, a corporation, one of the defendants in the above entitled action, hereby appeals to the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District of the State of California, from that certain order made and entered in the above entitled cause in said Superior Court on the 5th day of May, 1930, overruling demurrer of defendant Indemnity Insurance Company of North America, a corporation, to the pleading of defendant and interpleader D. "Attorney for D. E. Burgess, Defendant and Interpleader.

"Endorsed Filed May 16-1930 Harry W. Hall, Clerk by W. H. Young, Deputy."

There seem to have been two orders exactly alike made by the trial court on May 5th; the only difference being that in the first order the names of all of the parties defendants and interpleaders were not set out in full but in abbreviated form.

There is a written stipulation signed by the attorneys for the two remaining respective parties, whereby they agree that the name McIntosh may be stricken, as he was not a party to the pleading of said Burgess, and the name of John Christopher be substituted. This stipulation was not followed by any order of the court correcting the order or orders of May 5th, but it is immaterial, as neither McIntosh nor Christopher is attempting to appeal. The said order of May 5th, from which the appeal is sought to be taken, was not followed by any judgment, as the clerk's transcript shows. No judgment is referred to in the order.

[1-3] Our law does not authorize an appeal from an order overruling or sustaining a demurrer. The rulings on demurrer are reviewable, however, on appeal from the judgment itself. Harmon v. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

Thomas C. Breitenstein was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Arthur Veitch, Dep. Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J.

In each of four counts of an indictment, defendant Breitenstein and three other persons respectively named Earle, Ward, and Ducey were charged with the commission of the crime of grand theft. Earle was the city engineer of the city of Pasadena; Ward was his assistant, and the two defendants Ducey and Breitenstein were partners engaged in said city in the business of contracting in matters affecting various kinds of street improvements. It appears that two several contracts for street improvement work were entered into between the city of Pasadena and the contracting firm of Ducey & Breitenstein.

The evidence adduced on the trial of the action shows that, under each of two separate contracts, double payments were made by said city to Ducey & Breitenstein, apparently for "extra" work supposedly not in the contracts between the parties, when, as a matter of fact, such work actually was stipulated therein. Each of such double payments formed the basis of one of the counts in the indictment herein. Each of the other two charges against the defendants arose out of the same two contracts between the interested parties, and each was based upon a payment of money to the firm of Ducey & Breitenstein for alleged intentional overmeasurements of square feet of cement work, pavement, etc., constructed for said city by said firm of contractors.

The theory of the prosecution was that, as to the payments of money made for alleged "extra" work, they were received by Ducey & Breitenstein as a result of a criminal concert of action between them and defendant Earle; and that each of the other two payments was accomplished by means of connivance or conspiracy among all the defendants.

For the reason that the action was dismissed as to defendant Ward, who thereupon became a witness for the people, and for the further reason that on account of the personal illness of the defendant Ducey, which resulted in his inability to be present at the time when the trial was had, the action was tried as against defendants Earle and Breitenstein only. From a judgment of conviction against each of such defendants on each of the charges preferred against them, as well as from an order by which their motion for a new trial was denied, defendant Breitenstein has appealed to this court.

[1, 2] The first point presented by appellant as a sufficient reason for a reversal of the judgment is that "the court erred in admitting against defendant Breitenstein the testimony of defendant Ward as to conversations between Ward and Earle outside the presence and hearing of said defendant Breitenstein, without any proof of conspiracy, except that contained in such conversations themselves."

As a necessary prerequisite to a determination by the jury that the defendants were guilty of the offense of which they were charged, among other rules of law the court instructed the jury that it must find that by means of false and fraudulent representations and pretenses the defendants actually defrauded the city of Pasadena at the times and in the manner alleged in the indictment against them. From the nature of the case and the facts adduced in evidence, it is manifest that the criminal offense of which the defendants were charged could have been committed only as a result of some corrupt agreement or understanding entered into between or among some or all of the defendants. Assuming that a sufficient total of evidence was introduced on the trial of the action to warrant the determination by the jury that a conspiracy to defraud the city of Pasadena as alleged in the indictment existed, the possible fact that, at the time the witness gave the testimony to which appellant here objects, the evidence was lacking in quantity and quality to justify such a conclusion would present no sufficient reason for a determination by this court that defendant had been prejudicially injured by the reception of such testimony at the time it was given. In other words, the "order of proof" is of no consequence, provided that no abuse of discretion be exercised by the trial court in directing the admission of such evidence at the time it is submitted to the jury for its consideration. 5 Cal. Jur. 514. So here, if, at the time defendant Ward gave his testimony regarding certain alleged conversations which took place between him and defendant Earle outside the presence of defendant Breitenstein prima facie proof of the existence of the conspiracy had not been presented to the trial court, that fact in itself would create no substantial prejudice against defendant Breitenstein, provided that before the termination of the trial sufficient evidence was introduced from which a conclusion might legally have been reached that by means of a conspiracy so to do the defendants had committed the offense for which they were then on trial.

Unquestionably, evidence was introduced from a consideration of which the jury was authorized to conclude that the city of Pasadena had been defrauded in each of the particulars alleged in the several counts of the indictment. Also, that, as to the "extras" in each of the two counts which were the subject of inquiry, the several acts of defendant Earle were directly and largely responsible; and that as to the other two counts the overpayments therein alleged, based on fraudulent estimates of the work done by defendants Ducey & Breitenstein, were directly traceable to both Earle and Ward. In the latter connection, unobjectionable evidence showed that Ward raised the figures on each of such jobs and gave to Earle the correct figures as well as those which were false, at which times either Earle or Ward subtracted the correct estimate from that which was false. In addition thereto, one of the witnesses testified to a conversation which he asserted had occurred between him and Breitenstein with reference to the work done by Ducey & Breitenstein under the provisions of one of the contracts in question, in which Breitenstein said to the witness, "Plans don't amount to anything on this job." The witness also testified that he compiled a progress report on the work done on said job, and frequently talked with Breitenstein regarding the work done and the measurements of such work; that Breitenstein would approach the witness and ask him how the job was running, and that he would then be told exactly how it ran; that Breitenstein would be given the number of square feet of concrete put in and the amount of material used in the work; that he would thereupon figure the amounts, put notes in his book, and that Breitenstein was furnished with notes all the time. The witness further testified that Breitenstein had told him that he and defendant Ducey had brought Earle from the city of San Diego to the city of Pasadena and had Earle appointed city engineer of the latter city; furthermore, that any inspector who "sat on the firm of Ducey & Breitenstein too strong" would, through their influence, be removed by Earle, and that several had already been removed. The witness continued that Breitenstein had told him not to consult with a certain engineer in the office of defendant Earle on any technical points, but to consult defendant Ward; that the employee to whom Breitenstein referred was "too nosey; that he was a nosey kind of a fellow, having no standing in the city hall, and not to furnish him with any information."

Another witness, who was an inspector of the "extra" work for the city of Pasadena, testified that he furnished Breitenstein with the figures on the concrete work done on one of the jobs in question, and that Breitenstein kept the figures in a little memorandum book; that Breitenstein at no time told such witness that his figures were wrong; that the witness gave Breitenstein the square or lineal feet of cement work done the day before, and that Breitenstein usually called on the job and received these figures "in the morning." It also appeared in evidence that defendant Earle caused the checks which represented the several payments of moneys which were the basis of the instant prosecution to be drawn on behalf of the city of Pasadena in favor of defendants Ducey and Breitenstein. Shortly thereafter, a part of a conversation had between Ward and defendant Breitenstein included the following: Defendant Ward testified to a conversation with defendant Breitenstein as follows: "I says, 'Well, you finally got around—' I can't call that inspector's name now—the chief inspector of the Light Department—and he said, 'Yes,' and I said, 'Well, I think he was a little bit off of his pins, or something like that—and a little bit too far fetched, and wanted to be hard on the Linda Vista job,' and we talked about that, and in a few minutes I said, 'How did you manage to get those large bills without suspicion?' and he told me that they were cashed and brought down from San Francisco by a bond salesman."

[3, 4] Without attempting to detail the evidence adduced with reference to the two counts which were founded on the alleged fraudulent collection by Ducey & Breitenstein from the city of Pasadena for "extra" work claimed to have been performed by Ducey & Breitenstein, it is sufficient to state that from the evidence the jury was authorized to draw the conclusion that in fact the work which was covered by such "extras" was specified and included in the contract, and consequently that the contractor could not properly be compensated for such performance other than as was provided in the contract itself. Furthermore, although the evidence given by defendants relating to the matter conflicted with that introduced by the prosecution, the jury, as the sole judge of the credibility of the witnesses, had the power to determine, and upon it was thrust the duty of determining, whether the payments for such "extras" were the result of an innocent mistake on the part of defendants, or whether they were deliberately and knowingly accomplished by them with the fraudulent intent of securing to themselves certain sums of money to which they were not justly and honestly entitled. The latter conclusion manifestly having been reached by the jury, the further conclusion that a conspiracy must have existed as between defendant Earle and Ducey & Breitenstein necessarily would follow. In such circumstances, the authorities are unanimous in the declaration of the legal principle which would include a ruling that the testimony given by Ward as to certain alleged conversations which occurred between him and defendant Earle, and which are the subject of the objections interposed by defendant Breitenstein on the trial of the action and by him reiterated in this court, was admissible, not only as against defendant Earle, but as well against defendant Breitenstein.

[5] What hereinbefore has been said necessarily presents by inference a ruling against defendant's contention to the effect that the testimony given by Ward was not corroborated. Furthermore, although by the provisions of section 1111 of the Penal Code a conviction of a defendant cannot be had solely upon the testimony of an accomplice, the authorities of this state are numerous to the effect that, even though but slight, and standing alone entitled to but little weight, if the corroboratory evidence but tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, it measures up to the statutory requirement. People v. Kelly, 69 Cal. App. 558, 570, 231 P. 767, and authorities there cited.

[6] Appellant also predicates error upon the assumed fact that no evidence was introduced by which it was established that any false pretenses were made by defendant Breitenstein to the city of Pasadena. But assuming the existence of a conspiracy among the several defendants to fraudulently procure the payment of money by the city of Pasadena to the firm of Ducey & Breitenstein, it was immaterial which of the several defendants actually made the false representations. After the formation of the conspiracy, and preceding its consummation, each of the conspirators was liable for each and all of the acts of each of his coconspirators performed in furtherance of the conspiracy; and the evidence is ample to sustain the conclusion that principally by the acts of defendant Earle the city of Pasadena was induced to and actually did part with the money which by the indictment herein it is alleged was paid to Ducey & Breitenstein.

The specification by appellant that the city of Pasadena did not rely upon any representation which may have been made by defendant Breitenstein and was not thereby induced to part with the money in question is fully answered by the situation that defendant Breitenstein was liable for Earle's acts in the premises, and that it was directly through and because of the representations made by the latter to the city manager of the city of Pasadena that the several checks which authorized the payment of the several sums of money to defendants Ducey & Breitenstein were issued.

[7, 8] Finally, appellant complains that the trial court erred in denying his motion for a new trial which was based on the ground of "newly discovered evidence." From an examination of the affidavit presented in the trial court on the hearing of the motion, it becomes apparent that no sufficient excuse was shown for the failure of defendant to produce the proposed "new evidence" at the trial of the action. Furthermore, such "newly discovered evidence" affected but one detail in the mass of evidence adduced by the prosecution which tended to establish the guilt of the defendants, and it is inconceivable that for that reason, had the evidence been introduced on the trial of the action, the defendants, or either of them, would have been acquitted as to any or either of the several charges against them, or that the verdict of the jury would have been in any wise affected by such "newly discovered evidence." In addition thereto, it is a universal rule that the granting of a new trial on the ground of "newly discovered evidence" rests in the sound discretion of the trial court. The record herein presents no evidence that in denying the motion the trial court abused its discretion.

The judgment and the order by which the motion for a new trial was denied are affirmed.

Rehearing Denied March 3, 1931.

Husband and wife 🔑332.

Fixing marriage of plaintiff to wife in alienation of affections complaint at date after acts complained of was not reversible error under facts.

The complaint alleged that the acts complained of occurred in November, 1925, and fixed the date of plaintiff's marriage to his wife at January, 1927, but the complaint further alleged that the issue of said marriage consisted of three children, of the respective ages of eight, six, and five years, at the time of the commencement of the action in March, 1927, and that the alleged wrongful acts of defendant occurred while the plaintiff was living with and cohabiting with, and supporting, his wife and children. It thus appeared that the stated date of the marriage was a clerical error.

Affirmed.

A. S. De Santis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J.

This is an appeal on the judgment roll from a default judgment.

In the complaint it is alleged that the 7th day of January, 1927, is the date of the marriage of the plaintiff and his wife. The complaint then proceeded to allege certain facts constituting enticement or alienation of affection of the plaintiff's wife, all of which facts occurred prior to January 7, 1927, to wit, in November, 1925.

The sole ground of appeal is that on the face of the complaint it appears that, at the time when the alleged wrongful acts were committed, the plaintiff and Laura Spilatro were not husband and wife. But the complaint further alleged that "the issue of said marriage" consisted of three children, of the respective ages of eight, six, and five years at the time of the commencement of the action in March, 1927, and that the alleged wrongful acts of defendant occurred "while the plaintiff was living and cohabiting with, and supporting, his wife and children." It thus appears that the stated date of the marriage was a clerical error. It might well be considered as a self-correcting clerical error, not, indeed, that it supplied the true date, but to the extent that it was made to appear that the date of the marriage must have been and was prior to the date when the wife was enticed away from her husband.

The judgment is affirmed.

Application of Rex Duel and Edward Gibeau for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the Sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco.

Writ denied.

M. James McGranahan, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM.

An application for a writ of habeas corpus. Duel and Gibeau, in whose behalf the application is filed, were charged jointly by information with the crime of robbery, it being alleged that they did "willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously steal, take and carry away from the person, possession and immediate presence of one Arthur Scovil, who was then and there acting as clerk, agent and servant for Carley Hamilton Company, a corporation, a truck load of tobacco" of the value of $16,845, and of the personal property of said company, without the consent and against the will of the said Arthur Scovil and by means of force and fear, etc. A demurrer to the information was sustained with leave to amend; and subsequently an amended information was filed, charging that the property was taken, stolen, and carried away "against the will and without the consent of the said Arthur Scovil and of said Carley Hamilton Company," by means of force and fear, etc. (Italics ours.)

It is contended that the inclusion of the italicized clause added a new element to the charge which finds no support in the testimony adduced at the preliminary examination, and that consequently the defendants stand charged with an offense for which they were not committed by a magistrate.

[1-3] The point is without merit for the reason that the amendment was wholly unnecessary. As will be noted, Scovil was the person alleged to have been robbed, and it was averred that the robbery was accomplished by means of force and fear. Therefore, even as to him, it was unnecessary to allege that the property of which he was robbed was taken and stolen "against his will and without his consent." People v. Riley, 75 Cal. 98, 16 P. 544; People v. Johnson, 57 Cal. App. 271, 207 P. 257. And with respect to the ownership of the property it has been repeatedly held that when the property is taken out of the possession of a bailee or agent of the owner it may be described in the pleading as the property of either bailor or bailee, or owner or agent. 22 Cal. Jur. 848–849; People v. Dean, 66 Cal. App. 602, 226 P. 943. "The actual status of the legal title to the stolen property is of no concern to the thief," and consequently one who has the right of possession as against the thief is, so far as the latter is concerned, the owner. People v. Edwards, 72 Cal. App. 102, 116, 236 P. 944, 950.

The application for the writ is denied.

COWAN v. TREMBLE et al.
Civ. 7659.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Jan. 31, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 2, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 30, 1931.

1. Principal and agent 🔑143(2), 145(2).

Generally, undisclosed principal can sue or be sued on contract made by agent.

2. Principal and agent 🔑171(9).

That undisclosed principal sued on contract was sufficient ratification of agent's acts.

3. Frauds, statute of 🔑115(3).

Contract within statute, subscribed by party to be charged or agent, is enforceable, though not signed by plaintiff or his agent (Civ. Code, § 1624).

4. Frauds, statute of 🔑115(3).

Rule that contract within statute need be signed only by party to be charged does not deprive contract of mutuality (Civ. Code, § 1624).

Rule under statute of frauds does not render contract liable to objection of lack of mutuality, for, by bringing suit, other party binds himself to abide by judgment of court.

5. Partnership 🔑161.

Partner making unauthorized contract for partnership would be personally liable.

6. Partnership 🔑132.

As condition to consent to transfer of interest in business to third party, partner may impose on copartner's authority to sell business any binding restrictions he sees fit.

7. Partnership 🔑160.

Where one dealing with partner has notice of restricted authority, partner's unauthorized acts are not binding on partnership or copartners, unless copartners, by conduct, waive restrictions on authority.

8. Partnership 🔑157(2).

Partners' claim that buyer of business forfeited deposit was recognition of contract, as regards acquiescence in sale by one of partners.

9. Partnership 🔑157(1).

Copartners may be bound by partner's unauthorized act, where they knowingly acquiesced, as by accepting and retaining benefits.

10. Partnership 🔑217(3).

Evidence supported conclusion unwilling copartner subsequently acquiesced in sale of business and accepted benefits.

11. Sales 🔑185.

Where sellers of business, before expiration of escrow period, notified buyer of refusal to carry out agreement, no tender of performance by buyer was necessary (Civ. Code, § 1440).

12. Contracts 🔑279(1).

Tender of performance is unnecessary, where facts show tender would have been unavailing.

13. Frauds, statute of 🔑115(3).

Permitting plaintiff on contract within statute of frauds signed by defendants to testify regarding verbal authorization to agent to act for him held proper (Civ. Code, § 1624).

Such testimony was properly received, since Civ. Code, § 1624, requires only that contract within statute must be signed by party to be charged or his agent.

14. Evidence 🔑71.

There is no presumption that letter was mailed on day of its date.

15. Evidence 🔑378(1).

In action on contract for sale of business, evidence justified inference letter stating buyer's willingness to consummate sale was received before expiration of escrow period; hence was properly admitted in evidence.

Although addressee, who was escrow agent and also attorney for sellers, testified he was unable to remember date of receipt, yet, considering nature of communication, it was fair inference from testimony of such witness that, had it been received after period mentioned, he would have remembered facts, and circumstances furnished sufficient foundation for its admission in evidence.

16. Sales 🔑416(2).

Permitting jury, in determining damage buyer of business suffered from breach, to consider part payment retained by sellers, held proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Action by S. B. Cowan against Elmer Tremble and another, partners doing business under the name and style of the Service Motor Express. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

H. J. Bischoff, of San Diego, for appellants.

Davis & Thorne and W. A. Alderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged breach of a contract. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $3,000. Defendants' motion for a new trial was denied, and they have appealed from the judgment entered on the verdict.

The defendants, who are copartners, were conducting a transfer business between Los Angeles and neighboring cities under the name of Service Motor Express Company. In January, 1923, Carl I. Jacobson—who, as the evidence shows, was the agent of plaintiff—commenced negotiations with defendant Tremble, who was in charge of the partners' Los Angeles office, for the purchase of the business. An offer of $23,000 was made which, after Tremble had communicated with his partner at Riverside, was accepted. The latter, however, suggested to Tremble that, as a condition to the sale, the buyer should agree to purchase any additional motor equipment needed in the business which the partners might purchase before the transfer, and also that the sale should not include an adding machine and typewriter owned by the partnership. Subsequently, on January 27, 1923, two documents, called escrow instructions, were executed by Jacobson and Tremble, and deposited with an attorney as escrow holder. These documents stated in substance that Jacobson delivered therewith to the attorney $1,000 as part payment on the purchase price of $23,000, the latter sum being stated therein to be "the full consideration for the transfer and sale of the entire equipment, properties, goodwill of business and operating franchises and all assets now possessed by the Service Motor Express Company"; that the balance of the purchase price should be paid into escrow within ninety days from date, with the understanding that the purchasers might at their election assume any debts of the sellers up to $8,000, in which event this amount should be deducted from the purchase price; that the sellers should immediately cause a corporation to be formed, to which the title to all equipment, operating franchises and assets of the Service Motor Express Company, should be transferred, the expense of incorporation, however, not to exceed $300, which was to be borne by the purchasers, and the amount deducted from the first payment of $1,000; also that the seller should deposit with the attorney a financial statement showing the property to be free of debts and incumbrances, except the sum of $8,000 above mentioned; that an inventory and appraisement of all the equipment, trucks, and property should be made and placed in escrow; and that the sellers should immediately furnish a statement of all their liabilities. The latter also agreed to fully perform within ninety days; it being provided that, in case of failure so to do, the purchasers at their option might terminate the agreement and recover the amount paid, but that, in the event of the purchasers' failure to perform, the amount paid should be forfeited to the sellers. It was also stipulated as follows: "It is the purpose and intent of the purchasers and sellers in this escrow that the transfer of the properties hereinabove described for the consideration herein mentioned shall be effected and accomplished by the incorporation of said company, and by having all property hereinabove described transferred and considered as assets of said corporation when so formed, and then upon the forming of said corporation the properties hereinabove described shall be transferred by sellers to purchasers by a transfer of the entire stock of the corporation."

While it was testified by defendant Tremble that the conditions suggested by his partner were communicated to Jacobson, and that the latter stated that the purchase of needed equipment would be satisfactory, these conditions were not made a part of the escrow agreement. The complaint alleged, in substance, that defendants failed to perform the stipulations above set forth, and before the expiration of the ninety-day period notified plaintiff that they would not perform. These allegations were denied.

Among the grounds for the appeal, it is contended that for the following reasons the verdict is unsupported, namely: That Jacobson was not authorized in writing to represent the plaintiff in the transaction; that there was no consent by defendant Fletcher to the terms of the escrow agreement; and that plaintiff failed to deposit the unpaid balance of the purchase price with the escrow holder on or before the expiration of the ninety-day period.

[1-4] It is well settled as a general rule that an undisclosed principal can either sue or be sued on the contract made by his agent (1 Cal. Jur. Agency, § 131, p. 854; Parker v. Otis, 130 Cal. 322, 62 P. 571, 927, 92 Am. St. Rep. 56; Schader v. White, 173 Cal. 441, 160 P. 557); and the fact that plaintiff brought the action thereon was a sufficient ratification of the acts of Jacobson (2 Corp. Jur. Agency, § 132, p. 513; Argenti v. Brannan, 5 Cal. 351; Thompson v. Spray, 72 Cal. 528, 14 P. 182). Moreover, contracts within the statute of frauds need be subscribed only by the party to be charged or his agent (Civil Code, § 1624), and may be enforced notwithstanding they are not signed by the plaintiff or his authorized agent (Cavanaugh v. Casselman, 88 Cal. 543, 26 P. 515; Scott v. Glenn, 98 Cal. 168, 32 P. 983). Nor does this rule render the contract liable to the objection of a lack of mutuality, for, by bringing the suit, the plaintiff binds himself to abide by the judgment of the court. Harper v. Goldschmidt, 156 Cal. 245, 104 P. 451, 28 L. R. A. [N. S.] 689, 134 Am. St. Rep. 124; Allen v. Dailey, 92 Cal. App. 308, 268 P. 404; Williston Contracts, § 140, p. 314.

[5-7] Defendant Fletcher refused to sign the escrow agreement or to proceed with the sale. As a rule, every general partner is agent for the partnership in the transaction of its business; but the statute then provided (Civ. Code, § 2430) that a partner as such had no authority to dispose of the good will of the business, or the whole of the partnership property at once, unless it consisted entirely of merchandise, or to do any act which would make it impossible to carry on the ordinary business of the partnership, unless his partners had wholly abandoned the business to him or were incapable of acting.

Although defendant Tremble would be personally liable on the contract in any event (Lewis v. Clarkin, 18 Cal. 399; Brooke v. Glide, 39 Cal. App. 534, 179 P. 546), under the above section he was without authority to bind his partner as to any of the acts enumerated therein without the latter's consent; and as a condition to his consent to a transfer of his interest in the business, defendant Fletcher might impose any restrictions upon Tremble's authority that he saw fit, and Tremble, like any other agent, would be bound to observe the same; and, where a person dealing with a partner has notice of the restrictions upon his authority, the acts of the partner in contravention of such restrictions are not binding on the firm or the other partners, unless the latter by their conduct have waived the restrictions or limitation. 47 Corp. Jur. Partnership, § 296, p. 833.

[8-10] Though the evidence shows that Fletcher's consent was conditional, that plaintiff's agent was apprised of the fact, and that plaintiff was also notified by Fletcher before the ninety-day period had expired of the latter's objection to the contract and refusal to proceed on that account, it was also shown that, after the expiration of the escrow period, the escrow holder—who was also defendant's attorney—proceeded with the incorporation of defendants' business, the articles being filed in June, 1923. This, as testified by Fletcher, was because defendants believed that their business could be conducted more conveniently in that manner; and, if the deal with plaintiff finally went through, the incorporation would serve some purpose in that connection. It was also shown by the testimony of the attorney that part of the amount paid by plaintiff, namely, about $300, was used for that purpose, and that later defendants were given credit for the balance upon a claim for services rendered by the attorney in other matters. While defendant Fletcher testified that he refused to accept any part of the deposit, the attorney's testimony was sufficient to support the conclusion that both partners knew of its application and acquiesced therein.

Defendants claimed that plaintiff, by his failure to pay the balance of the purchase price, forfeited the above amount, and that, consequently the use thereof for defendants' benefit was proper. This was a manifest recognition of the contract by both defendants; and, while the rule as to the limitation of a partner's authority is as above stated, his copartners, notwithstanding his previous want of authority may be bound by his acts where with knowledge of the facts they acquiesce therein, as by accepting and retaining the benefits of the transaction. 20 R. C. L. Partnership, §§ 100, 101, pp. 890, 891; Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 180; Markell v. Matthews, 3 Colo. App. 49, 32 P. 176; American Exchange, etc., Bank v. Georgia Construction, etc., Co., 87 Ga. 651, 13 S. E. 505; Porter v. Wilson, 113 Ind. 350, 15 N. E. 676; Mathis v. Taylorsville Bank (Ky.) 106 S. W. 1174; Golding v. Brennan, 183 Mass. 286, 67 N. E. 239; Doll v. Hennessy Mercantile Co., 33 Mont. 80, 81 P. 625; Pearce v. Wilkins, 2 N. Y. 469; Griffing v. Dunn, 23 S. D. 141, 120 N. W. 890, 20 Ann. Cas. 579; Guthiel v. Gilmer, 27 Utah, 496, 76 P. 628; Lynch v. Flint, 56 Vt. 46; McDougall v. McDonald, 86 Wash. 334, 150 P. 628.

The evidence was sufficient to justify the conclusion that, notwithstanding Fletcher objected to the contract, he acquiesced therein and accepted the benefits thereof.

[11, 12] It is admitted that plaintiff failed to deposit in escrow the balance of the purchase price; and it is contended that this constituted a defense to the action. The evidence shows that defendants refused to carry out the agreement, and so notified the plaintiff before the expiration of the escrow period. Under such circumstances, no tender of performance by plaintiff was necessary (Civ. Code, § 1440); and the rule also applies where, as was the case here, the facts show that a tender would have been unavailing (Hoppin v. Munsey, 185 Cal. 678, 198 P. 398).

[13] Plaintiff was permitted over objection to testify that he verbally authorized Jacobson to act for him in the transaction. For the reasons previously stated in connection with the objection that plaintiff could not recover without showing that the authority of his agent was in writing, the objection was properly overruled.

[14, 15] A letter addressed by plaintiff's attorney to the escrow holder, who was also the attorney for defendants, both attorneys having their offices in Los Angeles, was admitted in evidence over defendants' objection that the mailing of the letter was not shown, or that the same was received before the expiration of the escrow period. The letter was dated April 26, 1923; and it was clear from the testimony of the addressee that he received the same through the mail, the exact date, however, not being shown. The letter referred to the transaction in question, and stated plaintiff's willingness to consummate the sale. The addressee testified that he was unable to remember the date of its receipt, and there is no presumption that it was mailed on the day it bears date. Considering the nature of the communication, however, it is a fair inference from the testimony of this witness that, had it been received after the period mentioned he would have remembered the fact, and the circumstances furnished sufficient foundation for its admission in evidence.

[16] The jury, in arriving at the amount of plaintiff's damage, was permitted to consider the part payment made by him and retained by defendants. This was proper, for, as the rule has been stated, "when the contract has been partly performed the plaintiff, upon a breach of it, loses more than the mere value of the contract; he has not only lost the benefit of the contract, but he has also lost the expense of partial performance on his own part." Sedgwick on Damages (9th Ed.) § 615, p. 1198; Cunningham v. Dorsey, 6 Cal. 19; Cederberg v. Robison, 100 Cal. 93, 34 P. 625.

Other instructions complained of were correct in the abstract, and none can fairly be said to have been prejudicial. As to certain instructions offered by defendants and refused, we find no merit in the claim that the rulings were erroneous.

After considering all the evidence, we are satisfied that the verdict was fully sustained, and that no error is disclosed which would warrant the conclusion that the result was a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCOTT v. WARDEN et al.

Civ. 4238.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 5, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 6, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 6, 1931.

1. Adverse possession ⇨13.

Elements necessary to support title by "adverse possession" stated.

To support a claim of title by "adverse possession," there must be actual, open, and notorious occupancy of the land by the claimant, acts and conduct on his part hostile to real owner's title, open and notorious claim of title, continuous and uninterrupted occupancy accompanied by acts and a claim of title adverse to that of the real owner for the continuous period of five years, and payment of all taxes levied or assessed against the land during the statutory period of five years.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Adverse Possession," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Adverse possession ⇨27.

No presumption of adverse possession prevails where land is unimproved, uninclosed, and not cultivated (Code Civ. Proc. § 325).

3. Adverse possession ⇨27.

Mere clearing of débris and weeds from land on one occasion held not sufficient evidence of cultivation to raise presumption of adverse possession (Code Civ. Proc. § 325).

4. Adverse possession ⇨114(1).

Evidence held insufficient to establish title by adverse possession.

5. Municipal corporations ⇨579.

Tax deed showing that assessment was made for construction of electrical equipment to be used to furnish electricity for 20 years held void (St. 1913, p. 421, § 2).

Tax deed was void, since it showed on its face that the assessment, the nonpayment of which led to the sale and execution of the tax deed, was levied for construction of the electrical lighting apparatus and equipment to be used to furnish electricity for period of twenty years, while St. 1913, p. 421, § 2, authorizing municipalities to install electrical equipment, provided that the maintenance of appliances or the furnishing of electricity should be for period stated in resolution of intention, but not exceeding two years.

6. Taxation ⇨726.

Every essential step of statutory proceedings leading to execution of tax deed must be strictly followed or deed is void.

7. Municipal corporations ⇨579.

Decree quieting title in owner against possessor of tax deed void for irregularities in improvement proceedings should be rendered subject to owner reimbursing possessor full amount of taxes, penalties, and costs expended by him (Pol. Code, § 3898, subd. 5).

8. Taxation ⇨830.

Possessor of void tax deed bringing suit to quiet title held not entitled to reimbursement for taxes, penalties, and costs as against owner merely defending title (Pol. Code, § 3898, subd. 5).

9. Taxation ⇨830.

In absence of evidence of payment of taxes, holder of void tax deed cannot complain of failure to make decree quieting title in owner conditional on reimbursing holder for taxes paid.

10. Quieting title ⇨10(1).

Plaintiff in suit to quiet title must prevail on affirmative proof of his own title.

11. Quieting title ⇨44(1).

Plaintiff in suit to quiet title need not prove entire chain of title, where both parties rely on same source of title.

12. Quieting title ⇨44(1).

As regards necessity of proof of chain of title, both holder of tax deed and claimant relied on same source of title, where delinquent assessment accrued while claimant's grantors held record title.

13. Quieting title ⇨44(4).

Decree of specific performance providing for conveyance of title to plaintiff held equivalent to deed establishing prima facie case of title in plaintiff in suit to quiet title.

> This was true, since the mere omission to perform the ministerial duty required by the decree of actually executing and delivering the deed in no wise affected the plaintiff's title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stephen G. Long, Judge.

Suit by Mary E. Scott against Julia P. Warden, Carrie W. Peterson, and others. From judgment for plaintiff, the last-named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

J. Everett Brown, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John B. Haas and John D. Home, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a decree quieting title to an unimproved lot at Hermosa Beach, valued at $600.

In February, 1922, Sarah W. Hughes and A. S. Hughes, husband and wife, owned lot 89, Walter Ransome Company's Venable Place of Los Angeles county according to the map of that tract recorded in book 9 of maps, page 150, Los Angeles records. February 6, 1922, the plaintiff purchased that lot from these owners, on contract, for $600. The deed of conveyance was not executed. Upon refusal to convey the property pursuant to contract, a suit for specific performance was commenced by the plaintiff in November, 1923. The allegations of the complaint were controverted. The action was tried. On January 22, 1925, a decree was rendered in favor of the plaintiff directing a conveyance of the property. This decree provided that, in the event the defendants failed or refused to execute and deliver a deed of conveyance to the lot within thirty days from the date thereof, the clerk of the court "is hereby constituted a commissioner of this court to make a good and sufficient deed in compliance with this judgment and deliver the same to the plaintiff herein." This deed was not executed or delivered. But the decree remains in full force and effect.

Based upon this decree the plaintiff instituted this suit to quiet title. The complaint contains two counts. The first is founded upon a claim of ownership based upon record title. The second alleges title by adverse possession. The defendant Carrie W. Peterson denies the allegations of the complaint and affirmatively asserts she is the owner of the lot and is entitled to the possession thereof, praying that the title be quieted in her.

At the trial the plaintiff made an ineffectual effort to prove adverse possession. The evidence as to this issue will not support the findings and judgment. The plaintiff never actually occupied the property. No improvements were made. The evidence as to the payment of taxes for the statutory period is unsatisfactory and we think insufficient.

The evidence of plaintiff's record title consists solely of the decree against the former owners, Sarah W. Hughes and A. S. Hughes, directing them to execute and deliver to the plaintiff a deed of conveyance to the lot in question. Upon this decree the plaintiff relies.

The only evidence of title in the defendant Peterson consists of a void tax deed executed April 22, 1924, by the tax collector of the city of Hermosa Beach. This deed was executed to Julia P. Warden, who purchased the lot at a tax sale for delinquent municipal improvement assessments for electric lighting equipment authorized and installed pursuant to the provisions of the Municipal Improvement Act of June 6, 1913. Stats. 1913, p. 421. Warden executed a quitclaim deed to defendant Peterson November 10, 1926.

The court found that this delinquent assessment deed was void, and that it conveyed no title to the appellant. The court further found that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the lot in question, both as the record owner of the title and also by virtue of adverse possession. A decree was accordingly entered in favor of the plaintiff quieting the title in her. From this judgment the defendant Peterson has appealed.

[1-4] It must be conceded there is no substantial evidence to support the findings and judgment on the theory of adverse possession. To support a claim of title by adverse possession five elements must concur: (1) Actual, open, and notorious occupancy of the land by the claimant, (2) acts and conduct on his part hostile to the real owner's title, (3) open and notorious claim of title, (4) continuous and uninterrupted occupancy accompanied by acts and a claim of title adverse to that of the real owner for the statutory period of five years, and (5) payment of all taxes levied or assessed against the land during the statutory period of five years. 1 Cal. Jur. 522, § 22; 1 R. C. L. 700, § 13. No presumption of adverse possession prevails in the present case for the reason that the lot was unimproved. It was not protected by a substantial enclosure. It was not cultivated. These elements are necessary to create a presumption of possession. Section 325, Code Civ. Proc. The mere clearing of old cans, débris, and weeds from the land on one occasion will not suffice to furnish evidence of cultivation or improvements such as the statute requires. The issue as to adverse possession was therefore not sustained.

[5] The evidence is adequate to support the findings to the effect that the appellant's tax deed is void, and that her claim of an interest in the real property by virtue thereof is without merit. This tax deed, which was admitted in evidence over the objection of the plaintiff, appears on its face to be void. It is in conflict with the statute authorizing the improvements, for which the assessment was levied, the nonpayment of which led to the sale and execution of the tax deed. December 5, 1922, the city council of Hermosa Beach adopted a resolution authorizing that city to levy assessments upon the property included therein for the construction of electric lighting apparatus and equipment for municipal purposes pursuant to the Statutes of 1913, page 421. This statute authorizes municipalities to install and equip appliances with which to serve the inhabitants with water, electricity, or gas for public utility purposes, "provided, however, that the maintenance of appliances or the furnishing of electric current, gas, or other illuminating agent, shall be for a period stated in the resolution of intention, but not exceeding two years." Section 2. In violation of the foregoing limitation of authority of the city council to provide for the "furnishing of electric current * * * for a period * * * not exceeding two years," the appellant's deed on its face shows that "the Board of Trustees of said City of Hermosa Beach * * * did on the 5th day of December, 1922, duly pass and adopt a resolution * * * to order the necessary posts, wires and appliances to be installed, and electric current to be furnished for the period of twenty years, for lighting of Lighting District No. Two in said City of Hermosa Beach. * * *" This authorization is in violation of the express limitation of the statute. The terms of the deed which clearly show this violation of the statute render it void.

[6] All provisions relating to the sale of property for delinquent taxes or assessments are in invitum. Every essential step of the statutory proceedings leading to the execution of the tax deed must be strictly followed or the instrument will be rendered void. Numitor Gold Min. Co. v. Katzer, 83 Cal. App. 161, 256 P. 464; 24 Cal. Jur. 324, § 296. In the present case no evidence was adduced as to the regularity of the proceedings required by statute leading to the sale of the property for delinquent assessments. Regardless of this ommission, the deed appears upon its face to be void. The appellant is therefore left with no evidence of title whatever.

The appellant complains because the decree quieting title in the plaintiff was not rendered subject to the repayment of the small sum of money which she claims to have paid for the tax deed which she received.

[7-9] In an equitable action, maintained by the owner of property, to quiet title against the possessor of a void tax title deed for fatal irregularities in the proceedings which resulted in a sale for delinquent taxes, the decree quieting title in the owner should be rendered subject to reimbursing the purchaser of the tax title "the full amount of taxes, penalties and costs paid out and expended by him." Section 3898, subd. 5, Pol. Code; McPhail v. Nunes, 48 Cal. App. 383, 387, 192 P. 95; Holland v. Hotchkiss, 162 Cal. 366, 123 P. 258, L. R. A. 1915C, 492; Smith v. Golden State Syndicate, 43 Cal. App. 346, 185 P. 209. A different rule prevails where suit is brought by the holder of a tax deed and the owner of the record title merely defends his own title. Coleman v. County of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 714, 182 P. 440; Gramson v. Geniella (Cal. Sup.) 289 P. 817. In the present case, however, there was no proof that the appellant paid any sum of taxes, penalties, or costs upon acquiring the tax deed. In the absence of evidence of the actual payment of such taxes, the holder of a void tax deed may not complain of a failure to make the decree quieting title conditional upon reimbursing him for the taxes paid. There is therefore no error in the decree on that account.

[10-12] It is a cardinal doctrine of law that the plaintiff in a suit to quiet title must prevail on affirmative proof of the validity of his own title rather than upon the weakness of the title of the defendant. 22 Cal. Jur. 167, § 42. The plaintiff has sustained this burden of proof in the present case. It was unnecessary to prove the entire chain of title since both parties to the action rely upon the same source of title. Denning v. Green, 88 Cal. App. 379, 263 P. 819. The plaintiff purchased the lot in question from Sarah W. Hughes and A. S. Hughes in February, 1922. The tax title deed under which the appellant claims title was executed April 22, 1924, for delinquent assessments for municipal improvements founded upon the resolution of the city council of Hermosa Beach which was adopted December 5, 1922. The assessment became a lien on the property subsequent to that date. This delinquent assessment for the nonpayment of which the property was sold, and pursuant to which the tax deed under which the appellant claims title was executed, accrued while Sarah W. and A. S. Hughes, the owners of the lot under whom the plaintiff claims title, held the record title and while the plaintiff held the equitable title thereto under her contract of purchase. Therefore both parties to this action rely upon title emanating through the same individuals.

[13] Instead of a deed of conveyance the plaintiff relies upon her decree of specific performance which provides for an actual conveyance of title to her. This decree is equivalent to the possession of a deed of conveyance and establishes a prima facie case of title in the plaintiff. Chapman v. Moore, 151 Cal. 509, 515, 91 P. 324, 121 Am. St. Rep. 130; 51 C. J. 283, § 281; Lockwood v. Meade Land & Cattle Co., 71 Kan. 739, 81 P. 496; Woolworth v. Root (C. C.) 40 F. 723, affirmed 150 U. S. 401, 14 S. Ct. 136, 37 L. Ed. 1123. In 51 C. J. page 283, it is said: "Where the decree includes an order for defendant to convey to plaintiff whatever interest he may have in the realty involved, it of course affects a transfer of title as effectually as a voluntary conveyance."

The appellant contends that, since she was not a party to the action wherein the judgment for specific performance was rendered upon which the plaintiff relies, she is therefore not bound thereby. It is true that, since the appellant was not a party to that suit, the judgment would not furnish evidence to defeat any valid title which she might possess. But the appellant had no title. The only instrument upon which she relied was a void tax deed. It is not a question as to whether plaintiff's title is superior to that of the appellant. It is only a question as to whether the decree in the specific performance suit furnishes any evidence of plaintiff's title. If it does, it is competent testimony in the present case, regardless of the fact that the appellant was not a party to that action. The decree directing conveyance of the property to the plaintiff constitutes a muniment of title which is prima facie evidence of her ownership and right of possession. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it will prevail. The decree is valid and binding. The mere omission to perform the ministerial duty of actually executing and delivering the deed required by the decree in no wise affects the plaintiff's title under the facts of this case.

Under circumstances similar to those of the present case it was held in Chapman v. Moore, 151 Cal. 509, 91 P. 324, 326, 121 Am. St. Rep. 130, that a decree quieting title in one of the parties to a former action was competent evidence, not to defeat any title which his adversary might possess, but as a muniment of title which established a prima facie case. It is there said: "While the general rule undoubtedly is that judgments bind only parties and privies, still there is an exception to the rule universally recognized which sustains their admissibility against third parties who are not parties or privies to the judgments for certain purposes. This exception is that the judgment rendered in an action involving title to property, and in which it is determined that the title is in one of the parties to the action, is admissible in evidence in behalf of the party claiming under the judgment, and subsequently asserting a claim to the property affected by it as a link in his chain of title, although such judgment would not be conclusive on the party against whom it is offered because he was not a party or privy thereto. It is admissible in evidence, not for the purpose of defeating or affecting any claim or title of a party who was not a party or privy to such judgment, but solely as a muniment in an asserted title."

There is nothing in Williams v. Cooper, 124 Cal. 666, 57 P. 577, or Snodgrass v. Errengy, 86 Cal. App. 664, 261 P. 497, upon which the appellant relies, in conflict with the foregoing.

It follows that the plaintiff Scott having established prima facie evidence of her title to the property in question, since there is no evidence to the contrary and the appellant has no title, judgment was properly rendered quieting title in the respondent. The findings and judgment to the effect that the plaintiff is the owner and entitled to the possession of the lot in question are adequately supported by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CORTEZ.

Cr. 115.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Feb. 16, 1931.

1. Criminal law ⚷1169(12).

In prosecution of alien for possession of firearms capable of being concealed, introduction of extrajudicial statement of defendant admitting his foreign nativity and that he had not been naturalized held not prejudicial (Code Civ. Proc. § 1983).

2. Aliens ⚷17.

In prosecution of alien for possession of firearms capable of being concealed, people need not prove alienage and lack of naturalization as part of corpus delicti (Code Civ. Proc. § 1983).

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Juan Cortez was convicted of the crime of possession by an unnaturalized foreign-born person of a firearm capable of being concealed about his person, and he appeals.

MARKS, J.

Appellant was charged, by an information filed by the district attorney of Fresno county, with the crime of possession by an unnaturalized foreign-born person of a firearm capable of being concealed about his person. The jury returned a verdict of guilty and judgment was pronounced upon him. His motion for new trial was denied. This appeal was taken from the judgment and from the order denying the motion for new trial.

[1, 2] Appellant presents but one ground upon which he urges a reversal of the judgment. Evidence was introduced of the arrest of appellant and the finding of the firearm in his possession. Over his objection, the people were permitted to introduce an extrajudicial statement made by him in which he admitted his foreign nativity and that he had not been naturalized. This ruling is complained of by him. He maintains that while section 1983 of the Code of Civil Procedure places upon him the burden of proving, either that he was not a foreign-born person, or that, if foreign born, he was naturalized, this section does not change the rule announced in the case of People v. Quarez, 196 Cal. 404, 238 P. 363, that the extrajudicial statements of a defendant cannot be used to establish any part of the corpus delicti of the crime charged. He urges that the people, as a part of the corpus delicti, must prove both alienage and lack of naturalization, as well as possession of the weapon.

The Quarez Case was decided before the adoption of section 1983 of the Code of Civil Procedure. To hold that the people must prove alienage and lack of naturalization in cases of this kind, as a part of the corpus delicti, would in effect nullify the provisions of this section. This contention of appellant has been decided adversely to him in the cases of People v. Osaki (Cal. Sup.) 286 P. 1025, 1034; People v. Gugman (Cal. Sup.) 286 P. 1037; and People v. Bruno (Cal. Sup.) 286 P. 1037. In the Osaki Case the court said: "Conceding, as contended by appellants, that foreign nativity forms a part of the corpus delicti, the allegations of the indictment that the defendant was an alien not eligible to citizenship must be taken as true in the absence of proof to the contrary."

In the instant case appellant offered no evidence on this question. In the Bruno Case the court said: "The objections made as to the validity of the judgment are, in the main, the same as those urged in the case of People v. Guzman (Cal. Sup.) 286 P. 1037, this day filed, with the additional assignment of the introduction in evidence of the extrajudicial statement, made at the time of his arrest, that he was of foreign birth. Whether or not this statement was admissible is not important in view of section 1983, Code of Civil Procedure, which placed the burden upon him to prove that he was a citizen of the United States and was, therefore, entitled to exercise all of the prerogatives of citizenship. The appellant offered no evidence whatever as to that issue."

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

TRADERS' CREDIT CORPORATION v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al.

Civ. 7807.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 11, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⚿795(2).

Notice of motion to dismiss appeal held defective for failure to state grounds on which it would be made (Code Civ. Proc. § 1010).

2. Appeal and error ⚿795(2).

Failure of notice of motion to dismiss appeal to state ground on which it would be made was not cured by statement therein that motion would be based on affidavit attached and papers and files in case (Code Civ. Proc. § 1010).

> The affidavit stated no more than that the attorney for the defendant had not received notice of the time when appellant's surety would justify, and had no knowledge thereof. The papers and files of record in the case disclosed that such notice was duly given to defendant's attorney, as required by law. Hence it was impossible to determine by reference to the affidavit or to the papers on what ground the defendant was moving to dismiss the appeal.

3. Appeal and error ⚿381.

Appellee's attorney having refused to receive mail coming from appellant's attorneys, his evidence showing nonreceipt of notice of justification of appellant's sureties held inadmissible under statutes (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1012, 1013).

> Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1012, 1013, service of the notice is completed at time of mailing.

4. Certiorari ⚿66.

Presumption is that service of notice of time of justification of surety by appellants was made as required by statute (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1012, 1013).

5. Justices of the peace 🔑183(1).

Justice of peace, at time of justification of surety, having before him proof of service of notice, is presumed to have proceeded regularly in determining due notice was given and approving appellant's surety.

6. Action 🔑37.

Where pleadings asking certiorari justify mandamus, court may grant mandamus.

7. Mandamus 🔑31.

When trial court decides it is without jurisdiction, as matter of law, mandamus requiring court to proceed with trial is proper remedy.

Original proceeding in certiorari by the Traders' Credit Corporation against the Superior Court in and for Alameda County and others.

Writ of mandate granted.

Bernard B. Stimmel and Morris M. Grupp, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Earl Warren, Dist. Atty., Ralph E. Hoyt, Chief Asst. Dist. Atty., James H. Oakley, Deputy Dist. Atty., and Paul A. Lindley, all of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

This is an original proceeding in certiorari.

The petitioner sued in the justice's court of Oakland township against Lindley Marinello Shop on an open book account for $99.63. The defendant answered, and by way of counterclaim demanded the sum of $175 as damages for a writ of attachment levied by the plaintiff in the cause. Defendant had judgment for the sum prayed for, and plaintiff appealed to the superior court of Alameda county, and in due time filed with the justice the required undertaking with the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company as surety thereon. Thereafter the defendant served notice of exception to this surety, and within due time the plaintiff served upon defendant's attorney a notice of the time of justification of the surety on appeal; said notice having been served by depositing the same in the United States mail at the post office in San Francisco addressed to the office of defendant's attorney in the city of Oakland. At the time specified, the surety appeared and justified, and, the appeal to the superior court being perfected according to law, the defendant appeared in the latter court, and moved that the appeal be dismissed. This motion was granted, and thereupon the plaintiff moved the court to set the order aside and to restore the appeal for hearing. This motion being denied, the plaintiff, as petitioner herein, sued out this writ.

[1, 2] The notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was defective because it failed to state the grounds upon which it would be made. Section 1010, Code Civ. Proc. This defect was not cured by the statement therein that the motion would be based upon the affidavit attached and upon the papers and files in the case. The affidavit stated no more than that the attorney for the defendant had not received notice of the time when the surety would justify and had no knowledge thereof. The papers and files of record in the case disclose that such notice was duly given the defendant's attorney as required by law. Hence it is impossible to determine by reference to the affidavit or to the papers upon what grounds the defendant was moving to dismiss the appeal (Ross v. San Diego Glazed C. P. Co., 50 Cal. App. 170, 194 P. 1059), and the case does not come within the exception noted in Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525, 137 P. 263, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 737, and Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 150 P. 353.

[3] Though the Superior Court did not have before it a sufficient notice of motion to support its order dismissing the appeal, the jurisdiction of that court was exceeded in another respect in granting the motion. The showing made upon the hearing of the motion was that, during the pendency of the trial in the justice's court, defendant's counsel moved his office from 1106 Broadway, Oakland, to 3286 Adeline street, Berkeley, that correspondence was had between him and the attorneys for the plaintiff in that action addressed to the Broadway number, and that, after the attorney for the defendant had filed his notice of exception to the surety, he refused to receive or open mail addressed to him coming from the attorneys for the plaintiff. Upon this showing he based the claim that he had not actually received notice of the time of the justification of the surety. All this evidence was inadmissible, and was beside any issue before the court. The rights of the parties in this case are clearly fixed by statute and a long line of decisions—that, when service is made by mail in the cases permitted by section 1012, Code of Civil Procedure, such service is declared to be complete at the time of the deposit in the post office of the sender in a sealed envelope addressed to the person on whom it is to be served. Section 1013, Code Civ. Proc. In the early case of Heinlen v. Heilbron, 94 Cal. 636, 640, 30 P. 8, 9, the Supreme Court declared that: "The service by mail authorized by section 1012 does not contemplate a delivery as a part of the service, as is seen by the provision of section 1013, that 'the service is complete at the time of the deposit' in the post office. Such a service is termed a 'substituted service,' and is intended to take the place of and be equivalent in point of law and effect to a personal service." In Gill v. Southern Pacific Co., 174 Cal. 84, 87, 161 P. 1153, 1154, the court said: "The presumption is that such proof was duly made. The only evidence to the contrary is that he did not receive such notice. Upon the deposit of such notice in the mail, properly addressed the service thereof would be complete. Code Civ. Proc. § 1013. The record is silent upon the question whether or not such notice was deposited. The presumption that the fact was established must therefore prevail." The Heinlen Case was quoted with approval in McKeon v. Sambrano, 200 Cal. 739, 741, 255 P. 178, and we have found no authority to the contrary.

[4, 5] It will be noted that neither the notice of motion nor the affidavits attack the service of the notice of time of justification of the surety, and the uncontroverted evidence is that such service was made in the manner required by the statute. In addition to this evidence, the presumption is that such service was made as required (Gill v. Southern Pacific Co., supra); and then the further presumption applies here that the justice of the peace, at the time of the justification of the surety, having before him proof of service of the notice, must be presumed to have proceeded regularly and in accordance with law when he determined that due notice was given and thereafter approved the surety.

[6, 7] The only real opposition to the writ before this court is the attack upon the mode of procedure; the respondent insisting that certiorari is not the proper remedy. The cases when certiorari will or will not lie to review an order of this character are not clear, and we are not now disposed to enter into a discussion upon the mere question of the title to the remedy when we are satisfied that the petitioner is entitled to the relief. Though he has named his petition a proceeding in certiorari, he has pleaded everything which is essential to the issuance of a writ of mandate, and, when this is so, the rule is that this court may grant to the petitioner such relief as is warranted in the premises. Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 474, 476, 114 P. 978; Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 228, 236, 207 P. 903; Finn v. Butler, 195 Cal. 759, 235 P. 992.

That mandamus is the proper remedy here is demonstrated in Hennessy v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 368, 374, 228 P. 862, and the many authorities there cited holding that, when the trial court has decided, as a matter of law, upon its construction of a statute that it is without jurisdiction, mandamus to require the court to proceed with the trial is the proper remedy.

For the reasons stated, it is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandamus issue out of this court requiring the respondent to set aside its order dismissing the appeal in the action entitled Traders' Credit Corporation v. Lindley Marinello Shop et al., No. 115429, and to restore said cause for trial.

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an appeal from the judgment awarding damages for death of the plaintiff's husband. The plaintiff and her husband at about 10 o'clock at night January 13, 1928, alighted from the front end of a west-bound Municipal street car at the safety station on Ocean avenue opposite Cedro avenue in San Francisco. To what extent that neighborhood is populated the record does not disclose, nor does it disclose ordinary traffic conditions. The diagram brought up as a part of the record on appeal shows a light opposite the west end of the safety station. It shows another one on the south side of Ocean avenue about seventy feet west from the western property line of Cedro avenue. These lights were forty-four candle power. The streets in that part of the city are laid out in curves. The ground is hilly, and the streets are on grades up and down. On the night of the accident it was very dark. A storm of heavy wind and rain was taking place. Both Mr. and Mrs. Tucker were dressed in dark clothing. When they alighted from the street car Mrs. Tucker raised an umbrella. She testified that when the street car passed on she and her husband crossed directly to the southern sidewalk on Ocean avenue. If they did so, that course would take them within the bounds of the cross walk. Other witnesses testified that both Mr. and Mrs. Tucker were in the street some distance east of the crosswalk. As they were crossing the street Mrs. Tucker testified that her husband was at her right and slightly behind her. Just before they reached the southern side of Ocean avenue the defendant Frank Lambertson and two other men were driving east on Ocean avenue. They were in an automobile and Lambertson was driving. It is an admitted fact that Lambertson's car struck Mrs. Tucker, and that she fell over in the street, but this action is not maintained for injury to her. Seeing that he had hit a woman, Lambertson turned to his left, describing almost a complete circle, crossed the street car tracks, and, returning, parked in the intersection of the two avenues and went to the assistance of the plaintiff. After Lambertson and his companions got out of their automobile they saw the body of a man lying on his back across the rails of the east-bound street car tracks. Before the body could be removed a street car came from the west and ran over the body which was the body of the plaintiff's husband. In her complaint the plaintiff named as defendants Frank Lambertson, the owner of the automobile, the city of San Francisco, and W. F. Croteau, the motorman. The jury returned a verdict against all of the defendants, and all of them have appealed, bringing up one transcript but two sets of briefs.

[1] Appeal by Lambertson. The defendant claims the court erred in denying his motion for nonsuit and his motion for a directed verdict because there was no evidence in the record establishing any negligence on the part of this defendant. The respondent replies that there is. She calls to our attention the following facts: The night was very dark. It was storming quite heavily, and Lambertson's windshield was so covered with water that he could see through only a little space immediately in front of him and could not see to his right or left. Notwithstanding these facts he proceeded to drive forward at a speed of from fifteen to twenty miles an hour, and at the time of the accident his right wheels were approximately eight feet from the curb line and about the same distance from the nearest street car track. Driving in that manner he did not see the plaintiff until he was within four feet of her, whereupon he swerved to the left, but his right fender struck her and knocked her down. The decedent he did not see at all. Having called our attention to these facts the respondent asserts that there was evidence to take the case to the jury, and she relies on the rule which is succinctly stated in Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, at page 340, 208 P. 125, 127: "So, therefore, even though the statutory limitation of speed has not been exceeded, the rate of speed at which an automobile may be traveling may be held under some circumstances to be negligent. That is to say, the operator of an automobile is not necessarily exempt from liability for injuries to other persons occurring in a public street by showing simply that at the time of the accident he was running at a rate of speed allowed by law. He still remains bound to anticipate that he may meet persons at any point of the street, and he must, in order to avoid a charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid a collision with another person using proper care and caution, and if the situation requires he must slow up and stop." We think the rule is applicable to the facts, and that the point may not be sustained.

[2-4] The defendant also claims that there is no evidence in the record showing that the defendant's automobile ever came in contact with the deceased. That point involves a consideration of the conditions existing at the time and place. When the west-bound street car moved on, so far as the record discloses, there was no traffic, and there were no obstructions in the immediate neighborhood of the accident. Mr. Owen who was riding with the defendant testified that he saw Mrs. Tucker hit by the defendant's right-hand headlight. He first saw her just a flash of a second before that. He was seated on the front seat on the right-hand side of the defendant. When he saw Mrs. Tucker he also saw a faint outline of a man who seemed to be standing by the car track. The defendant's automobile at that time was about midway between the car track and the curb. The witness marked on the map the spot where he saw the man. That spot is almost directly opposite the place where Mrs. Tucker lay after she fell to the street. When the street car hit it, Mr. Tucker's body rested on the street car track some distance east of that point. The distance given by different witnesses varied. In view of the fact that Mr. Tucker was walking so close to his wife as testified to by her and as seen by Mr. Owen, the jury was justified in drawing the inference that Mr. Tucker was also hit by the defendant's automobile. As no intervening cause appears in the story told by the witnesses, the jury was justified in inferring that after being hit by the automobile the decedent fell over on the automobile and was by it carried forward and fell off on the street car tracks. While the body rested on the street car track it was motionless. Whether death had occurred we need not stop to inquire. Before the body could be removed from the track it was run over and mangled by the street car. Assuming that death had not ensued at the time the street car ran over and mangled the body of the decedent the jury was within its rights in bringing in a verdict against the defendant. 19 Cal. Jur., pp. 570–573; Sawyer v. So. Cal. Gas Co., 206 Cal. 366, 274 P. 544. The defendant claims that the decedent at the time of the accident was violating Ordinance 7691, New Series. That ordinance prohibits jay-walking. That claim was presented by evidence tendered by the defendant and by the instructions given by the trial court. The evidence on the subject is conflicting. Mrs. Tucker testified that when she and her husband got off the car they waited for the car to pass; that thereafter they walked directly to the sidewalk on the south side of Ocean avenue. If they did so they were not guilty of jay-walking. In support of the judgment, we must assume that the jury adopted the story as told by Mrs. Tucker and rejected the measurements as given by some of the other witnesses. Under these circumstances the point may not be sustained.

The defendant further claims that as Mrs. Tucker is the sole heir of her deceased husband, and as she was personally guilty of contributory negligence, which was a proximate cause of the death of her husband, therefore she may not recover. However, as we have just stated, the record does not show that the husband was guilty of contributory negligence. For the same reasons set forth above, it does not show that Mrs. Tucker was guilty of contributory negligence.

[5-7] The defendant complains because the court did not give certain instructions. The defendant's proposed instruction No. 8 assumed that Mrs. Tucker with her umbrella raised blanketed the view of the decedent. But the uncontradicted evidence is that he was between her and the on-coming automobile. Defendant's proposed instruction No. 10 was addressed to the subject of the defendant's acts when confronted with imminent danger. That subject was covered by instruction 109. Furthermore defendant's proposed instructions 8, 10, and 11 were all formula instructions, but no one of them purported to state all of the facts. The trial court did not err in refusing to give any one of them. Douglas v. Southern Pacific Co., 203 Cal. 390, 264 P. 237.

[8-12] Appeal of Croteau and of the city. These two defendants assert that they were not negligent, and that the verdict of the jury is not supported by the evidence. The plaintiff replies that the street car was not equipped with proper headlights so the motorman could see the track in front of him. He testified that he could not. To this reply these defendants quote section 9 of Ordinance 581 and assert that the headlight on the car complied with that ordinance. However, it is conceded that a person operating a street car must keep a lookout. Although his equipment may be such as complies with legal regulations, nevertheless the operator is bound to keep a vigilant outlook. 36 Cyc. 1460. Although his lights may conform with the calls of the statute, such fact is not conclusive that there was no negligence. 45 C. J. 689. These defendants ask us to hold that, if the car was equipped with a light complying with all of the calls of the ordinance mentioned, and, if at the time and place of the accident by reason of some other circumstance or circumstances the motorman could not see the track before him, nevertheless he was entitled to proceed through a populous district without exercising any additional care. By its verdict the jury has found the issue of negligence against these defendants. On the facts before us we are not disposed to say that it erred in doing so. The plaintiff contends that, when the deceased was seen standing by the street car track, manifestly he was alive. Therefore she contends that the presumption of law (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32) comes to her assistance, and that it will be presumed her husband continued to live until the street car ran over him. But, in almost the same breath that the foregoing testimony was developed, evidence came into the record that the decedent was, almost immediately thereafter, hit by an automobile, that he fell on its fender, that he was carried about seventy-five feet, and that his body was then dropped on the street car track, and that, for several seconds before the street car reached that point, his body lay on the track inert and motionless. In view of these additional facts, we are not called upon to say whether the presumption cited continued or was dispelled. Out of the same set of facts certain inferences may be drawn. Reasonable men contemplating the facts recited might draw different inferences. One man might reach the conclusion that Mr. Tucker was dead before the street car ran over him. Another man might reach the conclusion that he was not dead and that the street car ran over and killed him. The jury was thus called upon to select one inference or the other. These two defendants earnestly contend that under such circumstances the evidence is insufficient, and they cite and rely on such authorities as Wilbur v. Emergency Hospital Ass'n, 27 Cal. App. 751, 151 P. 155, and the cases there cited and reviewed. Those authorities are hardly in point. They deal with instances where one sought to build one inference on another inference. Of course our statute does not permit of such reasoning. Code Civ. Proc. § 1960. We think that the rule applicable in the instant case is to be found in Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co., 190 Cal. 421, 213 P. 42, 26 A. L. R. 123. At page 426 of 190 Cal., 213 P. 42, 44, the court said: "This court has frequently held that even though all the facts are admitted or uncontradicted, nevertheless, if it appears that either one of two inferences may fairly and reasonably be deduced from those facts there still remains in the case a question of fact to be determined by the jury (or by the trial judge where the case is tried without a jury), and that the verdict of the jury or the finding of the trial judge thereon cannot be set aside by this court on the ground that it is not sustained by the evidence. Anderson v. Los Angeles Transfer Co., 170 Cal. 66, 148 P. 212. In so far as the evidence is subject to opposing inferences, it must upon a review thereof be regarded in the light most favorable to the support of the judgment. Woodard v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 513, 519, 520, 153 P. 951; Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 367, 139 P. 800. 'In reviewing a question of this kind, all the inferences reasonably possible from the evidence favorable to the plaintiff (the prevailing party) must be indulged by this court.' Bandle v. Commercial Bank of Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 546, 547, 174 P. 44, 45." The rule there stated was repeated by the Supreme Court in denying a transfer in the proceeding entitled Estate of Wallace, 64 Cal. App. 107, 117, 220 P. 682. See, also, Ley v. Bishopp, 88 Cal. App. 313, 263 P. 369; Giannini v. S. P. Co., 98 Cal. App. 126, 276 P. 618. Following the rule stated in the cases last cited in support of the judgment, we must assume that the jury drew the inference that Mr. Tucker was not dead at the time the street car passed over his body.

As to each and all of the defendants the judgment is affirmed.

CONREY, P. J.

The plaintiff executed to appellant a five-year lease of real property, consisting of a lot and several unfurnished bungalows. Appellant furnished the bungalows, and executed to the plaintiff as security for performance of the covenants of the lease a chattel mortgage on the furniture. Thereafter appellant assigned said lease to the defendant Herbert. In connection with said assignment, appellant agreed with plaintiff that appellant would continue to be bound by the terms of the lease. On February 10, 1925, three and one-half months' rent being at the time delinquent, the complaint alleges that the defendants vacated and abandoned the premises, and that the plaintiff informed each of them that she would endeavor to lease the premises and keep them rented for and on account of the defendants, and, if the amounts received were insufficient to meet the obligations of the lessees under the lease, plaintiff would hold them accountable for the difference; that pursuant thereto plaintiff did endeavor to keep the premises rented for and on account of the defendants and each of them, and by reason thereof received certain rentals. This action was brought to recover the difference between the net amount received (after paying certain necessary expenses) and the accrued rent for the time to and including the month of October, 1926. The principal litigated issue relates to said alleged abandonment of the premises and the conduct of the plaintiff on reassuming possession after the alleged abandonment. On these issues the decision of the trial court was in favor of the plaintiff.

The chattel mortgage provided that the mortgagee might take possession of the mortgaged property upon failure of appellant to pay rents when due. Upon the 5th day of February, 1925, by reason of rent being unpaid at that time, plaintiff commenced an action for possession of the mortgaged personal property. The writ of replevin was issued. On February 10, the sheriff, proceeding under said writ, took possession of said personal property on the leased premises. According to the testimony of the plaintiff, she went to the premises at that time, but did not take possession of anything. The sheriff was there proceeding under the writ, and Mrs. Herbert was "packing to leave." Plaintiff came back the following day and found that Mrs. Herbert had moved away and the premises were unoccupied.

Appellant first contends that the evidence is insufficient to prove abandonment of the premises on the part of the defendants. We are satisfied that there is no merit in this point.

[1, 2] It is next contended that "the court erred in finding under the evidence that the same was sufficient to allow the respondent to enter the leasehold and rent the premises for the benefit of appellant, holding the appellant accountable for the difference between the highest rent obtainable and the sum specified in the lease." The third and last point is that: "There is no evidence in the record that supports or tends to support findings of fact No. XIII and XIV and it was error of the court to find from the evidence that the plaintiff and respondent did not remain in occupancy." Said finding XIII is to the effect that it is not true that the plaintiff remained in occupancy of the leased premises and all or each of the units of said bungalow court. Finding XIV is in effect that it is not true that by any act of the plaintiff the defendants, or either of them, were prevented from re-entering the demised premises or continuing the business of renting the said property, or were compelled to lose any of the personal property in the way of furnishings of said apartments. The findings are amply sustained by the evidence. The defendants having abandoned the leased premises, plaintiff in connection with her resumption of possession thereof very clearly notified the defendants that she was proceeding to relet the bungalows for the benefit of the defendants and with the intention of requiring them to pay the rent provided for in the lease, or so much thereof as she could not obtain from the tenants to whom the bungalows would be rented. The fact that respondent herself occupied one of the bungalows appears to have been a necessary incident to her effort to rent the others, since, in order to conduct the business, it was necessary for her to be on the premises. Credit was given to the defendants for the reasonable value of the bungalow occupied by the plaintiff, as well as for the rents received from tenants obtained for the other bungalows.

[3] So far as the personal property is concerned, it appears that judgment for possession was obtained by the plaintiff, and, in accordance with the terms of the chattel mortgage, the mortgaged property was sold by the plaintiff, and the proceeds of sale were credited to the defendants. It appears to us that the respondent proceeded in accordance with her rights under the lease in such manner that she did not lose her right to recover judgment against the defendants for the unpaid balance of rent which became due; that is to say, for the difference between what she was able in good faith to let the property for and the amount provided to be paid under the lease agreement. Rehkopf v. Wirz, 31 Cal. App. 695, 161 P. 285.

The judgment is affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiff sought to recover the benefits to which he claimed to be entitled under the disability provisions of three life insurance policies. Upon a trial by the court sitting without a jury, judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, from which judgment defendant appeals.

On July 19, 1926, plaintiff became totally disabled as the result of a disease known as hyper-thyroidism and remained so totally disabled from that date until February 14, 1927. Plaintiff returned to work on February 15 and was not totally disabled thereafter. The court found that "plaintiff became wholly disabled by a disease and was prevented thereby from engaging in any occupation or employment for wages or profit for a period of more than three consecutive months, to-wit, from July 19, 1926, to February 14, 1927 * * *"; that "said disease was of such a nature that such total disability might have been and was likely to have been permanent.

and have continued for life"; and that "during said period, due proof of a claim under said policies that such disability would be permanent and continue for life, was pending." Thereupon the court awarded plaintiff disability benefits under the policies covering the period from July 19, 1926, to February 14, 1927.

[1] The main question presented on this appeal involves the construction of the disability provisions of the policies. Appellant contends that recovery under the policies depends upon due proof of a disability which is both total and permanent.

The disability provisions of the three policies were the same, and the following paragraphs contained in all three of the policies will be numbered to facilitate reference thereto.

1. "Upon due proof that * * * the insured has become wholly disabled by bodily injuries or disease and will be continuously and wholly prevented thereby for life from engaging in any occupation or employment for wage or profit, the company will waive the payment of any premiums which may fall due on this contract during such disability and will pay from the commencement of such disability and during its continuance the disability income stated on the first page of this contract. * * *"

2. "Independently of all causes the company will consider as permanent total disability the entire and irrecoverable loss of the sight of both eyes, or of use of both hands or of both feet, or of one hand and one foot.

3. "Pending due proof of a claim hereunder in behalf of the insured that an existing total disability will be permanent and continue for life, when it shall appear that the insured has been wholly disabled by bodily injuries or disease and has been prevented thereby from engaging in any occupation or employment for wage or profit for a period of not less than three consecutive months, the company will grant the aforesaid benefits from the commencement of such disability and during its continuance."

We find no merit in appellant's contention that the insured was not entitled to the benefits of the policies in the absence of due proof that the disability was both total and permanent. The authorities in other jurisdictions construing somewhat similar policies are not harmonious. Penn. Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Milton, 160 Ga. 168, 127 S. E. 140, 40 A. L. R. 1382; Wenstrom v. Ætna Life Insurance Co., 55 N. D. 647, 215 N. W. 93, 54 A. L. R. 289; Shipp v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 146 Miss. 18, 111 So. 453; Hawkins v. John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co., 205 Iowa, 760, 218 N. W. 313; Ginell v. Prudential Insurance Co., 237 N. Y. 554, 143 N. E. 740, reversing 205 App. Div. 494, 200 N. Y. S. 261. But in none of the policies involved in the cases cited were provisions to be found similar to those contained in the above paragraph 3. We may assume that in the absence of paragraph 3 recovery by the insured would depend in all cases, except those specifically mentioned in paragraph 2, "upon due proof" that the insured had become totally and permanently disabled, but in the nature of things the difficulty of making due proof that a total disability is permanent is at once apparent. Injuries or diseases, including hyper-thyroidism, tuberculosis, and others, may totally disable a person for a long period of time. The person so injured or afflicted may be totally disabled for life or on the other hand skillful care and treatment over a period of time may demonstrate that he has made a complete or practically complete recovery resulting only in a partial disability, if any. In many cases time alone will determine whether the total disability was in fact permanent or temporary. Until the necessary time has elapsed in a given case, the making of due proof that the total disability is permanent is practically impossible.

As we view the policies, the difficulty of making such proof of the permanency of the total disability is recognized and paragraph 3 is added to cover the numerous cases in which a total disability exists for more than three months with a possibility that such total disability will continue indefinitely. The first words of paragraph 3 are, "Pending due proof of a claim. * * *" None of the words employed in this phrase are defined in the policies. It should be further noted that the policies are silent regarding the type of notice, claim, or due proof that is required. In modern usage, the word "pending" more frequently has the sense of "while awaiting" and the word "due" means "adequate; sufficient." Webster's New International Dictionary. Without resorting to a liberal construction but merely giving to these words their ordinary meaning, we construe paragraph 3 to mean that while awaiting adequate and sufficient proof of a claim that an existing total disability lasting for at least three months will be permanent, the company will grant the benefits during the continuance of such total disability. As so construed, the insured was not only entitled to the disability benefits under the policy upon "due proof" as provided in paragraph 1, but was also entitled to the benefits while awaiting "due proof" of his claim under the circumstances set forth in paragraph 3. Where, as found by the court in the present case, there is a total disability exceeding three months occasioned by a disease which is of such a nature that it may result in permanent total disability and a claim that such total disability will be permanent is pending and awaiting adequate and sufficient proof of such permanency, the insured is clearly entitled under paragraph 3 to the disability benefits of the policy during the continuance of the total disability.

[2] The findings made by the trial court find adequate support in the evidence and admissions made by the pleadings and no direct attack is made upon any of said findings. Appellant in its briefs lays great stress on the fact that respondent admitted on the trial that he was not totally disabled on February 16, 1927, at which time he filed with the company a statement on the company's form entitled "Claimant's Statement—Permanent Total Disability Claim," in which statement he said "only recently recovery of my condition was assured me." If we understand appellant's contention, it claims, first, that such testimony and statement affirmatively show that the total disability was not in fact permanent, and, second, that such testimony and statement further show that respondent's total disability had terminated when this claim or claimant's statement was filed. We find no merit in the first point that the total disability was not in fact permanent for the reasons hereinabove stated. We believe that the second point is likewise without merit owing to the answer in which appellant "admits that on or about October 19, 1926, plaintiff gave an alleged notice to defendant that he, the plaintiff, claimed to be wholly disabled by a disease of such a nature that such total disability might be permanent and continue for life and was then, and for more than three consecutive months immediately preceding had been, prevented by such alleged disability from engaging in any occupation or employment for wage or profit." Conceding without deciding that under paragraph 3 of the policies the assured must give notice of a claim during the existence of the total disability and before its termination, the admission by appellant that respondent gave notice of such claim on October 19, 1926, is sufficient; no particular form of claim or notice of claim being required by the terms of the policy.

[3, 4] Two further points are urged by appellant. Error is claimed in the admission of certain oral and documentary evidence relating to two health policies which the respondent carried with the appellant company, which policies covered total disability without regard to its permanency. By its answer appellant had denied that respondent's disability was either total or permanent. The admission of the evidence relating to the health policies was not error, as it was offered and admitted solely on the issue of whether the disability was total and as an admission of the appellant by the payment of the benefits under the health policies that respondent's disability was total. The other point raised relates to alleged error in admitting evidence of conversations with appellant's agent relating to the coverage of the policies at the time of their purchase. If any error existed in the admission of this testimony, it was not prejudicial. Under the wording of paragraph 3 of the policies, construed without resort to parol evidence, respondent was entitled to recover.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action by Gust E. Jianou against the Pickwick Stages System. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, and Barry J. Colding, Theodore Hale, and Carroll B. Crawford, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Henry L. Ford, and Eugene S. Selvage, both of Eureka, for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a judgment for damages for personal injuries which were sustained as a result of an auto stage casualty.

The plaintiff was riding as a passenger in the defendant's auto stage from Eureka to Crannell. At a point near McKinleyville, the stage suddenly plunged from the highway into a ditch where it turned partly over against an embankment. The plaintiff was thrown violently against a seat in the car. His shoulder was broken. His back and face were cut and bruised. He also received some internal injuries. He suffered much pain and was confined in a hospital for several months for treatment for these injuries. Considerable expense for medical and hospital treatment was incurred by him.

This suit for damages was tried by the court without a jury. Findings were adopted favorable to the plaintiff. A judgment was thereupon rendered in his behalf for the sum of $2,692.50. From this judgment the defendant has appealed.

The appellant contends the court erred in failing to grant its motion for a nonsuit. The amount of the judgment is not questioned. The chief point relied upon for reversal of the judgment is a claim that the evidence fails to support the finding that the defendant was guilty of negligence which proximately caused the injuries sustained by the plaintiff. It is assumed the plaintiff relies upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, and that, having proved the accident from which the injuries resulted, the burden shifted to the defendant to refute the inference of negligence. The appellant asserts, however, that the plaintiff, having alleged the specific acts of negligence upon which he relies, thereby waived the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

[1, 2] It is the established rule that one who relies upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to establish a cause based upon negligence must allege merely general acts of negligence. Upon the contrary, when one alleges specific acts of negligence upon which he relies, the pleading refutes the theory of res ipsa loquitur. The very hypothesis of the doctrine is that the plaintiff has no knowledge of just what caused the accident, and that, since the instrumentality by means of which the accident occurred is solely within the control of the defendant, negligence will be inferred upon proof of a prima facie case, in the absence of an adequate explanation on the part of the defendant exempting him from liability. Connor v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 189 Cal. 1, 207 P. 378, 26 A. L. R. 1462; Ingledue v. Davidson, 102 Cal. App. 697, 283 P. 837; 19 Cal. Jur. 713, § 127.

[3] We are of the opinion the complaint in the present action does not plead such specific acts of negligence as will relieve the defendant of the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. But, assuming without so deciding, that the allegations of the complaint result in a waiver of that doctrine, and that the plaintiff failed to affirmatively prove specific facts constituting negligence on the part of the defendant which proximately caused the injuries sustained by the plaintiff, this omission is fully supplied by the specific admissions of the defendant which are contained in its answer. The answer affirmatively alleges the precise defects of the auto stage wheel as the cause of the accident which were referred to and relied upon by the plaintiff as actionable negligence.

The complaint alleges: "The said defendant so carelessly and negligently operated and conducted its said automobile stage that a wheel broke or collapsed thereon." It will be observed that the complaint does not state what specific acts of the defendant caused the wheel to collapse or break. It is merely averred generally that the negligent conduct of the defendant caused the wheel to break. The nature of the acts which caused the wheel to break are not even suggested. It is inferred from the language employed that the plaintiff was ignorant of the specific acts of negligence which caused the accident. The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is therefore applicable. Lawrence v. Pickwick Stages, Inc., 68 Cal. App. 494, 229 P. 885; Leitert v. Pickwick

[4] Carriers of passengers for hire are required to use the utmost precaution and diligence for their safety. Section 2100, Civ. Code; Kline v. Santa Barbara, etc., Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 741, 745, 90 P. 125; Drury v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 102 Cal. App. 58, 63, 282 P. 525.

The fact that the accident was caused by a broken, defective, and disconnected rim on one of the wheels of defendant's auto stage was admitted by the answer, which avers: "For a further, separate and distinct answer and defense * * * defendant alleges: That the tire-rim on one of the wheels of defendant's said automobile, which (defect) caused the tire to blow out on said automobile stage of defendant became broken and disconnected and was defective, thereby rendering further control of said automobile stage by the operator thereof impossible; that defendant used all reasonable precaution and diligence and the highest degree of care by way of inspecting the said automobile stage, and especially the wheels and tire-rims and tires on said automobile stage immediately prior to the accident * * * but that said defect, or defects were latent and not susceptible to discovery and that said accident was wholly unavoidable on the part of this defendant."

[5, 6] The cause of the accident is therefore admitted by the pleadings to have been a defective or broken rim of an automobile wheel. This admission is binding on the defendant so far as the actual cause of the accident is concerned. It required no further proof on the part of the plaintiff. 19 Cal. Jur. 688, § 111. The question of inspection was a matter of defense. The motion for a nonsuit was therefore properly denied.

[7] Having admitted that the accident was caused by a defective or broken rim of a wheel, the question as to whether the defendant exercised due care to discover and repair this defect, and thus avoid the accident, was a problem for the court to determine from the evidence adduced. By the rendering of the judgment against the defendant, its affirmative allegation that an adequate inspection of the wheel was made must be assumed to have been found against the defendant.

[8] A failure of the court to adopt findings upon an issue raised by the answer is not reversible error, where the finding, if made to support the judgment, would necessarily be adverse to the appellant. 2 Cal. Jur. 1033, § 614; Kling v. Gustafson, 101 Cal. App. 58, 63, 281 P. 407. The court would have been warranted in finding from the evidence that no adequate inspection of the wheel in question was made by the defendant sufficient to purge it of negligence. The only evidence which the record contains on this subject of inspection was furnished by defendant's witness, Shirley Callahan. He testified:

"I am employed by the Pickwick Company * * * to inspect * * * the tires on each bus as it comes in. * * *

"Q. Have you ever worked manufacturing tires more than two weeks? A. No sir. * * *

"Q. What did you do to inspect that tire? * * * A. I had the wheels off of the ground and turned the wheels around to inspect the tire to see if there was any cuts on it anywhere, or if it was worn. * * *

"Q. Now what did you do to inspect the rims? A. You can also inspect the rims as you are turning the wheel around from the outside and you can also get the looks of the rim from the inside. * * *

"Q. You didn't have the rims off of each of the wheels though, did you? A. No sir.

"Q. You didn't take the tire off the rims, did you? A. No sir.

"Q. Now there are machines * * * to test the metal condition or soundness of those rims aren't there? A. I don't know.

"Q. You are not familiar with that? A. No sir.

"Q. But at any rate you didn't do that? A. No sir. * * *

"Q. Did you look at this rim after the collision? A. No. sir.

"Q. Have you seen either one of those rims since? A. No sir. * * *

"Q. Are you familiar with the tests that they make there to determine whether wheels are sound? A. No sir.

"Q. Did you make any tests that day to determine whether or not that wheel would dish in or out? A. No sir.

"Q. (Addressed to Mr. Hale, attorney for the defendant): Do you happen to have either of the wheels here, or the rims here? A. No sir. I have not them here and I couldn't produce them. I tried to get them, and they are not here. * * *

"Q. Now, Mr. Callahan * * * you simply checked up the tires, tested the air and looked at the two tires and looked at the rim, isn't that correct? A. Yes."

[9] It is fair to assume from the foregoing testimony that Shirley Callahan was employed to examine the rubber tires and see that they contained the proper amount of air. All that he did to inspect the metal rims was to observe the portion which was visible as he turned the wheels around. He does not even pretend to have critically examined the rims. He was busily engaged in looking at the rubber tires for incisions or worn places. Absolutely nothing of real value was done to detect any flaws or defects in the metal rims. A little hammering with a mallet might have detected a crack or defect in the rim from the vibration or sound. The court was warranted in holding this superficial examination of the rims was insufficient to constitute adequate inspection thereof. If it be true, as the defendant alleges, that "the tire-rim on one of the wheels * * * (was) broken and disconnected and defective" so as to cause the blowing out of the tire, it would seem that a casual inspection should have disclosed the defect. At least the evidence regarding the inspection of the wheels fails to furnish that degree of "utmost care and diligence" required of a common carrier of passengers to insure their safety. The broken wheel was not even produced at the trial. Its production might have disclosed a crack in the rim which had existed for some time prior to the accident. We are of the opinion the evidence is ample to support the findings.

The judgment is affirmed.

That subscriber filed renunciation of award of excess freight charges, and elected to accept payment in another case did not affect auditor's right to compensation under agreement.

> Under the agreement, auditors agreed to make audit of freight bills, and parties to agreement agreed that collections from audit were to be divided equally between the parties on a 50 per cent. basis, and that collections were to be made payable to subscriber but transmitted to subscriber through auditors. After auditor had filed claim with Railroad Commission and Railroad Commission had made an award of excess charges, subscriber filed renunciation of such claim and requested Railroad Commission to enter supplemental order requiring payment of excess charges under provisions of another complaint which had been filed.

5. Contracts 🔑190.

Reasonable construction of freight auditing agreement was that subscriber would not withdraw any freight bills covered by contract until final conclusion had been reached.

> The agreement provided that claims would be handled to conclusion by auditors and that their action would in no manner interfere with claims which subscriber might file, and provided for return of freight bills to subscriber after the audit.

6. Contracts 🔑190.

Under freight auditing agreement, auditor was entitled to compensation based upon collections made irrespective of party making collection.

Meaning attached to word "audit" by parties to freight audit agreement was controlling.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Guy F. Bush, Judge.

Action by Walter A. Sweat against J. W. Jameson, doing business under fictitious name of the Jameson Oil Company, and another. From the judgment, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Glensor, Clewe, Van Dine & Turcotte, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hugh Gordon, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff had judgment in this action against the J. W. Jameson Corporation, from which judgment the corporation appeals.

The record shows that on January 14, 1924, the following instrument was executed by the Jameson Oil Company, and delivered to the plaintiff in this action, to wit:

"Freight Audit Contract. Bailey & Sweat,
"San Francisco. * * *

"The undersigned hereby agrees to permit, and Bailey & Sweat hereby agrees to make, an audit of the freight bills of the undersigned for any period agreeable to the undersigned (but not to exceed eight years) prior to this date.

"In full consideration of said service, both parties agree that collections from this audit are to be divided equally between the undersigned and Bailey & Sweat on a fifty (5) per cent basis.

"It is expressly understood and agreed that aforesaid collections are to be made payable to the undersigned but transmitted to the undersigned, through Bailey & Sweat.

"It is also understood that claims will be handled to conclusion by Bailey & Sweat and that their action will in no manner interfere with claims which the undersigned may file. After audit the aforesaid freight bills are to be returned to the undersigned.

At the conclusion of the trial the court made its findings, from which we summarize the following: That the plaintiff and A. L. Bailey were associated and engaged in business as traffic managers and rate experts; that the writing which we have set forth was duly executed and delivered to Bailey & Sweat; that Bailey & Sweat accepted the employment and proceeded to audit the various freight bills of the defendant for shipments made over the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway, and that the audit disclosed overcharges in the sum of $5,006.38; that the firm of Bailey & Sweat, as partners, was dissolved on June 1, 1924; that, on or about the date of the dissolution of said partnership, the plaintiff gave written notice of such dissolution to the defendant, by causing a letter announcing such dissolution to be inclosed in a sealed envelope, with the postage prepaid thereon, and directed to the defendant at its place of business; that, after said dissolution, the business theretofore conducted by the copartnership of Bailey & Sweat was carried on by the plaintiff; that, after the completion of the audit referred to herein, the plaintiff filed with the Railroad Commission of the state of California, on behalf of said defendant, a claim for the recovery of said excessive charges, and prosecuted the same to conclusion, and recovered judgment thereon in a proceeding before the Railroad Commission designated as "Case No. 2038"; that said claim was set forth in a formal complaint, prepared in the manner required by the Railroad Commission, which complaint was signed by the defendant on August 29, 1924; that same was filed with the Railroad Commission on September 6, 1924; that, at the time said complaint was signed by the defendant, and at all times thereafter, said defendant had full knowledge of the contents thereof, and of the purpose for which the same was filed, and of the fact that said action was being prosecuted by the plaintiff as the successor in interest of the copartnership of Bailey & Sweat; that on or about March 5, 1925, the Railroad Commission filed its opinion and order in said cause No. 2038, directing the said Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company to refund and repay to the said J. W. Jameson Corporation, defendant herein, the excessive charges in the sum of $5,006.38, with interest thereon in the sum of $831.48, aggregating the total sum of $5,837.86; that thereafter, and on or about the 11th day of March, 1925, the defendant filed with the said Railroad Commission a renunciation of its claim as set forth in case No. 2038, and requested the said Railroad Commission to enter a supplemental order requiring that said Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company refund and repay the said excessive charges to the defendant herein, under the provisions of a complaint which had been filed with said Railroad Commission by the defendant on or about July 16, 1924, in a proceeding designated as "Case No. 2023"; that, in pursuance of said renunciation and request, the Railroad Commission made and entered its supplemental order directing said excessive charges to be refunded to the defendant in the proceeding designated as "Case No. 2023." The court further found that the hearing in case No. 2023 was held on September 11, 1924, and judgment of the Railroad Commission rendered thereon on February 5, 1925; that the hearing before the Railroad Commission in case No. 2038 was had on December 17, 1924, and judgment rendered therein on March 5, 1925; that all the work of prosecuting the claim set forth in case No. 2038, and all of the work auditing said freight bills and transportation records upon which said case was based had been fully performed and completed by the said Bailey & Sweat, and the plaintiff herein, prior to the date on which judgment was rendered by said Railroad Commission in case No. 2023; that thereafter, and on June 27, 1925, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company paid the said defendants, in pursuance of said orders heretofore referred to, the sum of $8,374.32, and that said payment included the sum of $5,837.86, which constituted the excessive charges disclosed by the audit made by Bailey & Sweat, as set forth in the complaint filed in case No. 2038.

The findings further show the assignment by L. A. Bailey to the plaintiff herein of all of his interest in and to the contract, and the proceedings arising therefrom mentioned in this opinion. The court further found that the defendant was not prejudiced in any particular by reason of the dissolution of the partnership of Bailey & Sweat. Judgment accordingly went for the plaintiff with the compensation specified in the written contract of employment.

The record in this case shows that, some time after the execution of the agreement made and delivered to Bailey & Sweat, on January 14, 1924, the defendant retained the Carmichael Traffic Corporation to \institute proceedings before the Railroad Commission for the purpose of obtaining reparation and repayment of excessive rate charges made by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, and that thereafter, and on July 6, 1924, the Carmichael Traffic Corporation filed, on behalf of the defendant, a claim against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, in a case known as, and designated "Case No. 2023." Thereafter, and on August 23, 1924, the defendant telegraphed to the plaintiff as follows: "Gentlemen: This will acknowledge receipt of freight bills that you have audited for us. You did not return the freight bills covering shipments from Santa Fe Springs, moving prior to April 26, 1923, and since we have filed a formal complaint with California Railroad Commissioners, involving rates from Santa Fe Springs to Los Angeles, during the period July 1, 1922, to April 26, 1923, it is imperative that we have all those freight bills, and will thank you to return them to us at once. Yours truly, (Signed) Jameson Oil Company." The reply to this telegram was made by an attorney by the name of G. H. Baker, from which letter we take the following excerpts: "Bailey & Sweat have turned over to me for reply your telegram of the 23rd relative to the return of freight bills covering the period to April 26th." This letter further states that the defendant was advised by Mr. Sweat that the purpose of collecting the bills was to file a formal complaint for reparation, and that a complaint for that purpose was being prepared, further stating that the interest of the defendant would be looked after, etc. Following this, the defendant wrote the following letter: "Los Angeles, August 28, 1924. Mr. Gwyn H. Baker, Attorney-at-Law, American Bank Bldg., San Francisco, Calif. Dear Sir: Yours of the 23rd at hand. According to our understanding with Bailey & Sweat, the contract calls for an audit of our freight bills only; the right to file complaint we reserved ourselves, and have appointed Mr. Carmichael to handle such complaints for us. We would ask you to deliver our outstanding freight bills to Messrs. Glensor, Clewe and Van Dine, attorneys, located in the Mills Bldg., San Francisco, when they call for same. We believe this will clear the matter up, and remain, Very truly yours, Jameson Oil Co., M. P. Simon, Manager."

A few days after the writing of this letter it appears that a complaint was prepared by G. H. Baker, at the request of the plaintiff, for and on behalf of the defendant, based upon the claims to which we have referred as having been audited by the plaintiff, and this complaint was signed by M. P. Simon as manager of the defendant. This complaint, as we have stated, was filed with the Railroad Commission on September 8, 1924, and constituted the basis of case No. 2038, as hereinbefore stated.

The claim of the appellant is that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover upon the contract hereinbefore set forth, and that, if any cause of action exists in favor of the plaintiff, as against the defendant, it is one for damages.

[1] It is likewise claimed on the part of the appellant that the instrument of employment set forth herein was obtained by fraud and misrepresentation. We may here state that a careful study of the transcript fails to disclose any testimony upon which a finding to that effect could be based. The record shows that a man by the name of Hutchinson, who had been connected with traffic associations and engaged in business as the traffic manager and rate expert, took the complaint constituting the basis for action No. 2038, to Mr. Simon; that Mr. Simon read it; that, at the very time that Hutchinson took the complaint to Mr. Simon for his signature, Mr. Carmichael of the Carmichael Traffic Corporation, was present; that some considerable conversation was had relative to the signing of the complaint, and in that conversation Mr. Simon stated that Bailey & Sweat were the first to discover the overcharges, and were entitled to handle the claim. The record shows further testimony to the effect that Simon stated that it did not matter to him whether Bailey & Sweat or Sweat handled the matter, this, in relation to the dissolution of the partnership of Bailey & Sweat. The record also shows that Simon stated that his telegram relative to return of the freight bills might be disregarded.

[2] Upon this appeal it is claimed that Simon had no right or authority to sign the complaint filed in action No. 2038, as manager of the defendant. A complete answer to this contention is found in the letter dated August 28, 1924, addressed to Gwyn H. Baker, and signed "Jameson Oil Co., M. P. Simon, Manager." This letter shows clearly that the testimony of Simon taken upon the trial of this action, as to his authority to sign the complaint as manager for the defendant, might very well be disregarded by the trial court.

[3] We do not need to discuss any questions relating to the dissolution of the partnership of Bailey & Sweat, nor as to the authority of Sweat to complete the business undertaken by the partnership, and to retain the services of G. H. Baker to prepare the complaint filed in action No. 2038, by reason of the fact that the signing of the complaint by the manager of the appellant, as we have just stated, constituted a ratification of everything that the plaintiff in this action had done. The record in this case furnishes sufficient testimony to this effect, if the trial court believed the testimony of the witness Hutchinson. This testimony shows that the defendant did not desire to discontinue or dispense with the services of the plaintiff by reason of the dissolution of the partnership, and, in signing the complaint which had been prepared at the request of the plaintiff and filing with the Railroad Commission, only one conclusion can follow therefrom, and that is that the plaintiff was authorized to proceed.

Appellant likewise attacks several of the findings of the trial court, the first of which is directed against finding No. 4, which is to the effect that Bailey & Sweat accepted employment, audited the various freight bills, and that the audit disclosed that the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company had exacted and collected from the defendant for shipments made by said defendant over its lines excessive charges in the aggregate sum of $5,006.38. Technically, the contention of the appellant is true; as a matter of fact, it is untrue, because the exact amount of the excessive charges were undetermined until the Railroad Commission had filed its orders and judgments in the cases heretofore referred to. Likewise finding No. 5 to the effect that the auditing of the freight bills had been concluded prior to June 1, 1924, is not strictly accurate, but the materiality of this finding is not apparent, for the simple reason that, after auditing, the defendant, by signing the complaint, authorized whatever further proceedings were necessary to prosecute the claims to judgment. Finding No. 6, to the effect that the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant of the dissolution of the partnership of Bailey & Sweat, does not appear to be supported by the testimony. This again is wholly immaterial by reason of what we have stated herein of the occurrences that took place at the time of the signing of the complaint by M. P. Simon as manager for the defendant in this action.

The record further shows, as we have stated, that judgment was entered in both cases; that the testimony used in the hearing had upon case No. 2023 was also used, by stipulation, at the hearing upon case No. 2038.

[4] It is true that no money was collected under case No. 2038, but the mere fact that the defendant filed a renunciation of the award in that case, and elected to accept payment under the orders made in case No. 2023, cannot make any difference as to the right of the plaintiff to compensation, as provided for in the written agreement.

Nothing has been called to our attention which shows that the appellant did not understand fully just what it was doing when the written instrument, dated January 14, 1924, was executed and delivered to Bailey & Sweat. Nothing has been called to our attention showing that the appellant objected in any manner to the handling of claims against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company, until the Carmichael Traffic Corporation sought employment to prosecute actions based upon the same claims. Nor does the record in fact show any complaint made by the appellant as against anything done or not done by the plaintiff, save and except as to the return of the freight bills, and here again the record shows testimony to the effect that the manager stated the telegram in relation to the return of the freight bills might be disregarded.

[5, 6] The controversy in this action appears to have arisen by reason of the fact of there being two competing agencies for the business of prosecuting claims for the recovery of excessive rate charges, and that the appellant is in the position of having retained both agencies for the same work, or practically for the same work. While the original agreement does specify that the action of the plaintiff shall in no manner interfere with claims which the defendant might file, the reasonable interpretation of the agreement is that the defendant did not intend to withdraw from the plaintiff any of the business covered by the contract, and which, by the terms thereof, were placed within the custody of Bailey & Sweat to handle, until a final conclusion had been reached. However, the agreement provides for compensation at a certain rate upon collections being made, and that agreement holds, irrespective of the party making the collection, so far as it pertains to the claims intrusted to Bailey & Sweat. This portion of the agreement appears to be entirely overlooked by the appellant.

[7] The appellant's contention that no audit was ever made, and the citation of authorities as to what constitutes an audit, we think entirely immaterial, as the appellant, a party to the agreement, being in the transportation business, knew practically what work had to be performed, and technical definitions would neither add to nor take away from the meaning attached to the word "audit" by the parties to the instrument, upon which this action is based.

A number of other technical objections are urged by the appellant, which we have considered, but, as they do not go to the merits of this cause, it would serve no useful purpose to set forth reasons why they do not affect the judgment which was rendered in this cause.

Being of the opinion that the material findings of the trial court, upon which the judgment in this action rests, are supported by the testimony, it follows that the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

McDANIEL, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment for plaintiff in a personal injury case tried without a jury by the court.

The cause of action arose from an automobile collision which occurred at about 4:30 p. m., June 30, 1929, at the intersection of Twenty-Seventh street and S street, which streets intersect at right angles, Twenty-Seventh street extending north and south and S street east and west, in the city of Sacramento, Cal. Plaintiff and respondent was driving his automobile toward the south on Twenty-Seventh street as he approached the intersection. The defendant and appellant approached the intersection from the west on S street. The machines collided in the intersection at a place on the west side of Twenty-Seventh street, about 7 feet from the west curb line of Twenty-Seventh street and 9 or 10 feet north of the south curb line of S street, and near the southwest corner of the intersection. When the respondent, at the lawful rate of 15 miles per hour, reached the intersection, he looked to the left for traffic, then to the right, and saw appellant approach from his right at a place distant 75 to 100 feet west of the intersection, driving at an estimated speed of 40 to 45 miles per hour. Plaintiff's car, after the impact, swung to the left, stopping near the southeast corner of the intersection. Plaintiff was thrown to the pavement, receiving the personal injuries of which he complains. The appellant's car after the impact swung to the right and came to rest at the curb line of Twenty-Seventh street, south of the intersection.

Respondent saw appellant's car at all times from the moment he first observed it until the moment of collision. He testified that the brakes on his car were in good order; that, however, he did not apply his brakes because he believed defendant would yield the right of way to him; and that defendant had "plenty of time to let me pass her." There is some conflict in the testimony as to the exact manner in which parts of the respective cars contacted. Respondent did not change his speed of 15 miles per hour, nor did appellant slow down at all from her speed of 40 to 45 miles per hour. The right front wheel of respondent's car was "broken and busted, the axle bent very bad." (Plaintiff's testimony.)

Defendant's car was damaged on the left side, the left front door being curved in, the glass broken, the left-hand wheel "smashed," and the sun visor broken. There is no evidence of the swerving of either car before the impact; each had continued in an undeviating path of travel until after the impact. The physical marks of the collision upon the automobiles, notwithstanding the conflict in the testimony, seem to indicate that appellant's automobile had reached a point, possibly 3 or 4 feet in advance of the right front car wheel of respondent's car.

On cross-examination plaintiff was asked the following questions:

"Q. Why didn't you put your brakes on? A. Well, I was going right along, because I think she give me right of way.

"Q. You saw her 75 to 100 feet back from the property line going 40 to 45 miles an hour, didn't you? A. Oh, have plently of room to let me pass her."

[1] The evidence upon the trial supports the court's finding as to defendant's negligence. She was violating the provisions of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, pp. 553, 560) § 113 (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30), and section 131 (as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15), in effect at the time of the accident. The sole question on this appeal is whether or not there is sufficient evidence to support the court's finding that there was no contributory negligence on respondent's part.

The appellant insists that the finding is against the evidence and argues that: "In zeal to establish the negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff has testified to facts which convict him of contributory negligence, as a matter of law. Without slackening his speed for an instant, according to his own story, he drove in a direct line across the intersection, taking no single measure to prevent the accident. Was the plaintiff ordinarily, or in any other wise, prudent, and if so, in what did his prudence consist?"

Appellant cites many cases from other jurisdictions to support her argument, but has cited no California case in point. As to the cited authorities from other states, and we have examined with care every case cited, they need not be discussed nor analyzed in this opinion, though it may be conceded that some are in their facts quite similar to those in the instant case. The Minnesota cases, for instance, spring out of violations of intersection crossing statutes different from the California statutes. The same is true of the Washington case. If it be conceded that any case cited holds that, under the facts of the case here on appeal, no issue of fact, but a sole question of law is presented, it would be opposed to the unbroken line of California cases herein referred to, which are sufficient and must be relied on to determine the simple question presented by this appeal.

[2] Section 131 of the Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15) in effect at the time of the accident was as follows, to wit: "When two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed." Under that section and legal inferences flowing from it, the respondent was entitled to the right of way in crossing the intersection. He actually had entered upon it when appellant's car was approximately 100 feet distant. The latest expression of the Appellate Court yet printed in the reports is Couchman v. Snelling, 295 P. 845. We quote in reverse order herein two paragraphs of this opinion, which we believe in point, and under the cited authorities therein are decisive of the question involved in this appeal:

"Where a car has actually entered an intersection before the other approaches it, the driver of the first car has the right to assume that he will be given the right of way and be permitted to pass through the intersection without danger of collision. He has a right to assume that the driver of the other car will obey the law, slow down, and yield the right of way, if slowing down be necessary to prevent a collision. Keyes v. Hawley, 100 Cal. App. 53, 60, 279 P. 674. Nor is a plaintiff required to yield the right of way to one a considerable distance away whose duty it is to slow down in crossing an intersection. Whitelaw v. McGilliard, 179 Cal. 349, 176 P. 679. Whether or not, therefore, plaintiff, after observing the approach of defendant's car, its position, and the rate of speed it was traveling, and keeping the same within his side vision, was justified in proceeding upon his rightful way across the intersection in advance of defendant presents a question upon which reasonable minds might differ, and was therefore one for the jury to determine. Johnson v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co., 154 Cal. 285, 295, 97 P. 520; Kienlen v. Holt (Cal. App.) 288 P. 866; Palmer v. Schultz (Cal. App.) 290 P. 79.

"The circumstances under which a court can declare that certain acts constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law are rare. Swartz v. Acme Express & Drayage Co., 102 Cal. App. 615, 283 P. 358. It can seldom happen that the question is so clear from doubt that the court can undertake to say as a matter of law that the jury could not fairly and honestly find for the plaintiff. Schierhold v. N. B. & M. R. Co., 40 Cal. 447, 453. The question is usually one of fact and becomes a question of law only when the evidence is of such a character that it will support no other legitimate inference. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513. Contributory negligence being an affirmative defense, the burden of proving it is on the defendant. It is necessary, therefore, for him to show that the acts of plaintiff failed to meet some standard of prudence in order to take the issue from the jury as a question of law alone."

[3] The testimony on this appeal viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, as it must be, shows no affirmative act of negligence on the part of respondent. He had the right of way, was driving at a lawful speed, had almost succeeded in crossing the intersection when the machines collided, and his only legal sin, if any, was one of omission and not of commission.

[4, 5] The situation presents an interesting point for mathematical analysis in determining the question as to what an ordinarily reasonable and prudent person, in respondent's then situation, would or should have done. A car traveling 45 miles per hour covers 66 feet per second. At 15 miles per hour it covers 22 feet per second. In the 1½ seconds immediately preceding the accident, appellant's car must have been distant from the place of impact and west thereof 99 feet; respondent at the same time, at the rate of his car's speed, was 33 feet north from the same place. Respondent proceeded on his way, notwithstanding appellant's speed, upon the assumption that appellant would yield the right of way. If at the end of the first second after his entrance into the intersection, and he first saw the other car, he had known or then had reason to realize his assumption was erroneous, he then had remaining 11 feet of space to travel in one-half second of time within which to decide whether or not he should proceed or apply his brakes. At the end of that same second appellant having just traveled 66 feet, was still 33 feet distant from the place of collision, and respondent believed that appellant had "plenty of room to let me pass her." Evidently appellant tried to pass in front of respondent's car. If she had slackened speed, she probably could have let him pass or have swerved her car to the left and north and passed behind respondent's car. The latter could not well foresee what she might try to do. If she were to retard her speed merely or to try to pass to the rear of respondent's car, the application of the brakes on his car would have been an unwise move. The danger of collision might thereby be enhanced. He did nothing except to keep traveling. The one-half second or even the whole second and a half is a short interval of time; is so short, that an ordinary, reasonable person in such situation might not do the wise thing, or make the right move to avoid an accident. This computation serves to show that a question of fact as to contributory negligence was presented to the trial court for determination. That court's finding, although upon conflicting testimony, is conclusive on appeal.

The following authorities cited by respondent are all in point in support of this court's conclusion that the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed: Commonwealth Ins. Co. v. Riverside-Portland Cement Co., 69 Cal. App. 165, 230 P. 995, McMullen v. Davenport, 44 Cal. App. 695, 186 P. 796; Collom v. Block, 70 Cal. App. 33, 232 P. 486; Robinson v. Clemons, 46 Cal. App. 661, 190 P. 203; Simonsen v. Christopher, 186 Cal. 788, 200 P. 615; Gilmore v. L. A. Ry. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 22; Sites v. Howrey (Cal. App.) 291 P. 597; and Wynne v. Wright (Cal. App.) 286 P. 1057.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

CITY OF MONROVIA v. SOUTHERN COUNTIES GAS CO.

Civ. 7745.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 11, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 13, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 6, 1931.

Gas 🔑10.

Under gas franchise, grantee's assignee serving customers from general system reaching several communities held required to pay city only percentage of receipts in city after eliminating portion of receipts attributable to property outside city (St. 1905, p. 777).

The franchise granted under Broughton Act (St. 1905, p. 777) required the original grantee which operated an artificial gas plant within the city of Monrovia to pay 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts to the city, but as the grantee's assignee served 57 cities and 5 counties with its general system, receipts collected for the sale of gas within Monrovia arose in part from the franchise within the city and in part from its properties and rights of way outside the city.

Action by the City of Monrovia against the Southern Counties Gas Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for an accounting of the amount due from the defendant under its franchise to use the public streets of the plaintiff city for the distribution of gas. Plaintiff had judgment for $894.44, and the defendant appeals on typewritten transcripts.

Defendant is the successor in interest of a franchise granted in September, 1905, under the terms of the Broughton Act (Stats. 1905, p. 777). The franchise stipulated that the grantee should pay to the city annually "two (2%) per cent of the gross annual receipts * * * arising from the use, operation or possession of such franchise." For some years after the date of the franchise the grantee maintained and operated a gas manufacturing plant within the city limits of Monrovia where artificial gas was manufactured and distributed to consumers. In 1920, upon the discovery of natural gas fields in the southern part of the state, the defendant abandoned its manufacturing plant in the city of Monrovia and since has supplied its consumers with natural gas from a widely scattered general system which reaches fifty-seven municipalities and five counties. In the operation of this business the company's transmission lines occupy public highways to and through the various counties and municipalities, but a considerable portion of its investment is located on private property and private rights of way. In order to determine the proper proportion of its gross proceeds which should be allocated to the various counties and municipalities served by it through this system, the company followed the method laid down for that purpose by the Supreme Court in County of Tulare v. City of Dinuba, 188 Cal. 664, 206 P. 983, 984. In accordance with this method the defendant paid to the various counties and municipalities within its system an amount estimated on the basis of the total mileage in each, eliminating that portion of its earnings attributable to the use of its properties located on private property. This allocation was accepted by all the counties and municipalities within the system except the city of Monrovia, which asserted that it should be paid 2 per cent. of the gross receipts from the sale of gas within its boundaries. The trial court adopted the city's theory and the correctness of its judgment as matter of law is the only question on this appeal.

The question is not one of first impression. The Supreme Court in County of Tulare v. City of Dinuba, supra, took great pains to outline and explain what it deemed to be the fair and equitable interpretation of the uncertain provisions of the Broughton Act—a statute which did not fully take into consideration the changing conditions under which it has been called to operate. The method of allocation of the percentages due the independent public agencies in a case of this kind was definitely determined and declared by the court in that decision as the fair and equitable interpretation of that act. The facts involved in the Tulare Case were the same as those in the case at hand with the single exception that the city of Monrovia had granted a separate franchise before the consolidation of the public service company, whereas, in the Tulare Case, the city of Dinuba was incorporated after the organization of the power company. This point we do not deem to be of any importance because the franchise was expressly made assignable, and no rights are here asserted by the appellant which could not have been, with equal force, asserted by its assignor.

In the Tulare Case the Supreme Court pointed out that the percentages were to be based upon the gross receipts "arising from the 'use, operation, or possession' of the franchise," but said that these receipts arise not alone from the use of the streets for pipe lines, "but likewise from the use, operation, or possession of the power houses and private rights of way." But, said the court:

"It will be noticed that the act in question makes no reference to compensation for the franchise over public highways, from the revenues arising within the county by which the franchise was granted. If that had been the intention, the very obvious way of expressing it would have been to say 'two per centum of the gross annual receipts within the county,' instead of using the expression 'two per centum of the gross annual receipts' arising from 'the use, operation, or possession' of the franchise. The reasonable construction of the language used, is that each county or municipality is entitled to its percentage of the gross earnings arising from the use of its highway, in the proportion that the receipts arising from the use of such highways bear to the receipts attributable to all the rights of way of the entire system.

"We see no reason why this cannot be estimated on a mileage basis."

Respondent endeavors to draw a distinction between the Tulare Case and this in that when the franchise was granted to appellant's predecessors it contemplated an entire plant to be located entirely within the city limits and that such was the situation for some years after the date of the franchise. But the record does not support respondent. The franchise contains nothing more than the usual grant to use the public streets for the purpose of laying gas pipes. There is nothing in the franchise relating to the character of gas to be furnished or to the method or place of production. When the appellant changed from the artificial to natural gas, to the great benefit of the consumers, it, of course, became necessary to install transmission pipes to bring that gas to the city limits. These pipes necessarily passed through other cities and counties from which similar franchises were necessary. The receipts collected for the sale of gas within the city of Monrovia arose in part from appellant's franchise within the city and in part from its properties and rights of way outside the city.

This is a feature which the trial court did not take into consideration in its judgment. It is an essential part of the method of allocation approved by the Supreme Court in the Tulare Case, hence further discussion is unnecessary.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Booja Singh against H. S. White. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Marvin C. Hix, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ralph H. Lewis, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J.

The plaintiff had judgment against the defendant for the principal and interest due upon a promissory note executed by the defendant and delivered to the plaintiff, which note is in the following words and figures, to wit:

> $1400.00 September 25/28
> "For value received I promise to pay to Bujah Singh Fourteen Hundred 00/100 1400.-00. In ninety days from date at West Island, Calif.
> "H. S. White
> "This note is to cover labor bill in full for all Hindu help."

From the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

The record shows that an answer was filed by the appellant which, among other things, alleges that the note was secured by fraud and misrepresentation, and that at the time of the execution of the note, items aggregating the sum of $1,344.72 were paid by the defendant for the uses and purposes of the plaintiff, and were not taken into consideration in the settlement of an account which terminated in the execution of the note sued upon. The record shows that H. S. White was the owner of certain lands situate on what is known as West island, in the San Joaquin river; that the plaintiff, during the years 1927 and 1928, the period involved in this action, had been in the employ of the defendant, operating the farm lands referred to. The record further shows that in September, 1928, the plaintiff and the defendant had a settlement of accounts, and at the time of the settlement the accounts showed a balance due in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,410.21, and that at said date, to wit, September 25, 1928, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff the promissory note sued upon in this action.

The allegations of the defendant's answer are to the effect that subsequent to the 1st day of April, 1927, the defendant paid to plaintiff either in cash or in cash paid to third parties, for and on behalf of the defendant, the following items: $617 to Gianelli Company at Stockton; to various persons, cash in the sum of $626.30; for doctors and hospital bills, $63.25; and cash to the plaintiff in the sum of $55; aggregating, as we have stated, the total sum of $1,344.72, and that these various payments were not taken into account at the settlement had between the plaintiff and the defendant on September 25, 1928. At the time of the settlement it appears that various papers, vouchers, checks, and bills were in the possession of the plaintiff and the defendant, and were used by them in making up the statement of account appearing in the transcript. This statement was made out by the defendant, he copying items from the various papers had by the parties covering the transactions between them. This statement of account, made out by the defendant, shows an indebtedness on the part of the defendant to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,410.21. To cover this indebtedness, the $1,400 note was executed. The defendant's testimony as to this statement is as follows: "We figured it all up, of course; subsequently, straightened it out; deducted the amount that we claimed was not coming. It was in my handwriting, at Tara Singh's place of business; that was the last settlement; I cannot tell you the date; I gave him all my deductions; approximately all the time was considered from one date to another without deducting for the times of absences, and the second sheet of exhibit 2 (the account referred to), is the account of Tara Singh's conclusions and myself, as I went over the whole thing."

[1] It is further claimed on the part of the appellant that Booja Singh was absent from the farm at different times, and that no deduction was made for such absences. The testimony, however, when fairly considered, justified the conclusion of the trial court that whenever the plaintiff was absent from the ranch, he had a man working in his place, and that only the services or labor of one person was charged for during such period. This, of course, if believed by the trial court, eliminated all questions of deductions for absences from the farm.

In relation to the various items claimed as deductions by the defendant, aggregating $626.30, we find only the following in the transcript: "There was then offered and admitted in evidence a group of papers, being the itemized accounts of said sum of $626.30, and marked 'Defendant's Exhibit 3.'" These papers do not appear in the transcript. Exhibit 3 is absent, and we have no means of knowing what items are covered thereby. The same is true of Defendant's Exhibit 1, being a number of checks payable to Booja Singh, and the record does not show for what purpose any of these checks were executed; Exhibit 1 not being included in the transcript.

It is further alleged on the part of the defendant that at the time of the execution of the promissory note for $1,400, the plaintiff stated that they would have a further settlement, and that the matter would be straightened out.

[2] Tara Singh, a witness on the part of the plaintiff, testified that he is an interpreter and was acquainted with both the plaintiff and the defendant; that he figured up the accounts, and that he "figured pretty near $1400.00 was due Booja at the time." This witness testified that he did not make any deductions for Booja's absence. There is no showing whatever in the record that the note was the result of either fraud or misrepresentation. The whole case was tried upon the theory as to whether the defendant had any offsets as against the promissory note sued upon. There is no pretense that there was any payment, other than by way of the alleged offsets which we have been considering. This being true, the appellant's objection that the plaintiff did not testify specifically that the note was unpaid, is without merit.

[3] It is further contended on the part of the appellant that there is no contradiction of the defendant's testimony as to the payment of the items which we have been considering. This contention, however, overlooks the direct testimony of the defendant himself, where he says, "I gave him all my deductions." The statement made out by the defendant shows deductions in his favor in the sum of $4,681.29. This amount of credit to which the defendant was entitled may have been made up exclusively of labor items, but there is nothing in the record from which we can conclude that such is the case, nor is there anything in the record which would justify us in concluding that the trial court should not have accepted the statement of the defendant that he had given all of his deductions to the plaintiff at the time of the execution of the promissory note, rather than accept the defendant's statement that he had omitted the items in the amounts which we have mentioned. In fact, it is hardly conceivable that in making up credits to the amount of $4,681.29, the defendant should have overlooked items aggregating $1,344.72. At least the defendant was a witness before the trial court and it was for the trial court to determine what statements of the defendant were worthy of belief, if at all.

[4, 5] Considerable attention has been given by counsel with respect to the circumstances and conditions under which testimony may be given to vary the terms of a written instrument. It would serve no useful purpose to review these cases. The law is well established that the consideration may always be inquired into between the parties to a written instrument, and that the presumption that the instrument is supported by a valid consideration may be rebutted by testimony showing that there was no consideration.

If the testimony in this case, so far as the record sets it forth, supporting the conclusions reached by the trial court, was accepted by the trial court as being the true version, then and in that case all of the material findings of the trial court are sufficiently supported by the testimony. This being true, a further discussion of the alleged errors committed by the trial court would serve no useful purpose.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by Mads Nielsen, an incompetent person, by W. E. Most, guardian of the estate of said incompetent, against George F. Witter. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

See, also, In the Matter of Nielsen's Guardianship, 296 P. 122.

George F. Witter, of Oakland, in pro. per.

W. E. Most, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Action on a common count for money had and received.

Plaintiff, an incompetent, through his guardian in substance alleged that on or about July 19, 1927, defendant received from plaintiff the sum of $500 to and for the use of plaintiff; that on or about the 24th day of August of the same year he received the further sum of $1,000 for plaintiff's use. The complaint further alleged that on the 19th day of July, 1927, and long prior thereto, and before defendant had relations of any kind with plaintiff, and ever since said date, plaintiff was an incompetent and incapable of handling his business affairs or managing his property; that on the 8th day of December his guardian rescinded any and all contracts or agreements had between defendant and plaintiff and demanded payment from defendant of said sums. The complaint prayed for judgment in the sum of $1,500. To this complaint defendant demurred upon various grounds. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant answering alleged that plaintiff had paid to defendant as retaining fees the sum of $500 and the further sum of $1,000, and prayed judgment. For a further answer and by way of counterclaim defendant set up an employment by plaintiff of defendant as attorney and that the reasonable value of said services was the sum of $2,000. The counterclaim was subsequently dismissed, leaving the original answer standing.

The case went to trial, and it appeared in evidence that plaintiff had called upon defendant and sought his advice upon certain legal questions. Defendant informed plaintiff that he would attend to the matters and his fee would be $500. Defendant was subsequently informed by plaintiff that he had other affairs that needed the attention of an attorney. He suggested that defendant bring a suit to quiet title to his home. This defendant agreed to do, but told plaintiff that it would require an additional payment of $1,000. Both amounts were paid by plaintiff to defendant. After defendant had instituted certain proceedings on behalf of plaintiff, he concluded that plaintiff was mentally incompetent, and he caused proceedings to be instituted which resulted in plaintiff being declared an incompetent. Defendant offered evidence as to the various services he had rendered plaintiff and also as to plaintiff's competency to transact business at the time he employed defendant. The evidence upon this subject was conflicting. The trial court found, upon the issue of incompetency, that, at the time plaintiff employed defendant to transact business for him, he was mentally incompetent to deal with defendant with full understanding of his rights, and did not understand the effect of his agreement with defendant. It further found that plaintiff's guardian had served written notice of rescission of the contracts upon defendant. As conclusions of law, the court found that plaintiff had a right to rescind, and defendant was indebted to plaintiff for money had and received in the sum of $1,500, and judgment was rendered accordingly.

[1, 2] Defendant urges several grounds for a reversal. He first claims that plaintiff was not entitled to rescind until he had restored or offered to restore to defendant whatever of value he had received. It is manifest that plaintiff could not restore to defendant the services defendant had rendered to him, nor was plaintiff by reason of his adjudicated incompetency in a position to set any value thereon. The court having found that plaintiff had no mental capacity when he executed the contracts, he was not bound by them. Upon the trial, plaintiff, through his guardian, offered to do equity and include in his account such amount as would compensate defendant for such services as might be deemed beneficial to defendant. This matter is disposed of in Guardianship of Nielsen (Cal. App.) 296 P. 122, this day decided. Defendant next contends that the judgment is void for the reason that no findings were ever prepared, signed, or filed. Findings were filed nunc pro tunc before appeal was taken. There is no merit in this objection. Other points do not require consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

In the Matter of the GUARDIANSHIP of the Estate of Mads NIELSEN, an Incompetent Person.

Mads NIELSEN, by W. E. Most, Guardian of said Estate, Appellant, v. George F. WITTER, Attorney, etc., Respondent.

Civ. 7512.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 16, 1931.

Appeal by guardian from an order of the Superior Court of Alameda County, Lincoln S. Church, Judge, allowing attorney's fees for services rendered an incompetent. Affirmed.

W. E. Most, for appellant.

George F. Witter, of Oakland, in pro. per., for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Application for allowance of attorney's fees due for services rendered an incompetent.

On May 28, 1929, George F. Witter, Esq., served upon the guardian of Mads Nielsen, an incompetent, a copy of a petition for allowance of fees, wherein it was prayed that the court make its order fixing an amount as a reasonable compensation for services rendered by said Witter to said incompetent before his incompetency was declared. The petition came on for hearing, and, the application being submitted, the court ordered that the sum of $1,250 be allowed Witter, as attorney's fees in full for services rendered the incompetent and also the guardian. Witter had heretofore received from the incompetent the sum of $1,500 for which sum a judgment has been rendered against him. Nielsen v. Witter (Cal. App.) 296 P. 121, this day decided. The court being advised in the premises, incorporated in the order a recital that Witter was to pay to the guardian the sum of $250, said sum being the difference between the amount he had received from the incompetent and the proper amount awarded him. This is an appeal from such order. In support thereof it is claimed that there is no warrant or authority for an attorney to make such a motion, the matter being one that can be considered only in the settlement of the account of the incompetent, and that a court has no jurisdiction to award or make such an allowance, for which reason it should be annulled. However this may be, the record presents no such question. The order in express terms recites that the petition of Witter for attorney's fees is denied and that the allowance is made on the petition and application of the guardian of the incompetent. Appellant raises the further claim that the evidence is insufficient to justify the order of the court that the reasonable value of Witter's services was the amount fixed. There is nothing in the record to show that the court abused its discretion in fixing said sum as the reasonable amount to which Witter was entitled.

The order is affirmed.

From a judgment in favor af plaintiffs against the administrator and Nellie Key, such defendants appeal.

Reversed, with directions.

Halverson & Halverson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Thomas A. Berkebile, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, P. J.

This is an action for unlawful detainer, arising upon the terms of a written lease. The instrument was entered into between plaintiffs as lessors and the defendants Klein and Weiss as lessees, but the latter assigned their interest under it to Thomas B. Key, formerly a defendant in the action, and the present defendant Nellie Key. Pending proceedings in the trial court, Thomas B. Key died and defendant Fraser as administrator of his estate was substituted in his place. Judgment went against Fraser as administrator and Nellie Key. They appeal.

The principal point in the case is that which requires the construction of a certain paragraph of the lease, which reads:

"At the time of the execution of these presents the Lessees have paid to the Lessors in addition to the sum of Thirty-five Hundred ($3500.00) Dollars as the first month's rent of the term of the lease the sum of Eight Thousand ($8000.00) Dollars, and have executed to the Lessors two (2) promissory notes each for the sum of Two Thousand ($2000.00) Dollars and due one (1) year from date, as security for the faithful performance by the Lessees of all of the terms, covenants and conditions of this lease, and in the event said Lessees shall faithfully perform all of said terms, covenants and conditions, said total sum of Twelve Thousand ($12000.00) Dollars shall be applied by the Lessors as payment of rent for the last three (3) months of the terms of this lease. In the event, however, said Lessees shall fail to perform all of the terms, covenants or conditions of this lease they shall forfeit all right of every kind and nature in and to said sum of Twelve Thousand ($12000.00) Dollars, and such forfeiture shall not preclude the Lessors from recovering in addition thereto all rents due or damages suffered by reason of a violation by the Lessees of any of the terms, covenants or conditions of this lease."

[1, 2] The question concerning the paragraph is presented under these circumstances: Appellants contend that a certain portion of it is void as providing for a forfeiture. The trial judge adopted the contrary view and made findings and rendered judgment accordingly.

Before taking up the authorities upon which the parties respectively rely for a solution of the question presented, it becomes necessary to make some analysis of the paragraph of the lease from which the controversy between them springs. It is provided therein: First, that the $8,000 and the two notes were deposited with the lessors "as security for the faithful performance by the lessees of all the terms, covenants and conditions of this lease, and in the event the lessees shall faithfully perform all of said terms, covenants and conditions, said total sum of $12,000 shall be applied by the lessors as payment of rent for the last three months of this lease"; and, second, "In the event, however, they shall fail to perform all the terms, covenants and conditions of this lease they shall forfeit all right of every kind and nature in and to said $12,000 and such forfeiture shall not preclude the lessors from recovering in addition thereto all rents due or damages suffered by reason of a violation of the terms, covenants and conditions of this lease." If these two provisions, thus segregated, be set each against the other, to put it differently, if each be construed in connection with the other, it must appear that the first has passed out of existence as an operative factor in the lease, because of the default in payment of rent from which the litigation has ripened, while because of that default the second has sprung up as the sole provision from which the litigation, so far as the present point is concerned, must be determined. The language of the first provision to the effect that the money and notes passed as security for the performance of all the terms, etc., of the instrument must be construed as if it read that they so passed if and in the event all the terms were performed. This for several reasons. It will be observed that the language as to security is followed by a provision that the $12,000 is to be applied to the payment of rent for the last three months of the term of the lease, but that language can be operative only "in the event the lessees shall faithfully perform all of said terms," etc. Specifically, the provision means, then, that the $12,000 is security and is to be applied on the last three months' rent only in the event that the lessees shall voluntarily pay all rent except that for the last three months. In other words, if the lease terminated before the expiration of the full term provided in it, because of breach of condition, there is nothing to which the security can be applied, and it has so terminated, upon the election of the lessor, because of the nonpayment of rent during the progress of the full term and before the last three months has been reached. Here it should be observed that the rent reserved by the lease was $4,000 per month. The last three months' rent, if the tenancy went the full term, would therefore exactly consume the $12,000.

The view we have above expressed as to the wiping out of the first segregated clause is irrefutably confirmed by a view of the second clause. The latter begins, "In the event, however," thus setting that clause in direct opposition to the first. The "event" referred to by this expressive language is that the lessees "shall fail to perform all the terms," etc., one of which, of course, was the payment of rent. In that event, not only does the second clause provide that the lessees shall forfeit the $12,000, but that "such forfeiture shall not preclude the lessors from recovering in addition thereto" all rents due or damages caused by reason of a violation of the terms, etc., of the lease. It is plain that under such language the $12,000 cannot now be considered as security and that it cannot now be applied to the payment of any portion of the rent if the clause be operative under the law. The clause providing for a forfeiture is therefore, we repeat, the only one of the segregated clauses which requires our attention.

[3, 4] In considering the paragraph of the lease which is now before us, appellants rely upon Schnittger v. Rose, 139 Cal. 656, 73 P. 449; Baker v. Eilers Music Co., 26 Cal. App. 371, 146 P. 1056; Rez v. Summers, 34 Cal. App. 527, 168 P. 156; Green v. Frahm, 176 Cal. 259, 168 P. 114; Curtis v. Arnold, 43 Cal. App. 97, 184 P. 510; Parish v. Studebaker, 50 Cal. App. 719, 195 P. 721; Knight v. Marks, 183 Cal. 354, 191 P. 531; and Wetzler v. Patterson, 73 Cal. App. 527, 238 P. 1077.

Cal. App. 329, 268 P. 463; and Gordon v. Harris, 94 Cal. App. 682, 271 P. 779.

These cases have all been considered by us, but with very little profit. In none of them was there considered such a lease as the one before us now, as it is viewed in the analysis above set forth. There is general language in several of the cases which seems upon a mere reading to apply here, but such language, of course, must be measured by the terms of the instrument under consideration by the court in each particular case. The only authority which has been of material aid to us is Green v. Frahm, 176 Cal. 259, 168 P. 114, 115. In that case Frahm was the lessor and one Cohn was the lessee. The lease provided: "Cohn hereby deposits with Frahm the sum of $3,000, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, said sum of $3,000 to be retained by Frahm as a guarantee that Cohn will pay the rent as herein provided, and in the manner herein specified, and will keep and perform each and every covenant herein contained to be performed by Cohn, and in the event of the failure of Cohn to pay the rent or to keep or perform any of the covenants herein contained to be performed by Cohn, then and in that event the said sum of $3,000 shall become forfeited unto Frahm." Concerning this provision the Supreme Court said, the italics being those of the court: "The first paragraph of the above-quoted provisions of the lease naturally divides itself into two parts: One, a provision that the $3,000 deposit with Frahm was to be a guarantee for the performance by Cohn of the covenants of the lease, including the payment of rents; the other, that in the event of the failure of Cohn to perform any of said covenants, the said money should become forfeited to Frahm. The provision for a forfeiture upon the failure of Cohn to pay the rent was either a penalty, or a provision that the $3,000 should be liquidated damages for the breach of the covenants. In either aspect, the provision was void. Whether as liquidated damages, or as a penalty, it comes within the terms of section 1670 of the Civil Code, that is, it is an attempt to fix by contract 'the amount of damage to be paid, or other compensation to be made, for a breach of an obligation,' in anticipation thereof, and by that section it is declared to be void, unless the case is of such a nature that 'it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage,' as provided in section 1671 of the Civil Code. Jack v. Sinsheimer, 125 Cal. 563, 58 P. 130. Calling it a penalty instead of liquidated damages does not change its nature. The case cited also declares that the fixing of damages for breach of an obligation to pay rent is not impracticable or extremely difficult. There was no evidence in the case showing any peculiar circumstance which would make such damages more difficult to fix in this case than in the ordinary case. Such difficulty is not to be presumed. Long Beach v. Dodge, 135 Cal. 404, 67 P. 499. This part of the clause must therefore be treated as a void provision and disregarded entirely. The other part of the clause, providing for the deposit of $3,000 as a guarantee for the payment of rent, was for a legal purpose, and was in all respects valid and enforceable. In virtue of that clause, Frahm had the legal right, in case of the failure of Cohn to pay rent, to retain the $3,000 and apply it on the rent until the same was exhausted. He did not choose to do this, but on the contrary, he immediately began proceedings for the restitution of the premises, and the recovery of the rent due, and succeeded in obtaining judgment for both, and also for the cancellation of the lease. He is, of course, bound by his own judgment, and therefore the lease must be considered as having been terminated on March 1, 1912. The complaint alleged that Frahm refused to return any portion of the $3,000 to Cohn, or to apply any portion thereof to the rent due. The answer admits this to be true, and alleges that by the terms of the contract it was to be retained by Frahm as a guarantee for the payment of the rent, as it came due. Frahm did not ask that he be allowed to retain $500 of the money in satisfaction of his judgment for rent. He defended on the ground that the whole sum had become absolutely forfeited to his use and was his own property, by reason of the failure of Cohn to pay the rent, and notwithstanding the early termination of the lease at his own request. Under these circumstances, the conduct of Frahm must be deemed to be a repudiation of the security and a waiver of the right to retain the $3,000 as security for the payment of rent subsequently accruing, and of his right to apply any portion thereof to the rent due. The fund deposited is therefore to be considered as money held by Frahm, as bailee, for the use of Cohn, and due demand having been made for its return, the plaintiff was entitled to recover it."

We think the provision passed upon by the Supreme Court in that case is enough like the one before us to render the case controlling here. Indeed, the provision we now consider is more clear, as looking toward invalidity, than the one considered by the Supreme Court. Respondent points to the fact that the lease dealt with in Green v. Frahm, contained a provision to the effect that if Cohn paid all the rent the $3,000 was to be returned to him, but that provision, as it will be noted, cut no figure in the decision of the point before the court.

The Supreme Court said in its opinion that "Frahm did not ask that he be allowed to retain $500 of the money in satisfaction of his judgment for rent. He defended on the ground," the suit being one to recover from him the $3,000, "that the whole sum had become absolutely forfeited to his use and was his own property, by reason of the failure of Cohn to pay the rent, and notwithstanding the early termination of the lease at his own request." We do not pause to consider whether respondents here could have asked that the $12,000 be applied to the payment of their judgment for rent. It is enough to say that they did not make the attempt. They demeaned themselves exactly as Frahm did in the action brought against him. The defendants here filed a counterclaim asking for the return of the $12,000 and respondents interposed an answer under which they claimed, as they now claim, that the sum had been absolutely forfeited to them. On the whole, we are convinced that respondents are not entitled to retain the $12,000.

[5] Under a clause of the lease providing for attorneys' fees, the trial court allowed respondents the sum of $800 in that behalf. Appellants contend that the allowance was excessive. In view of the disposition we have made of the question as to respondents' right to retain the alleged forfeit of $12,000, we think too much was allowed as attorneys' fees. No evidence was introduced upon the issue and the trial judge was left to fix the fee upon his knowledge of the nature and progress of the litigation. The question as to the disposition of the $12,000 was evidently the most important point litigated in the case, and the decision of the trial judge that respondents should retain the amount must have influenced greatly the fixing of the fee. It is to be noted upon this point, also, that there was evidence that it was unnecessary to maintain an action to recover possession of the demised premises, and respondents direct our attention to no evidence to the contrary. We find it impossible to fix the fee ourselves. We can have from the record no complete knowledge of the facts in the trial judge's mind which should govern in the determination of the amount to be allowed. Upon a retrial of the cause therefore, the trial court will fix a fee, in lieu of the former allowance of $800, which shall be proper under such evidence as may be submitted to it upon the issue, subject, however, to what is said above in this paragraph.

[6-8] We have already observed that defendants interposed a counterclaim asking for a return of the $12,000 in litigation between the parties and that respondents filed an answer thereto. At the trial the court refused to hear evidence in support of the counterclaim on the ground that the pleading was not proper in the action, and also found, at the conclusion of the trial, that defendants were entitled to take nothing under the counterclaim. Appellants contend that in these rulings the court erred. It is asserted that the counterclaim was proper but that, if it was not, respondents by answering waived all objection to it.

Taking these points in their inverse order, we think respondents, by answering the counterclaim, did not waive the point that the pleading was not a proper one in the action, but preserved it by objecting to the admissibility of evidence under it. Placerville Gold Min. Co. v. Beal, 168 Cal. 682, 144 P. 748. This conclusion makes it necessary to determine whether the counterclaim was proper to the litigation. Certainly, it is the general rule that neither a cross-complaint nor a counterclaim may be interposed in the action of unlawful detainer (Warburton v. Doble, 38 Cal. 619; Rydell v. Beverly Hills P. & P. Co., 88 Cal. App. 216, 262 P. 818), for the reason that "in an action in unlawful detainer for the restitution of premises withheld by tenants in violation of the covenants of their lease they cannot frustrate the extraordinary remedy provided by the statute through the means of a cross-complaint or counterclaim." Smith v. Whyers, 64 Cal. App. 193, 221 P. 387, 388. The language just quoted is immediately followed, in the opinion from which it is taken, by this expression of doubt: "What the rule would be if the tenant should relinquish possession and join issue solely on the rent money need not be determined, because the appellant here was not satisfied to make that issue, but insisted upon retaining possession throughout the litigation."

This expression, so far as we may discover, has never been noticed in any later case, but because of the showing made by the record in the present instance it becomes necessary to give it some attention now. We have already observed that there was undisputed evidence at the trial tending to prove that it was not necessary for respondents to institute an action for the recovery of possession of the property demised by the lease. It now becomes advisable to state what that evidence was. After service upon him of three days' notice to quit possession of the premises and before service of summons in the action, Dr. Key had a conversation with respondent Charles T. Servais. The testimony of the doctor shows the nature of it:

"Q. And what did you tell him? A. That I could not raise the money for the rent and he could take possession. * * * He said 'Well, I have got to have the rent or possession.' * * * I says 'You know your rights, Mr. Servais. It is optional with you as to what steps you take.'

"Q. But you told him that he would have to take possession? A. That he could take possession." A little later Dr. Key testified further:

"Q. Now, Doctor, after the suit was brought did you see Mr. Servais, or at the time the suit was brought did you see Mr. Servais? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And what did he say to you or you say to him with reference to possession of the property? * * * A. I said that he could have possession.

"Q. And what did he say? A. He wished to protect his interests."

At the commencement of the litigation a receiver was appointed to take possession of the demised premises and possession was surrendered to him upon demand. Soon after the appointment the counsel for appellants wrote the counsel for respondents a letter which was, in part, as follows: "Inasmuch as you are asking for a forfeiture of the lease and we by our answer consent thereto, there is absolutely no need of a receiver in the case, and we suggest that the order appointing the receiver be forthwith set aside in order to avoid any further cost or expense. Your stenographer said that you would be out all day, and in order that the matter may not be overlooked we call your attention to it by letter. We will appear in court at any time and join with you in a request to set aside that order, if our joinder is necessary. Please care for the matter at once. * * *" The verified answer of defendants to the complaint contains the following matter: "Admit all the allegations of [a certain paragraph] of said complaint, except these defendants deny that they neglected or refused for the space of three days or upward after demand was made, or that they still neglect or refuse to pay said rent or to surrender possession of said premises, furniture, furnishings or equipment; and in this connection these defendants alleged that on the 16th day of June, 1925, they were unable to pay said rent and that after the demand aforesaid was served upon these defendants the plaintiffs and these defendants entered into negotiations for the purchase or exchange of the interest of plaintiffs in and to the property herein mentioned, and that while said negotiations were still pending the plaintiffs brought this action and procured the appointment of a receiver herein, without notice, and that upon the demand of said plaintiffs and said receiver, these defendants immediately surrendered possession of said premises and property to the plaintiffs and said receiver." It is also alleged in the answer "that upon demand after the commencement of said action they surrendered said property to said plaintiffs and they now confirm said surrender and hereby surrender and confirm said property and said lease and the term thereof, to said plaintiffs. * * *" The counterclaim interposed by defendants contains matter similar to that above quoted from the answer.

It will be observed from all these items of evidence and matters of pleading that there was never an issue between the parties upon the question of the possession of the demised premises. Both as a matter of procedure and as a matter of substance the case was one in which was actually litigated only a question of rent, a question as to the disposition of the $12,000 and a question as to counsel fees. Defendants, then, had placed themselves in legal effect in the position of the tenant in the quotation last above taken from the opinion in Smith v. Whyers. They, so far and as completely as lay in their power, had relinquished possession of the property and had joined issue only upon questions which were entirely apart from the question of possession. The filing of their counterclaim could in no way "frustrate the extraordinary remedy provided by the statute" in detainer cases. The rule that a cross-complaint or counterclaim may not be interposed in such cases is an exception to the general rule which allows such pleadings in other cases, and it should not be extended beyond the reason which lies behind it. That is, the exception should not be invoked to nullify the general rule in cases where there is no basic reason for the existence of the exception. Further, the exception, wherever it is made operative, tends to the necessity for a multiplicity of suits, for where the tenant may not urge any claim by way of cross-complaint or counterclaim he is compelled to enforce his rights by the prosecution of an independent action. Such a situation is intolerable except in those cases in which it is necessary, upon reason, to enforce the rule against the filing of pleadings by defendants asking affirmative relief. No such necessity existed in the present case. We think the counterclaim was therefore proper.

The judgment is reversed. The trial court is directed to render judgment in favor of appellants for $12,000, less the amount declared by the judgment appealed from to be due plaintiffs for rent and any amount hereafter found to be due as counsel fees, a new trial being ordered on the issue of counsel fees alone.

V. P. Lucas and H. G. Bodkin, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kidd, Schell & Delamer, George L. Greer, and Jennings & Belcher, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J.

Having received personal injuries resulting in disability during the course of his employment, appellant instituted proper proceedings and was allowed compensation and medical treatment under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831 as amended). Thereafter he filed an action against his employers and the hospital and physicians to whom he had been referred for medical and surgical treatment by the employers, praying damages for alleged permanent injuries subsequently incurred as a result of malpractice. Pending trial of the civil action, appellant was allowed additional compensation in consequence of the permanent injuries, upon further hearing before the industrial accident commission. When said action was called for trial, demurrers to the complaint and objections to the introduction of evidence were interposed, upon the ground that a cause of action was not stated. The defendants' objections were sustained, and the demurrers were sustained without leave to amend the complaint. The only parties defendant upon this appeal by the plaintiff are the hospital and the physicians, and the sole question presented is as to the right of the employee to maintain an action against them for malpractice after allowance of compensatory relief from the employers.

This question has not to our knowledge been determined in California, and the cases in other jurisdictions wherein it has been given especial consideration are conspicuously few. Those from which the parties to the instant appeal seek to deduce their respective theories of the rule are admittedly not precisely in point. Nor are we convinced that a failure of either party to reconcile rulings in such instances with the pending cause is due wholly or even approximately, as is argued, to differences in the various legislative provisions. A true comprehension of the purposes and intentions of such legislation precludes a judicial expansion of its terms to embrace more than allowances properly chargeable to the business, for defraying expenses necessitated only by injuries arising in the course of and incident to the employment, and from the relationship of employer and employee. A brief review of the cited cases readily reveals their distinction from existing conditions and principles of law presented by the controversy before us. Fields v. Mankato Electric Traction Co., 116 Minn. 218, 133 N. W. 577, and Goss v. Goss, 102 Minn. 346, 113 N. W. 690, quoted therein, were actions for damages alleged to have proximately resulted from negligent conduct of the defendants and subsequent inattention of the latters' medical agents. In each case the rule obtaining in Minnesota was stated as follows: "Where one person is injured by the wrong or negligence of another, and he himself is not negligent in the selection of a medical attendant, the wrongdoer is liable for all the proximate results of his own act, although the consequences of the injury would have been less serious than they proved to be if the attendant had exercised proper professional skill and care." In neither instance was a compensation act under consideration, nor was there room for discussion of the liability of a physician in the event of previous limited compensatory relief under the provisions of such an act. Three decisions from Kansas and Wisconsin are urged by respondents as analogous. Hooyman v. Reeve, 168 Wis. 420, 170 N. W. 282; Retelle v. Sullivan, 191 Wis. 576, 211 N. W. 756, 50 A. L. R. 1106; Bidnick v. Armour & Co., 113 Kan. 277, 214 P. 808. In the Wisconsin cases the plaintiffs released their employers and the physicians from all claims, for a consideration, and the court remarked that "to permit plaintiffs to recover in these actions would enable them to recover damages twice for the same injuries." Retelle v. Sullivan, supra. In Bidnick v. Armour & Co., supra, it was expressly observed that no element of recovery could be attributed to improper treatment or malpractice. In Lincoln Park C. & B. Co. v. Ind. Comm., 317 Ill. 302, 148 N. E. 79, 80, and kindred cases cited, additional remuneration in the nature of damages as for a tort, independent of the compensatory liability of the employer, as such, was not in issue. It there appeared that the applicant suffered burns from an X-ray examination after allowance and acceptance of an award, for which he was entitled to additional compensation, although the burns "did not aggravate the original injury or cause a recurrence or increase of the disability directly caused by that injury." Respondents rely with confidence on the following language of the Supreme Court of Illinois, which we think in view of what remains for later consideration confirms the result at which we arrive in the instant case. It was said that: "if there had been no injury there would have been no examination, and if there had been no examination there would have been no burn. The burn resulted in the examination which the law authorized defendant in error to require to be made to ascertain whether plaintiff in error was entitled to further compensation for the injury of February, 1921. In undergoing the examination plaintiff in error received the injury for which he asks compensation." (Italics supplied.) But that decision expressly recognized the conceded fact "that the employer is not liable, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, for injury resulting from malpractice of a physician.

They admit that is a different question from the one here involved, but say there is some analogy between the two questions." It would seem unnecessary to do more here than say of numerous other authorities cited that while kindred questions presented therein prompted expressions capable of carrying interpretation, none of them held that an apportionment of wages or an allowance based upon a wage scale as compensation as maintenance and in payment of proper professional services, would create a bar to an independent action found upon a sufficient showing of malpractice. And as heretofore stated, we do not so construe the intent of the statute in this state. By section 21, article 20, of the Constitution it is provided, in part: "The legislature is hereby expressly vested with plenary power, unlimited by any provision of this Constitution, to create, and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation, by appropriate legislation, and in that behalf to create and enforce a liability on the part of any or all persons to compensate any or all of their workmen for injury or disability, and their dependents for death incurred or sustained by the said workmen in the course of their employment irrespective of the fault of any party." (Our italics.)

Applying this provision in Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 319, 153 P. 24, 26, our Supreme Court said:

"* * * It follows that this section measures and limits the legislative power in that respect. * * * It is these injuries only the redress of which may be committed by the Legislature to a state Industrial Accident Board. Hence it follows necessarily that the Legislature cannot give such board power to settle disputes and allow compensation from the employer to a person who has been or is an employee, for a personal injury which was not incurred by him 'in the course of' his employment, or which happened after the employment had ceased, and was not the natural and proximate result of the employment, or of some injury which did occur in the course of his employment. It could not give such board power to allow compensation to McCay for the additional disability or expenses arising from the slipping of the broken bone, unless such slipping was the natural or proximate result of the original injury. * * *

"This would be true as well where the subsequent injury is occasioned by the negligence of the injured person, or of some third person, without accident, as where it is accidental, if the subsequent injury occurs after the employment has ceased, and is neither the natural nor the proximate result of the injury received in the course of the employment."

Without conceivable exception, it must occur that by the construction universally placed upon humane workmen's compensation legislation, employees are so restricted with respect to relief for proximate injuries that their right to other recourse in the event of subsequent injury by independent third parties over whose discretion and actions neither employer nor employee has control, should be and is unfettered. "The lawmaking power has taken from him all of his common-law rights and all of his previous statutory rights, and has given him new rights. He does not, and cannot, have a hand in writing the insurance. * * * Before the enactment of these statutes the injured employee could sue for any sum designated in his complaint. Now he can apply for the statutory allowance which is secured by insurance." Zurich Gen. Acc. & L. Ins. Co. v. Stadelman, 276 P. 407, 409, superseded by 208 Cal. 151, 280 P. 687. That independent professions by the fact of business contact with the employer should be absolved of responsibility for mistake, avoidable or unjustified neglect resulting in secondary affliction, seems obnoxious to the purpose and spirit of such a statute. To so hold might induce industry to encourage quackery, and place a premium upon negligence, inefficiency, and wanton disregard of the professional obligations of medical departments of industry, toward the artisan. Such is the view entertained by courts of last resort in other jurisdictions where the subject has required specific attention. In Ruth v. Witherspoon-Englar Co., 98 Kan. 179, 157 P. 403, L. R. A. 1916E, 1201, an allowance under the Kansas form of procedure of compensation and damages emanating from improper medical treatment was reversed for the reasons herein stated, with the following comments: "* * * If it should be proved here, for instance, that the whole effects of the plaintiff's injury would under proper treatment have disappeared within a year, that would obviously be the limit of the period for which he could recover compensation in this action. His judgment here could not be increased by the fact that through the incompetent or negligent handling of the case by physicians a disability which would otherwise have been merely temporary was rendered permanent. Della Rocca v. Stanley Jones & Co. (1914) W. C. & Ins. Rep. 33 [7 B. W. C. C. 101], annotated in 6 N. C. C. A. 624. Even if circumstances had been shown sufficient to charge the defendant with responsibility for the fault of the physicians, the rule would not be altered; for liability under the compensation act cannot be made to depend upon the degree of care exercised. A part of the loss occasioned by an accidental injury to a workman is cast upon the employer, not as reparation for wrongdoing, but on the theory that it should be treated as a part of the ordinary expense of operation. So much of an employee's incapacity as is the direct result of unskillful medical treatment does not arise 'out of and in the course of his employment' within the meaning of that phrase as used in the statute. Laws 1911, c. 218, § 1. For that part of his injury his remedy is against the persons answerable therefor under the general law of negligence, whether or not his employer be of the number."

Viita v. Fleming, 132 Minn. 128, 155 N. W. 1077, 1078, L. R. A. 1916D, 644, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 678, is strikingly similar to the instant case. An injured employee was sent to a hospital by his employer for treatment by physicians with whom the employer had an arrangement for treatment of employees in such cases. It was alleged that unskillful or negligent treatment and appliances administered resulted in permanent injury, which otherwise would not have occurred. The employer submitted to the court for approval a proposed settlement reciting that "the employer shall be and hereby is released from all claims on account of said injury, under said act or otherwise." In an action against the physicians for damages it was contended by them that the cause of action had been included in and was barred by the settlement of their principals with the employee. The opinion proceeds:

"The contention that the relation of physician and patient did not exist between defendant and plaintiff is based upon the facts hereinbefore stated as to the arrangement under which plaintiff was admitted to the hospital and treated by defendants. We see nothing in these facts to justify a decision that defendants did not owe plaintiff the duty to use ordinary care and skill in treating his injury. It is true that Johnson-Wentworth Company, under the terms of the Compensation Act, was required to provide medical and surgical treatment to the injured employee during the first 90 days of his disability and to an amount not exceeding $100. But we are unable to see how this changes the relationship between the injured employee and the physician or surgeon employed, or affects the duty of the latter to the former. It may be true in a sense that Drs. Fleming and Dolan were the agents of the employer for the purpose of minimizing the results of the injury and shortening the period of disability. Even if it be conceded that the employer might be liable for the negligence of the physicians on this theory of agency, this is no reason why the physicians are not liable directly to the patient. It is not material that plaintiff did not know the physicians, engage their services himself, or pay for the services in the ordinary way. Plaintiff, in fact, paid for medical and surgical treatment, and it surely can make no difference that this was by monthly deductions from his wages. Indeed, it is the law that the fact that a physician or surgeon renders services gratuitously does not absolve him from the duty to use reasonable care, skill, and diligence. * * *

"We need add little to what is said in the preceding paragraph in order to dispose of the argument that the settlement under the Workmen's Compensation Act by which the employer was released from 'all claims on account of said injury' operated as a settlement and release of any claim the employee might have against the physicians for malpractice. The employer, as we have seen, was not liable to the employee for the negligence of the physicians. It was not required to compensate plaintiff for damages sustained by their malpractice, and the settlement did not purport to include any such element. This is not contrary to the well-known rule, existing before the Compensation Act, that where one is injured by the negligence of another, and uses due care in the selection of a physician or surgeon, the wrongdoer is liable for all the proximate results of his own act, although the injury has been aggravated by improper treatment by the physician. It by no means follows that the one whose negligence causes the original injury is liable for the negligence of the physician employed to treat it, and it is clearly not true that the physician is not liable to the patient for such negligence. When it appears, as it clearly does here, that there is a liability on the part of the physician to the patient, it is a strain to hold that a settlement between the injured man and the wrongdoer for the injury by the accident, whether made under the Compensation Act or outside of it, includes the claim that the injured man has against his physician for a separate and subsequent injury."

To like effect is Pawlak v. Hayes, 162 Wis. 503, 156 N. W. 464, L. R. A. 1917A, 392. Further comment by us, in face of the obvious result, and in the absence of contrary authority, becomes unnecessary.

The judgment is reversed.

LINDSEY et al. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. et al.

Civ. 80.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Feb. 2, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 2, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 2, 1931.

1. Railroads 🔑309.

Duties and rights of interurban electric railroad in operating trains over crossing in rural territory were similar to those of company operating steam-propelled trains.

Right of way was owned by company which maintained depots for convenience of freight and passenger service, and maintained regular schedule of arrival and departure of freight and passenger trains.

2. Evidence 🔑586(3, 4).

Testimony that witnesses heard no train signals is sufficient to support finding no warning was given if witnesses were so situated they would have been able to hear signals.

3. Railroads 🔑330(2).

That crossing signals were out of order and continually operating did not absolve deceased, familiar with condition, from exercising due care.

Deceased must have known of defective condition of signals, as he had passed over crossing several times during period they were out of order.

4. Railroads 🔑328(3).

Failure of driver approaching unprotected crossing, view being obstructed, to alight from automobile and advance to ascertain if train is approaching, is contributory negligence.

5. Railroads 🔑350(16).

Where work train, not on regular schedule, followed regular passenger train on single-track road at interval of between 30 and 90 seconds, whether motorist, struck by work train, was contributorily negligent in not observing all precautions held for jury.

The passing of the passenger train in front of motorist was sufficient indication to him that tracks would remain clear for more than ninety seconds, so that quantum of care required of him as reasonably prudent man before proceeding onto tracks was question of fact for jury. Whether automobile was moving at time when struck did not definitely appear from evidence, but eyewitnesses were positive deceased did not stop before the front of his truck was on the tracks or stopped so near thereto it was struck by train.

6. Appeal and error 🔑999(1).

Case being properly before jury, finding could not be disturbed.

7. Railroads 🔑350(16).

Whether approaching electric train was heard by deceased motorist held for jury.

8. Trial 🔑194(3).

Instruction that, if jury believed negative testimony of witnesses who heard no signal prior to accident, conclusion was warranted no signal was given held not erroneous as on weight of evidence.

Jury was elsewhere correctly instructed on burden of proof, credibility of witnesses, that jurors were sole judges of value and effect of evidence and not bound to decide in conformity with declarations of any number of witnesses not producing conviction in their minds, and that testimony of one witness entitled to full credit is sufficient for proof of any fact if it satisfied their minds, as against other witnesses not so satisfying them.

9. Appeal and error 🔑930(2).

Where word of common import is used in instruction, jury is deemed to have understood and applied to it ordinary meaning.

10. Trial 🔑296(3).

Instruction referring to whistle signal "immediately prior to accident" held not misleading or prejudicial in light of other instructions.

Jury must be held to have understood given instruction and applied to it its usual and ordinary meaning, as against contention that phrase was indefinite as to time and might be construed to refer to whistle, which was allegedly sounded when work train was about eight hundred feet from place of accident. "Immediately" is word of common use, the meaning of which is well understood and is variously defined as "without interval of time; without delay; straightway; instantly; at once; without lapse of time; without the intervention of anything; directly; forthwith."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Immediately," see Words and Phrases.]

11. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1).

Instruction that, if crossing bell was out of order and rang continuously to deceased's knowledge, it gave no warning of approach of train, held not to warrant reversal.

Conclusion to be drawn from facts should have been left to jury, but instruction merely stated logical and obvious conclusion, a mere commonplace within general knowledge of jurors, and would not warrant a reversal.

12. Railroads ⚿347(11).

When admissible, evidence of deceased's habit as to stopping, looking, and listening at crossing must be limited to place of accident.

13. Death ⚿60.

Evidence of deceased's habit at railroad crossing is inadmissible, where there are eyewitnesses to accident.

14. Appeal and error ⚿1050(1).

Erroneous admission of deceased's habit at railroad crossing, in view of slight evidence thereof and positive testimony deceased did not stop, held not prejudicial.

McNabb & McCloskey, of San Bernardino, and Kenneth C. Wiseman, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MARKS, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of respondents for damages resulting from the death of Peady Gilbert Lindsey. The case was tried before a jury.

Respondents are the widow and minor children of Peady Gilbert Lindsey, deceased, who was killed at about 8:20 o'clock on the morning of March 20, 1928, in a collision between a truck which he was driving north on Hellman avenue and a west-bound work train of the Pacific Electric Railway Company operated by A. V. Ringo as motorman. The accident occurred at the crossing of the railway company's single track road over Hellman avenue, a public road in San Bernardino county. Hellman avenue runs north and south and is crossed at an acute angle by the railroad track, which runs from northeast to southwest on the company's right of way, which is privately owned. The roadway on Hellman avenue approaches the railway crossing on an ascending grade of about 2 per cent. from the north and about 3½ per cent. for about two hundred feet from the south. At the time of the accident there was an earth bank about four feet high on the east side of Hellman avenue south of the crossing and on the right of way extending northeasterly along the southerly side of the tracks. On this bank, oats and weeds had grown to a height of about two feet. There was an orange orchard on private property to the southeast of Hellman avenue and the right of way so that the view of the tracks to the northeast of a traveler approaching the intersection from the south was thoroughly obscured until he had reached a point about ten feet south of the southerly rail. In approaching the crossing from the south in a truck similar to the one driven by the deceased the front wheels would have to be very close to the track before the driver could see four or five hundred feet of the tracks to his right. The usual cross-arm warning signal was maintained by the railway company north of the track on Hellman avenue. It also maintained an electrically operated wigwag on the west side of Hellman avenue south of the crossing. This wigwag was out of order on the morning of the accident and operated continuously without regard to whether or not trains were approaching. This condition had existed for three or more days prior to the accident. The railway company operated about twelve passenger trains and three freight trains traveling on regular schedule over the crossing each way every day. Deceased had passed the crossing every day, Sundays excepted, for several months, and was familiar with the conditions existing there, including the defective operation of the wigwag.

On the morning of the accident two witnesses traveling south on Hellman avenue saw the wigwag working and stopped their automobile about fifty feet north of the crossing. They saw deceased approaching the crossing from a point about one hundred and sixty feet south of it. He was driving his truck at a speed of not more than fifteen miles per hour, which was gradually decreased until the time of the impact. Whether or not it was moving at this time does not definitely appear. However, both witnesses were positive that he did not stop before the front of his truck was on the track or so near thereto that it was struck by the electric box car of the railway company. We conclude from the undisputed evidence of these witnesses that, while deceased may have listened for an approaching train, he could not look until he was in a position of danger on account of his obstructed view and he did not stop his truck until it, or a portion of it, was in front of the approaching train. It should be noted that these witnesses heard the noise of the freight train as it approached the Hellman avenue crossing.

Under the facts which we have stated appellants maintain with every show of confidence that the judgment cannot be sustained because the evidence shows that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, which will defeat a recovery on the part of respondents. They rely upon the familiar rule in California that, in a case where the view of the driver of an automobile was so obstructed that he could not see a train approaching on a track intersecting his path until his automobile was in grave danger, ordinary care and prudence required him to stop, alight, and walk ahead to a point where he could see down the tracks before he proceeded onto the crossing. Respondents seek to escape the rigors of this rule in the instant case by applying an exception to it which finds authority in other jurisdictions, and which has been considered in the case of Pietrofitta v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. App.) 290 P. 597, 599. They rely upon this rule, which we may summarize as follows: That where the driver of a vehicle on a public highway sees a train running on a regular schedule over a single track road pass in front of him, and then proceeds upon his way and is struck by a second train not running on a regular schedule which is following the first train very closely in point of both time and distance, an unusual circumstance is presented which removes the case from the general rule and makes the question of contributory negligence one of fact to be determined by the jury.

In the instant case it appears that the deceased came into collision with a work train of the railway company which was not running upon any schedule. It was preceded at a distance of from eleven to thirteen hundred feet by a passenger train running on regular schedule. Witnesses for respondents fixed the time elapsing between the passing of the two trains at from one to one and a half minutes. The passenger train was traveling at a speed of from fifty to fifty-five miles per hour and the work train at a speed of about forty miles per hour. Taking the distance separating the two trains as given by the witnesses for respondents and the number of feet the work train would travel in one second at forty miles per hour as furnished by the counsel for appellants and allowing for the reduced speed of the work train just before the accident, the time elapsing between the two trains passing the same point would be about thirty seconds.

There is no direct evidence in the record that the deceased saw the passenger train cross the intersection. However, the crossing was clearly visible for at least one-half a mile south on Hellman avenue. The deceased must be charged with seeing that which was plainly within his vision.

[1] The railway tracks crossing Hellman avenue were part of an interurban electric railroad connecting the cities of Los Angeles and San Bernardino. The right of way was owned by the railway company, which maintained depots for the convenience of its freight and passenger service. It maintained a regular schedule of arrival and departure of freight and passenger trains. The accident we are considering occurred outside of the limits of an incorporated city in rural territory. Under these circumstances the duties and rights of the appellant railway company in operating its trains are similar to those of a company operating steam-propelled trains under similar circumstances. 22 Cal. Jur. 237.

[2] There is evidence in the record which would support the finding that no warning was given of the approach of the work train. In the case of Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709, 711, the court said: "But we think it must be held that there was enough in the evidence to justify the jury in finding that the motorman was negligent in not giving proper warning, by bell or whistle, of his approach. It is true that the only evidence that he did not give such warning was negative, consisting of the statements of the people in the automobile that they heard no signal. But, if they were so situated, as they undoubtedly were, as to have been able to hear a bell or whistle sounded from the motor car, their failure to hear is some evidence that no such signal was given. 1 Wig. Ev. § 664; Stotler v. Chicago & A. Ry. Co., 200 Mo. 107, 98 S. W. 509; Cotton v. Wilmar, etc., Ry. Co., 99 Minn. 366, 116 Am. St. Rep. 422, 9 Ann. Cas. 935, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 643, 109 N. W. 835. That there was positive testimony to the contrary does not conclusively establish that a warning was given. It creates merely a conflict of testimony, which is finally resolved, so far as this court is concerned, by the verdict of the jury. This circumstance alone supports the finding of negligence." Badostain v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 83 Cal. App. 290, 256 P. 576.

[3] We are of the opinion that the fact that the wigwag and crossing bell were out of order, so that they were in continuous operation regardless of whether or not a train was approaching, is of little importance in this case. The deceased must have known of the defective condition of these warning signals, as he had passed over the crossing several times during the period they were out of order. He must have known that their operation did not convey a true notice of the approach of a train, or that the track was clear. He knew that they could not be relied upon, and that he should use the same care to determine the approach of a train before attempting to cross the track that would have been required of him had there been no such warning device maintained at the crossing.

[4] It is well-settled law in California that when the driver of a vehicle approaches a railway crossing not protected by a flagman, gates, or signal devices, where his view of approaching trains is obscured and he cannot otherwise determine whether he can safely proceed, due care requires him to "stop, and get out of his automobile, and go forward on foot, to ascertain if a train is approaching." Koster v. Southern Pacific Co., 207 Cal. 753, 279 P. 788, 794. It has been repeatedly held that under these circumstances the standard of ordinary care required of a motorist is so well and clearly established that his failure to observe and follow this standard constitutes contributory negligence as a matter of law and leaves no issue to be submitted to the jury. It was said in the case of Chrissinger v. Southern Pacific Co., 169 Cal. 619, 149 P. 175, 177, where "the standard of conduct is so obvious as to be applicable to all persons, and the plaintiff has failed to measure up to that standard under the circumstances shown he is not entitled to have his case go to the jury."

[5] It remains for us to determine whether or not the instant case presents any new or added circumstances not appearing in those cases upon which the established rule is founded, which will release the rigor of the general rule by presenting facts not contemplated by it and thereby make the question of contributory negligence a question of fact for the jury instead of one of law for the court. The only fact suggesting itself which might accomplish this result is that of the work train, not on regular schedule, following on a single track road a passenger train on regular schedule at an interval of time not less than thirty nor more than ninety seconds. Would the fact that the regular passenger train had passed over the crossing in front of deceased and proceeded upon its way lull him into a sense of security and give him a sufficient promise of safety and assurance that another train would not follow in such a short space of time, that it would change the quantum of care required of him?

The case of Pietrofitta v. Southern Pacific Company, supra, is the only case in California of which we have knowledge where this question was considered. In this case the court said: "In determining the degree of care which would be expected from a reasonably cautious person in crossing the railroad track under the circumstances of this case the jury might consider the fact that a freight train had just passed and that one would not ordinarily expect another train so soon." A petition for hearing of this case by the Supreme Court after judgment in the District Court of Appeal was denied.

The only case directly in point to which we have been cited is McGhee v. White (C. C. A.) 66 F. 502, 504, decided by Mr. Justice Taft. The facts of this case are so exactly similar to those of the instant case that it would seem a waste of space to set them out here. The court said: "The work train had passed over the crossing not more than one and a half minutes before Kennedy was struck, and he had good reason to believe, therefore, that another train was not following within so short a time and distance. The shortness of time between the two trains * * * would indicate a distance of not more than a sixth or a seventh of a mile between the two trains, running at 20 miles an hour. This is very much less than the usual distance between trains running in the same direction, and is most dangerous. Kennedy might, therefore, reasonably presume that, in the 40 yards he had to go to reach the track, another train would not pass the crossing. At least, this circumstance prevents us from holding as a matter of law that his failure to look was contributory negligence."

There are many cases decided in other states which recognize the rule of contributory negligence in not stopping, looking, and listening at railroad crossings where the view is obstructed, in which the reasoning used lends support to the exception to the rule recognized in the McGhee Case.

In the case of Bonnell v. D., L. & W. R. R. Co., 39 N. J. Law, 189, the driver of a vehicle upon a highway, on approaching a crossing, saw to his right the rear of a train headed away from him. Without doing anything further for his own safety he proceeded upon his way, and was injured at the crossing by the train backing into him. In deciding the case, the court said: "But the plaintiff had looked when about one hundred yards from the crossing, and saw, as he supposed, a train going in the opposite direction, with the rear towards him. He was not required, by any legal rule, to look continually until he crossed the track. A man of prudence might have received a fixed impression, from the appearance of the train, that it was going away from the station. * * * He saw Fancher's wagon crossing just before him, and this circumstance was likely to confirm his belief that there was no train near. It was for the jury to weigh all these facts, and say whether his mistake and consequent feeling of security were unreasonable, and manifested a want of proper care. * * * There were inferences to be drawn from all the facts of this case, upon the question of contributory negligence, which were proper for the jury."

In the case of Duame v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 72 Wis. 523, 40 N. W. 394, 7 Am. St. Rep. 879, the court used the following language: "The train, which consisted of the locomotive, two box cars, and a caboose, had come out on the main tracks from one of the side tracks, and run north across the street; and, when it had passed about two or three car-lengths north of the street, it stopped, and immediately backed down towards the street. * * * There was no flag-man at this crossing, and no one on the rear end of the train, to give warning to those about to cross the track at that place, and whether the bell was rung was a fact in dispute; witnesses for the defendant testifying that it was, and other witnesses testifying that they did not hear it. The deceased, in a one-horse vehicle, was driving west on Main street, towards his home, about seven miles in the country; and had approached within seven or eight rods of the crossing from the east, when the train passed over it, and went on north, out of his sight, and he continued on a trot towards the crossing, and, as his horse stepped on the track, the rear car of the train was very near it, and whether he attempted to back or turn around or pass over the evidence is uncertain, but his carriage came in contact with the rear car, and he was thrown under its wheels, and killed. * * * The evidence tending to prove the negligence of the employees of the defendant is very strong, if not conclusive; and we infer, therefore, that the court directed the verdict on the ground of the contributory negligence of the deceased. * * * As a general rule, and unaffected by other circumstances, the proposition urged in the brief of the learned counsel of the respondent, that one approaching a railroad crossing who may, by looking, have a timely view of an approaching train, is bound to look and listen for its approach, before attempting to cross the track, and that a failure to do so is negligence, may be correct, and the circuit court most probably applied this strict rule to the plaintiff's case. We do not think that such a rule would be applicable to this case. There is a most important fact in this case, that materially modifies this strict rule, and makes it inapplicable, and that is that this train had just passed this crossing while the deceased was within a few rods of it and driving upon a trot, and had passed on out of his sight, and he had reason to suppose that it would continue on, it being upon the main track, like any other train upon its regular route, and had no reason to suppose that it would immediately return. The presumption was that it would go on, and not return. He was thus thrown off his guard. * * * He was entrapped by this unexpected return of the train, for its sudden return over the crossing without warning was to him a trap."

The case of Palmer v. Detroit, etc., Co., 56 Mich. 1, 22 N. W. 88, also recognizes the exception to the general rule. The railroad track ran north and south, crossed by a street at right angles. Plaintiff was proceeding west on the street and saw an engine and tender going north over the crossing. When it passed he proceeded onto the crossing, watching for trains from the south, but not the north. He was injured by the engine and tender backing onto the crossing from the north, which he did not see until too late to avoid injury. It was held that under the circumstances contributory negligence was a question of fact for the jury.

In the case of Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hedges, 105 Ind. 398, 7 N. E. 801, 805, the engine and tender of a train passed over a crossing followed closely by several cars which caused the injury complained of. In holding that the question of contributory negligence was one for the jury, the court said: "The interval of time between the passing of the engine and the coming of the train might, under the evidence, have been found by the jury to have been very short; and considering this fact in connection with the evidence that the whistle was sounded as the engine approached; that the bell was rung as the engine passed; that the cars, only six feet in height, came on without signal; that the view was obstructed; and that the intestate had no knowledge of the time of the train—the jury might conclude that the attention of the intestate was diverted, so that, without negligence on his part, he, for this reason, did not see the train in time to escape; that his conduct was influenced by the defendant's negligent acts, and he was thus thrown off his guard, so that without his having acted otherwise than as might have been excusable in a prudent man, under the circumstances, he was run down. Where the conduct of the defendant was plainly negligent and caused the injury, and there is dispute or doubt as to the negligence of the plaintiff, the conclusion of one man, though learned in the law, should not be forced upon 12 men sworn to try the facts. If there was any evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's intestate was thrown off his guard by such means as might have such effect upon an ordinary prudent man—and we think there was some such evidence—it was not wrong to submit to the jury the question of contributory negligence."

In the case of York v. Maine Central Ry. Co., 84 Me. 117, 24 A. 790, 792, 18 L. R. A. 60, the court said: "But sometimes there may be indications that nothing will pass along the railroad for some minutes at least. The gates (where there are gates) may be up,—a standing assurance to the traveler that no cars or engines are coming. Hooper v. Railroad Co., 81 Me. 260, 17 A. 64. The retiring of a flagman from the crossing may inform the traveler that he may now cross safely. In view of the well-known and necessary rule requiring considerable space and time between successive trains, the passage of one train may be an indication that no other will pass the same way for some minutes. These and other acts upon the part of the railroad may throw the usually prudent traveler off his guard, and free him from the reproach of negligence in attempting to cross at such a time."

Other cases which lend support to the exception we are considering are Bowen v. N.

Y. Central Ry. Co., 89 Hun, 594, 35 N. Y. S. 540; Phillips v. Milwaukee, etc., Co., 77 Wis. 349, 46 N. W. 543, 9 L. R. A. 521; French v. Taunton, etc., Co., 116 Mass. 537; and Scott v. St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co., 79 Ark. 137, 95 S. W. 490, 116 Am. St. Rep. 67, 9 Ann. Cas. 212. The following cases do not recognize the exception to the general rule that one must stop and look and listen before entering upon a railway crossing or be adjudged guilty of contributory negligence. Bush v. Union Pacific Ry. Co., 62 Kan. 709, 64 P. 624; Long v. Pacific, etc., Ry. Co., 74 Or. 502, 144 P. 462, 145 P. 1068, L. R. A. 1915F, 1151; and Durbin v. O. R. & N. Co., 17 Or. 5, 17 P. 5, 11 Am. St. Rep. 778.

The rule that one approaching an unguarded railroad crossing where his view is obstructed must stop, look, and listen or be found guilty of contributory negligence is based upon the fact that the law has established a rule of conduct which the ordinarily prudent person must follow under given and fixed circumstances. Where different circumstances are presented, the reason for the rule fails. We believe that the passing of the passenger train in front of Lindsey was a sufficient indication to him that the tracks would remain clear for more than ninety seconds, so that the quantum of care required of him as a reasonably prudent man before proceeding onto the tracks was a question of fact to be determined by the jury.

In the case of Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 P. 651, the court said: "The rule is that negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even when there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence. This proposition has been frequently declared by this court. [Citing cases.] The rule is general, and appellant presents a very long list of cases in which the rule has been stated. The effect of all is the same. If but one conclusion can reasonably be reached from the evidence, it is a question of law for the court; but if one sensible and impartial man might decide that the plaintiff had exercised ordinary care, and another equally sensible and impartial man that he had not exercised such care, it must be left to the jury. McKune v. Santa Clara Co., 110 Cal. 480, 42 P. 980." Seller v. Market-Street Ry. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 72 P. 1006; Hoff v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 158 Cal. 596, 112 P. 53; Gregg v. Western Pacific Co., 193 Cal. 212, 223 P. 553.

The following reasoning used in the case of Vaca v. Southern Pacific Co., 91 Cal. App. 470, 267 P. 346, 349, is pertinent: "While a traveler about to cross a railroad track is generally charged with the duty of stopping and looking before crossing the tracks, in each particular case his discharge of that duty and his care or negligence is to be measured in the light of surrounding conditions and circumstances. It is true that he may not seek redress for an injury caused solely through his own carelessness, but in measuring his conduct a jury may take into consideration that the railroad company has created a condition which has caused the traveler to relax his own vigilance so that he is brought to his destruction or injury. Scott v. San Bernardino Valley Co., 152 Cal. 610, 93 P. 677; Runnels v. United Railroads, 175 Cal. 528, 166 P. 18. It is only when the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts and that from these facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his own injury, that the law steps in and forbids the plaintiff a recovery. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 240, 116 P. 513. In Smith v. Southern Pacific Co., 201 Cal. 57, 255 P. 500, the court uses this language: 'The rights and obligations of all persons using a public street are, in this respect, reciprocal. Each may rightfully expect that the other will, at the proper time, discharge his proper duty toward others. He cannot rely wholly on the care of others, nor, on that account, neglect to use the precautions which the particular situation demands of him. But he frequently must, to some extent, depend on others in such situations, and his conduct must be considered in view of that fact in determining whether or not it is negligent. His care, or want of care, in such cases is generally a matter to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time.' See, also, Marini v. Southern Pacific Co., 201 Cal. 392, 257 P. 74, and Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 275, 277, 55 P. 908."

[6] Applying these rules to the unusual facts and circumstances of this case, and having in mind the fact that the question of what would or would not constitute ordinary care on the part of deceased in approaching the crossing under these unusual facts and circumstances has not been fixed by a definite rule of law in this state, we therefore conclude that what was or was not ordinary care on his part was a question of fact properly left to the jury. The jury absolved the deceased from the charge of contributory negligence. Its finding is final and cannot be disturbed by us.

[7] Appellants also attempt to predicate contributory negligence of deceased on the noise made by the work train in approaching the crossing. They argue that since this noise was heard by others it was or should have been heard by deceased and constituted sufficient warning of the approach of danger to require him to heed the warning and stop. Whether or not he heard or should have heard the noise was a question of fact for the jury. Skaggs v. Willhour (Cal. Sup.) 292 P. 649.

[8] Appellants complain of an instruction given by the trial court at the request of respondents, as follows: "Testimony of several witnesses near the crossing where deceased met his death, to the effect that they heard no whistle of the train of the Pacific Electric Railway Company which collided with the truck of the deceased, until immediately prior to the accident, is sufficient, if believed by the jury, to warrant the conclusion that no such signal was given prior to said time, and you are instructed that a failure to give due and timely warning of the approach of said train would be negligence on the part of said motorman and on the part of the Pacific Electric Railway Company."

They insist that this is an instruction on the weight and value of the evidence and therefore erroneous. In the case of Keena v. United Railroads, 197 Cal. 148, 239 P. 1061, 1063, it was said: "It is sufficient to say that the weight to be given to negative testimony often arises in railroad and other accident cases where it is claimed that signals were not given, and that in such cases, the question is purely for the jury, and it has frequently been held that negative evidence of this character is sufficient to sustain a verdict (Jones on Evidence [Horwitz], § 893, p. 400), even though it conflict with other evidence to the effect that a warning was actually given. Thompson v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709." The case of Badostain v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 83 Cal. App. 290, 256 P. 576, is to the same effect.

[9, 10] The instruction told the jury in effect that, if they believed the testimony of the witnesses who did not hear the warning whistle blown or the bell rung on the work train, they might conclude that no such warnings had been given. The jury was elsewhere correctly instructed on the burden of proof; credibility of witnesses; that jurors were the sole judges of the value and effect of the evidence and are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses which do not produce conviction in their minds; and that the testimony of one witness entitled to full credit is sufficient for the proof of any fact if it satisfied their minds, as against the testimony of other witnesses which did not so satisfy them. Taken in connection with the other instructions, we think the effect of the instruction in question was to inform the jurors that, if the negative testimony of the witnesses who did not hear warnings given by the work train produced conviction of its truth in their minds, it would be sufficient to support the finding that such warnings had not been given. Appellants further complain of this instruction because of the use of the phrase therein, in referring to a warning whistle, of "immediately prior to the accident." They contend that this phrase is indefinite as to time and might be construed to refer to a whistle which the trainmen testified was sounded when the work train was about eight hundred feet northeasterly from the place of the accident. The word "immediately" is one of common use, the meaning of which is well understood. In Webster's International Dictionary it is defined as "without interval of time; without delay; straightway; instantly; at once." In Funk & Wagnalls Standard Dictionary it is defined as "without lapse of time; instantly; at once; without the intervention of anything." In the case of Newkirk v. Gross, 203 Ill. App. 79, when this word was used in an instruction, it was held to mean "instantly, directly, without delay, forthwith," and that its use could not have misled the jury. Where a word of common import is used in an instruction, the jury must be held to have understood it and applied to it its usual and ordinary meaning. We do not believe the use of this phrase could have misled the jury. While the verbiage of the instruction might have been improved upon, we conclude that, when it is considered with the other instructions, no prejudicial error followed from its being given to the jury.

[11] Appellants also complain of an instruction given at the request of respondents as follows: "If the jury finds from the evidence that the signal bell maintained at the crossing at the intersection of Hellman avenue with the tracks of the Pacific Electric Railway Company was out of order so that it rang continuously and had been ringing continuously for several days prior to the collision, whether a train was near the crossing or not, and that deceased used said crossing frequently while said bell was thus out of repair and that he knew of the bell's unreliability, then you are instructed that the ringing of said signal bell, or wig-wag bell, at and immediately prior to the attempt of the deceased to cross the track of the defendant Pacific Electric Railway Company, was no notice to him of the approach of the work-train which later collided with his truck."

They contend that this instruction was on the facts and invaded the province of the jury. The court told the jury in this instruction that, if the bell was out of order so that it rang continuously for several days without regard to approaching trains, and this fact was known to deceased, it gave him no warning of the approach of a train. This instruction gave no rule of law to the jury. That the ringing of the defective bell gave no warning to deceased was a deduction or conclusion drawn from the facts given in the balance of the instruction. Whether or not these facts were established by the evidence was correctly left to the jury. The conclusion to be drawn from them also should have been left to the jury. However, we fail to see how any other conclusion could have been drawn from these facts by one of average intelligence. The instruction merely stated a logical and obvious conclusion—"a mere commonplace within the general knowledge of jurors; and we do not think that either the giving or the refusing of such an instruction would warrant a reversal." Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 P. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124; Hirshfeld v. Dana, 193 Cal. 142, 223 P. 451, 457.

[12-14] Appellants complain of the ruling of the court in permitting Elbert Lindsey, son, and Lillian E. Lindsey, widow, of deceased, over their objection, to testify to the habit of deceased when about to cross a railroad track. When Elbert Lindsey was on the witness stand the following occurred:

"(Q.) By Mr. Wiseman: Are you familiar with the habits of your father as to stopping and looking and listening at railroad crossings?

"Mr. Morris: I object to that as not in rebuttal, incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial.

"The Court: The objection is overruled.

"(A.) Yes sir.

"(Q.) What were his habits in that regard?

"Mr. Morris: Objected to as irrelevant and immaterial and incompetent. There is evidence here of what was done on this occasion.

"The Court: The objection is overruled.

"(A.) He would always stop and look and listen."

During the testimony of Mrs. Lindsey the following occurred:

"(Q.) Are you familiar with his habits, regarding his habits at railroad crossings? (A.) I am.

"Mr. Morris: I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, because the evidence shows that there were eye-witnesses to the accident.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"(A.) He was very strict; he stopped, looked and listened."

It must be conceded that these rulings were erroneous.

The evidence is open to objection on two grounds: First, because it is too general, and, second, because there were two eye-witnesses to the accident. When admissible, evidence of the habit of deceased should have been limited to habit at the place of the accident. Evidence at another place and under different circumstances has been held too remote. Blackford v. Beckworth, 90 Cal. App. 37, 265 P. 514. Evidence of habit is not admissible where there are eye-witnesses to an accident. The dicta in the case of Wallis v. Southern Pacific Co., 184 Cal. 662, 195 P. 408, 15 A. L. R. 117, upon which the trial court seemed to have based its ruling in admitting this evidence, has not been followed in later cases. The admission of this class of evidence is now limited to cases where there are no eye-witnesses to the accident. Starr v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 187 Cal. 270, 201 P. 599; Chappell v. San Diego, etc., Co., 201 Cal. 560, 258 P. 73; People v. Crossan, 87 Cal. App. 5, 261 P. 531; Blackford v. Beckworth, supra; Gorman v. County of Sacramento, 92 Cal. App. 656, 268 P. 1083.

We have quoted all of the evidence in the record concerning the habit of deceased in stopping before crossing a railroad. As we have observed, two witnesses testified that he did not stop, and no witness contradicted this evidence. After reading the record we have concluded that deceased did not stop. The jurors are presumed to be reasonable human beings subject to reasonable mental reactions. We cannot see how a reasonable person would give the slight evidence of habit appearing in the record any serious consideration in view of the positive testimony of two witnesses that deceased did not stop before going on the tracks before the collision. We therefore conclude that under the facts and circumstances of the instant case, the admission of this evidence was not prejudicial error. While the evidence is sharply conflicting, there is sufficient material evidence in the record to support the conclusion that the proper warning signals were not given by the work train on its approach to the crossing. This established negligence on the part of appellants, which the jury found was the proximate cause of the injury to deceased. Under the peculiar circumstances of this case we hold that the question of the contributory negligence of deceased was properly left to the jury. The verdict resolved this question against appellants. While there were technical errors of law committed in the giving of an instruction and in rulings on the admission of evidence, we do not consider them sufficiently prejudicial to warrant a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

> Const. art. 12, § 16, provides that a corporation may be sued in the county "where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs; or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated." The insurance company's breach of contract to pay the disability benefits occurred at the place where payment was agreed to be made. However the rider of the policy providing for permanent disability failed to state the place of payment of the benefits, and the only place of payment designated in the contract was the designation of the home office for payment in case of death.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by Leslie Lee Burr against the Western States Life Insurance Company. From an order denying defendant's motion for a change of the place of trial, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal herewith adopted, see 288 P. 444.

Hale McCowen, Jr., of Ukiah, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

A hearing was granted in this court after decision (288 P. 444) by the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, per Mr. Presiding Justice Finch, in order to examine more fully the single question presented by the record. Upon such examination we are satisfied with the majority opinion of the District Court of Appeal, and hereby adopt it as the opinion of this court. It reads as follows:

This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for a change of the place of trial from Mendocino county to the city and county of San Francisco.

In June, 1919, the plaintiff "at the town of Wailuku, in the island of Maui, territory of Hawaii, and while he was then a resident of said island of Maui, made and executed his two certain applications in writing, * * * each applying to defendant for a policy of life insurance upon the life of plaintiff in the sum of $5,000, and said applications were duly forwarded to defendant at its home office in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California. * * * Thereupon and in compliance with and in pursuance of said applications, defendant, in said city and county of San Francisco, made and executed the policies of life insurance forming the subject matter of the above entitled action. * * * Thereupon said policies were forwarded to said plaintiff at Wailuku, in said territory of Hawaii." The policies and the riders attached thereto and made a part thereof are identical in language except as to the policy numbers thereof, and each of said policies, in so far as material on this appeal, reads as follows:

"Western States Life Insurance Company, hereinafter known as the company, agrees to pay $5,000 * * * at the home office of the company, in San Francisco, California, as follows:

"To Olive B. Burr, wife of the insured, * * * immediately upon receipt of due proof of the death, during the continuance of this policy, of Leslie Lee Burr of Wailuku, Island of Maui, Territory of Hawaii. * * *

"In witness whereof, Western States Life Insurance Company has caused this policy to be signed by its president and secretary, or assistant secretary, at the home office of the company at San Francisco, California, this thirtieth day of June, 1919."

There was attached to each policy, at the time it was executed, and made a part thereof, a rider containing the following:

"Upon receipt of due proof * * * that the insured * * * has become wholly disabled by bodily injury or disease so that he is and will be presumably, thereby permanently and continuously prevented from engaging in any occupation, or performing any work, whatsoever for remuneration or profit, * * * then * * * one year after the anniversary of the policy next succeeding the receipt of such proof, the company will pay the insured the sum of $500, and a like sum on each anniversary thereafter during the lifetime and continued disability of the insured. * * *

"Upon receipt of due proof * * * that the death of the insured occurred before the policy anniversary nearest his sixtieth birthday as the result, directly and independently of all other causes, of bodily injury effected solely through external, violent and accidental means, and that such death occurred within sixty days after sustaining such injury, the company will pay instead of the face amount of this policy, double that amount, making $10,000, provided no disability benefit has been allowed under the policy. * * *

"Upon due proof * * * during the life of the insured, that the death of the beneficiary occurred before attaining age sixty * * * as the result directly and independently of all other causes, of bodily injury effected solely through external, violent and accidental means while traveling as a passenger on a street car, railway train, steamship, licensed for regular transportation of passengers, or other public conveyance, operated by a common carrier, * * * the company will pay the insured the sum of $2,500."

After the execution of the policies, "on or about the 14th day of October, 1922, and while plaintiff was a resident of the county of San Diego, State of California, and being at that time in said county of San Diego, said plaintiff forwarded and furnished to defendant at its home office in the city and county of San Francisco, proofs that he was then totally and permanently disabled, in accordance with the total and permanent disability provisions of said policies. Thereupon, defendant approved and allowed the claim of said plaintiff for disability benefits, * * * and thereafter and on the 26th day of December, 1922, the defendant, at its home office in said city and county of San Francisco, attached to each of said policies a total and permanent disability endorsement allowing and approving said disability benefits," reading as follows:

"Total and Permanent Disability Endorsement

"Attached to and made a part of Policy No. 30334.

"The insured under this policy, No. 30334, having become totally and permanently disabled in accordance with the total and permanent disability provision of said Policy, and proof of such total and permanent disability having been approved October 14th, 1922, by Western States Life Insurance Company, the said Company agrees, subject to all the terms and conditions contained in the Policy, to waive payment of the premiums which may become due thereunder on and after June 30th, 1923, and to pay an annual income of $500 during the lifetime of the insured, without reduction in the amount of insurance, first payment to be made on June 30th, 1924.

"Western States Life Insurance Company
"Barrett A. Coates,
"Assistant Secretary & Actuary.

"San Francisco, Calif., December 26th, 1922."

The defendant made all the payments provided for by said allowance up to and including that of June 30, 1928, but refused to make any further payments. This action was brought to recover the payment falling due on June 30, 1929.

The defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California and at all times material to the issues of this case its residence and principal place of business has been in the city and county of San Francisco, and it has had no place of business in Mendocino county. The plaintiff was, at the time the action was commenced, and for more than two years prior thereto had been continuously, a resident of Mendocino county. Article 12, § 16, of the Constitution reads as follows: "A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs; or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases."

It is apparent that the only theory upon which the order can be affirmed, if at all, is that the contract of insurance was to be performed in Mendocino county.

[1] "In a suit upon the contract of a corporation, where no place of performance is expressly stipulated, it ought to be held performable in the place where the circumstances, viewed in the light of pertinent code provisions, indicate that the parties expected or intended it to be performed." Bank of Yolo v. Sperry Flour Co., 141 Cal. 314, 316, 74 P. 855, 65 L. R. A. 90.

"A contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as the same is ascertainable and lawful." Civ. Code, § 1636. "When a contract is reduced to writing, the intention of the parties is to be ascertained from the writing alone, if possible; subject, however, to the other provisions of this title." Civ. Code, § 1639. In this case there is nothing whatever except the writing from which to ascertain the intention of the parties. "The whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other." Civ. Code, § 1641. "The words of a contract are to be understood in their ordinary and popular sense, rather than according to their strict legal meaning." Civ. Code, § 1644. "Stipulations which are necessary to make a contract reasonable, or conformable to usage, are implied, in respect to matters concerning which the contract manifests no contrary intention." Civ. Code, § 1655.

[2] No authorities need be cited to show that the riders attached to the contracts are parts thereof and are to be construed to the same effect as if they were set forth in the bodies of the contracts as clauses thereof. Each contract has for its object one general purpose, the payment of benefits, which are divided into four classes: (1) $5,000 upon the death of the insured when not caused by violence; (2) $500 a year upon his becoming totally disabled; (3) $10,000 upon his death by violence; (4) $2,500 upon the death by violence of the insured's wife.

The contract expressly provides that payments of the first class shall be made "at the home office of the company, in San Francisco, California." The contract is silent as to the place at which the other payments are to be made. It was probably deemed unnecessary to state expressly where the other payments, if any should become due, are to be made, the natural inference being that they are to be made at the same place as the first, in the absence of any contrary intention appearing from the terms of the contract. It would be a strained construction of the contract to hold that, after expressly making the first of these benefits payable in San Francisco, the parties intended to make the other benefits payable elsewhere, there being nothing whatever in the contract to indicate such intention. For instance, the parties having expressly made the single death benefit payable in San Francisco, it does not seem possible that they could have understood that payment of the double death benefit is to be made at some other place. The terms of the contract are to be understood in their ordinary and popular sense and as a man of average intelligence and experience would understand them. "Each clause is to be considered with reference to every other clause upon which it has any bearing, and all the clauses and provisions are to be construed together as the unified medium whereby the intent of the parties to the instrument is to be reached." Jones v. Van Nuys, 161 Cal. 158, 165, 118 P. 541, 544. "Each clause of the contract is to be looked to for light in interpreting the others." Estate of Winslow, 121 Cal. 92, 94, 53 P. 362.

[3-5] "The intention of the parties to a contract as to the place where payments are to be made usually appears by express provision, or by necessary inference in the contract itself. In cases where the intention does not thus appear, the general rule is that the debtor must seek his creditor to make payment of his indebtedness. * * * While it is a rule of general acceptation that a debtor must seek his creditor to pay his indebtedness, it is always open to the parties to show by the express terms of the contract, or by fair inference therefrom, that it was the intention of the parties to pay at a particular place or within a particular state or country." 6 R. C. L. 902; 21 R. C. L. 15. "It is a fair deduction that a contract is to be entirely performed at the place where it was made and where it expressly provides that part of the performance (payments, for instance), shall be made." 5 Cal. Jur. 454; Hammond v. Ocean Shore Dev. Co., 22 Cal. App. 167, 170, 133 P. 978; Fitzhugh v. University Realty Co., 46 Cal. App. 198, 201, 188 P. 1023. While uncertainties and ambiguities in insurance policies are to be resolved against the insurer, courts must avoid putting a strained and unnatural construction on the terms of a policy and thereby creating an uncertainty or ambiguity. No term of a contract is either uncertain or ambiguous if its meaning can be ascertained by fair inference from other terms thereof. There is no difficulty in so ascertaining the intention of the parties to this action as to the place of payment, and the court must give effect to that intention.

As said by Chief Justice Waste in Ogburn v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 276 P. 1004, 1005: "In the interpretation of a written instrument the primary object is to ascertain and carry out the intention of the parties thereto. * * * As to the hardships, advantages, or disadvantages which may result from such a construction, the courts have nothing to do. * * * The intention of the parties is, of course, to be ascertained from a consideration of the language employed by them and the subject-matter of the agreement. * * * A contract should be construed, however, as an entirety, the intention being gathered from the whole instrument, taking it by its four corners. * * * We have not lost sight of the familiar rule requiring all uncertainties and ambiguities in a policy of insurance to be resolved against the insurer, who is presumed to have selected and incorporated into the policy the language employed therein. That rule can only have application when the policy actually presents some uncertainty or ambiguity. In the absence thereof, the courts have no alternative but to give effect to the contract of insurance as executed by the parties."

[6] The defendant's breach of contract, if any, occurred at the place where payment was agreed to be made. It may be conceded that, under the constitutional provision quoted, the action could have been maintained in the county of San Diego, that being the county in which the disability of the plaintiff occurred, but the fact that the "obligation or liability" arose in San Diego county does not give the plaintiff the right to prosecute the action in Mendocino county. "Where the action is brought in a county other than one of those mentioned in section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution, the corporation defendant is entitled to have the cause tried in the county of its principal place of business * * * and the change of venue granted because the action has not been brought in the proper county." 7 Cal. Jur. 132.

The order is reversed.

I concur: R. L. THOMPSON, J.

SHENK, J.

I dissent. The main policy, which was an ordinary life policy, provided for the payment of $5,000 to the beneficiary at the company's office in San Francisco, upon due proof of death. Attached to this policy was a rider providing for an annual payment of $500 "to the insured" upon due proof of total permanent disability. In my opinion this was a separate and distinct contract of indemnity and no place of payment thereof was provided for therein. At least the question is left in doubt. The general rule is stated in 48 Corpus Juris, at pages 592, 593, with an abundance of supporting authorities, as follows: "As a general rule, in the absence of any agreement or stipulation to the contrary, a debt is payable at the place where the creditor resides * * * or wherever else he may be found; and it is ordinarily the duty of the debtor to seek the creditor for the purpose of making payment, provided the creditor is within the state of his residence when the payment is due, unless otherwise provided by statute." It is not otherwise provided by statute in this state. Moreover, section 1489 of the Civil Code specifically provides that in the absence of an express provision to the contrary an offer of performance may be made at the option of the debtor "1. At any place appointed by the creditor; or, 2. Wherever the person to whom the offer ought to be made can be found." In this case the creditor elected to have the payment at his place of residence, known to the debtor, in Mendocino county. He could be found there and that was the appropriate place for tender of payment in order to discharge the obligation of the debtor. 24 Cal. Jur. p. 521. Having failed to make tender of payment at the creditor's place of residence, a breach of the debtor's promise to pay occurred at that place, and under section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution the defendant could be sued at that place, no other place of payment being stipulated. See Bank of Yolo v. Sperry Flour Co., 141 Cal. 314, 74 P. 855, 65 L. R. A. 90. In order to conclude that the defendant must be sued in the city and county of San Francisco, the main opinion indulges in inferences as to what was intended by the parties. When inferences must be resorted to, the provision for payment is necessarily not express and uncertainty is present. The rider was on the printed form prepared by the defendant, and it is a cardinal rule that, when uncertainty exists, the contract is to be construed most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. Section 1654, Civ. Code. Furthermore, if the terms of the contract are uncertain they must be interpreted in the sense in which the promisor believed, at the time of making it, that the promisee understood it. Section 1649, Civ. Code. It is inconceivable that the defendant, the promisor in this case, believed that the plaintiff, in case of his permanent total disability, understood that he was to proceed or was to dispatch an agent to San Francisco to demand payment or, in the event of the refusal of payment, that he would be compelled to go to San Francisco to bring suit or suffer his testimony to be taken by deposition.

Much more compelling is the universal rule with reference to insurance policies that when uncertainty exists they will be construed most strongly in favor of the insured. From any and every approach to the problem I think the trial court drew the proper inferences and conclusions and that its order should be affirmed.

Affirmed.

Matot & Stafford, Wesley T. Stafford, and Kenneth E. Matot, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Siemon & Garber, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J.

The plaintiff brought this action to foreclose a lien for materials alleged to have been sold to the defendants and used by them in the sinking of a well. Defendant Dionne did not appear. Defendant Wolski, owner of the land, interposed an answer in which he denied the allegations of the complaint and set up certain special defenses. At the outset of the trial, it was stipulated that all the allegations of the complaint were true, except the allegations charging the defendant Wolski with personal liability for the amount of the claim. The trial court found all the allegations of the complaint to be true, and, in addition, that after the material was furnished by plaintiff the defendant Wolski "ratified and affirmed" the purchase.

[1] Appellant contends that there is a fatal variance between the statements in the claim of lien, as to the ownership of the land and as to whom the materials were sold, and the allegations in the complaint and the facts found by the court; also that neither the allegations nor the findings find support in the evidence. Wolski owned the ranch. Dionne was his tenant farming it, and Wolski had an interest in the crops to the extent of "getting his money" out of Dionne. In order that Dionne might finance the place, Wolski and his wife executed a crop mortgage to one Sachem for $1,500, and the evidence indicates that the well was to be paid for out of this fund. The evidence in the case is very unsatisfactory, but its weight and sufficiency were the problem of the trial court. It can hardly be doubted that Wolski knew of the need of the well. Plaintiff sold the materials to Dionne on the latter's representation that he was farming the land for Wolski, and that Wolski sent him money to pay the local bills. After ascertaining the financial rating of Wolski, plaintiff sold the goods, first charging the account to Dionne and subsequently charging it to Wolski.

[2] Though the evidence is unsatisfactory, inferences may be drawn therefrom in support of the findings and judgment. The outstanding fact is that plaintiff's goods have been actually used in the construction of an improvement on the land of Wolski, from which he no doubt benefited. At the time appellant claims he first knew of the construction of the well, plaintiff might have regained its goods, but, on the assurance of appellant that it would get its money, the plaintiff refrained from thus protecting itself.

[3, 4] Liens of mechanics or materialmen will not be held invalid unless they tend to defraud or fail to impart notice. Code Civ. Proc., § 1203. No variance between allegations in a pleading and the proof is to be deemed material unless it has misled the adverse party. Code Civ. Proc., § 469. The opinion of this court in Ogden v. United Bank, etc., Co., 206 Cal. 571, 275 P. 430, lends abundant support to the conclusion of the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action for damages for assault and battery.

On December 10, 1926, plaintiff and a companion were trespassers upon the inclosed and duly posted game preserve of defendant Spalding Company, a corporation, then and there in charge of the defendant Evans, who was also a duly commissioned deputy sheriff of the county of Glenn.

Plaintiff was in quest of wild geese, and both he and his companion had shotguns. Defendant Evans was in company with two other men, named Pain and Boyd. He discovered the trespassers upon the premises and called to them to come to where he was. It seems that he was stationed at a point between the hunters and the place where their machine was parked. The two hunters approached; the companion being slightly in front of plaintiff. Evans displayed his badge of authority, told the companion who he was, asked him to consider himself under arrest, and ordered him to unload his gun and deliver it to him, which was done. Plaintiff, seeing what was going on, yelled to his companion and directed him not to surrender the gun. Later plaintiff came into the presence of defendant Evans and was told by him to deliver up his gun and consider himself under arrest. Plaintiff declined to surrender his gun.

At this point the evidence is in conflict. Plaintiff contends that he merely asked Evans to show his authority to take and receive from him the gun. Evans and the other witnesses testified that plaintiff made a demonstration as if to use the gun upon Evans. At any rate, Evans, whether justified or not, then struck plaintiff on the head with the empty gun barrel and fractured his skull. The arrest was thereupon completed, and the two trespassers were taken before a magistrate and there booked for trial. Plaintiff has practically recovered from his injury.

[1] He sued defendants, one as servant and the other as the responsible master, claiming that the assault and battery were unprovoked and unlawful. Defendants interposed in the main a plea of self-defense, although it might be said that the defense that Evans was using only the force necessary to overcome the resistance of plaintiff and effectuate his arrest was also made. Under the circumstances, the defense of defendants could only have been either one of the three following propositions: (1) Action necessary for self-defense; (2) use of only so much force as was necessary to subdue plaintiff and effect his arrest (People v. Hardwick, 204 Cal. 582, 586, 269 P. 427, 59 A. L. R. 1480); or (3) the use of so much force only as was necessary to eject plaintiff from the premises. Livesey v. Stock, 208 Cal. 315, 317, 281 P. 70; Walker v. Chanslor, 153 Cal. 118, 126, 94 P. 606, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 455, 126 Am. St. Rep. 61.

It will be noted, however, that as to all these defenses, the essence of the question involved is: Did the defendant Evans use an excessive amount of force upon plaintiff under the circumstances? The jury answered this question in the affirmative and assessed damages against defendants jointly at $3,800. The court on motion for new trial directed that it be granted unless the plaintiff would waive all of said verdict in excess of $1,500. Presumably the plaintiff did this, as the defendants are now prosecuting this appeal.

[2] It is conceded that there is such conflict in the evidence that the verdict may not be disturbed upon the ground that no evidence exists to support it. The sole reliance for reversal is upon a series of instructions given by the court at the request of plaintiff, which defendants characterized as so-called formula instructions, directing a verdict for plaintiff, without specifying all the ingredients necessary for such a declaration. We have examined the several instructions and have carefully read and considered the charge as a whole. We are of the view that, construing the instructions as a whole, it cannot be said that the ones complained of were intended to be so-called formula instructions nor that they had a prejudicial effect upon defendants.

For example, a portion of instruction No. 1 reads: "* * * Therefore if you find from all of the evidence in this case that C. D. Evans as an employee and agent of the defendant Spalding Company and also acting individually committed an assault and battery by using unlawful force and violence upon the person of the plaintiff, Frank Stowell, your verdict should be in favor of the plaintiff." It is true that, standing alone, there is error in this instruction, for it omits to mention self-defense as well as the other defenses above mentioned, but the insertion of the words "by using unlawful force and violence" left the instruction open so as to be read in connection with any other instructions relating to the issues involved, and we find that instructions Nos. 3, 5, 12, and 13, given at the request of plaintiff, and instruction No. 14, given at the request of defendant, when read together, cover all the elements contained in plaintiff's complaint and cover the three above-mentioned defenses that were urged or could have been urged by the defendants.

We think the situation is controlled by such cases as Douglas v. S. P. Co., 203 Cal. 390, 264 P. 237, and Saltzen v. Associated Oil Co., 198 Cal. 157, 161, 244 P. 338.

This being true, it follows that the judgment must be, and it is, hereby affirmed.

MILLS v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.

L. A. 12403.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 25, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 26, 1931.

Attorney and client ⚷58.

Evidence respecting attorney's breach of trust in connection with handling of funds held to require suspension for one year.

In Bank.

Proceeding by Homer C. Mills to review an order of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California recommending that petitioner be disbarred from practice of law within the state.

Petitioner suspended for one year.

Homer C. Mills, of Long Beach, and Henry P. Leavitt, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Mott, Vallee & Grant and Paul Vallee, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This proceeding was instituted to review an order of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California, recommending to this court that petitioner, Homer C. Mills, be disbarred from the practice of the law in this state, which recommendation was based upon findings made by local administrative committee No. 3 of the county of Los Angeles, after its hearing, upon legal notice and in due form, of the charges preferred against him.

Petitioner's several contentions may be summarized in the statement that he claims that the findings were not justified under the evidence, which was without substantial conflict and was insufficient to sustain any of the charges made against him, and that the committee erred in refusing to reopen the proceedings for further testimony and to consider the effect of certain additional evidence submitted in the petition in affidavit form.

On March 14, 1926, complainant, E. E. Easton and petitioner entered into the following written contract: "La Jolla 658 Schaeder 1297 Coast Blvd., Mar. 14/26 I hereby agree to take over the matter of the further prosecution of the suit of E. E. Easton versus Susan T. Brant et al. Now pending in the Federal Courts of California, as chief counsel, and to defend a divorce action now pending at Los Angeles No. D38874 between Elise H. Easton and said E. E. Easton; to bring any and all other actions necessary to fully protect the rights and interests of said E. E. Easton in above actions, or in or to other property interests growing out of certain leasing commissions, or any of the matters connected with said causes for twenty-five (25%) of any and all sums recovered, provided that said E. E. Easton shall pay any and all necessary court costs or other expenses. (signed) Homer C. Mills. I hereby accept the above proposition. (signed) E. E. Easton."

All of complainant's assets were at the time tied up in litigation, and he was without any immediate funds whatsoever. Because of complainant's financial situation, petitioner promised that he would secure the money necessary to pay the costs of the pending litigation, plus $1,000 to be advanced to complainant for payment of certain personal obligations and costs in connection with said divorce action; the total amount required being estimated at $6,000. Thereafter and on April 10, 1926, petitioner produced one E. R. Dampier, who agreed to advance said sum of $6,000, and to whom complainant gave his note for that amount, executed jointly by himself and one Dyer B. Holmes.

It is petitioner's alleged breach of trust in connection with the handling of portions of this fund on behalf of complainant which forms the basis of this proceeding. It is sufficient to set forth a few of the serious and vital discrepancies in the accounting between them, which point unerringly to a failure by petitioner to account for a part of the fund which came into his hands.

In the first place, petitioner failed to furnish any proper bills or vouchers to cover a number of the expenditures alleged to have been made by him on behalf of complainant from the trust fund of $5,000 supposed to have remained in his hands after payment to complainant of the $1,000 for his personal use. Said Dampier, the lender of said sum, was a law clerk, not admitted to practice in California, but employed by petitioner during the time said services were to be rendered at a salary of $200 per month. The evidence fails to show whether the $6,000 was ever actually loaned by said Dampier to complainant, and it fairly supports the finding that said Dampier advanced to petitioner, on account of said loan, only an undetermined part of the total sum, which part was paid in installments over a period of time. Petitioner, however, did not at any time, inform complainant that said $6,000 was received by him in installments, but permitted him to repay the whole sum of $6.000, together with interest on the whole amount thereof for the whole period of time as expressed in the note.

Petitioner submitted an alleged receipt of Dampier for $1,000 paid him from said fund for "Service for checking record, briefing, etc. * * *" Convincing evidence is lacking that petitioner ever paid this sum to Dampier out of said trust fund, but, even if he had, it would have been an improper payment, as said services were such as petitioner himself was bound to perform under said contract. Furthermore, the evidence supports the opinion of the committee that said Dampier, having loaned petitioner only an undetermined portion of said $6,000, gave his receipt for $1,000 to petitioner to be used by petitioner in padding his account.

Petitioner likewise charged complainant with an item of "Extra help in typing record, making copies of exhibits, rechecking records, typing briefs, etc., $1096.95," $711.95 of which was an improper charge. With the exception of $385 paid for copies of exhibits, the item covered services originally contemplated and covered as the natural overhead of a law office and services of a general clerical nature, part of which at least were performed in connection with petitioner's general office work, apart from work on litigation in which complainant was interested.

Petitioner likewise wrongfully charged an item of advice and assistance in procuring delay in payment of alimony judgment, $200 which was covered by his original contract of employment. He also improperly charged an item of advice and assistance in securing a two years' extension of Holmes' indebtedness, $500; no services of this nature being requested by complainant or rendered by him. In connection with the taking of certain depositions, petitioner also charged complainant with the sum of $177.40, $67.40 of which still remained unpaid and for collection of which he had referred the deposition notary to complainant.

In short, from the evidence it appears that, over and above the amounts legitimately paid out by petitioner, he failed to properly account for the items above mentioned, to wit, $1,000 alleged to have been paid said Dampier, $711.95 for stenographic help, etc., and $67.40 on depositions.

The additional evidence submitted by petitioner has been carefully examined. It throws no further light upon the case, but merely sets forth certain letters sent to him by complainant's attorney in an effort to secure an accounting, and, in view of the findings of the committee, a later effort to secure from said Dampier a return of such portion of said $6,000 as was never loaned by Dampier to him for use in complainant's behalf.

Notwithstanding the serious misconduct of petitioner as outlined above, we hesitate to inflict upon him permanent disbarment. Under the contract he was not required to secure any money for the expenses of litigation nor for the personal use of the client. The contract between them was thus departed from at least to that extent. Moreover, petitioner, with apparent skill and ability conducted a vast amount of litigation for complainant, taking one case even to the Supreme Court of the United States. For these services under the contract he could receive no compensation. In view of the other departures from said contract and in view of all the surrounding circumstances, petitioner may have believed that he would be justified morally in padding his account to supply the absence of compensation. He is well advanced in life and, so far as shown, has heretofore been a lawyer of integrity and ability, and may even yet, if given the opportunity, redeem himself from the odium of this present offense. Accordingly, we have concluded to impose upon him a suspension from practice.

It is therefore ordered that petitioner herein, Homer C. Mills, be, and he is hereby, suspended from the practice of law in this state for the period of one year from and after the date of filing of this order.

RICHARDS, J.

The plaintiffs commenced this action on behalf of themselves and of the Eureka Fishermen's Union, a voluntary association of commercial fishermen, against the defendants, who are members and officers of the California Fish and Game Commission, to restrain the latter from interfering with or prosecuting criminal or other actions against the plaintiffs and their fellow members of the association on account of the transportation or possession by the plaintiffs and their associates, of fresh salmon caught on the high seas and in the course of being transported over and across certain fish and game districts, wherein the taking or possession of fresh salmon was at the time prohibited by state law. Upon the filing of a verified complaint seeking the foregoing relief, the superior court of Humboldt county issued a temporary restraining order, and also an order to show cause why a preliminary injunction should not issue. Upon the return day of the latter order and after a hearing thereon, the trial court issued a preliminary injunction granting the relief sought pendente lite. It is from such order that the defendants have taken and are prosecuting this appeal.

It is the appellants' first contention that the plaintiffs were not in any event entitled to an injunction for the reason that under the provisions of section 526 of the Code of Civil Procedure "an injunction cannot be granted * * * to prevent the execution of a public statute by officers of the law for the public benefit." The difficulty with this contention is that it assumes the existence of a fact which is the very fact in controversy in the present proceeding, and which is as to whether or not there is an existing public statute covering the situation presented by the plaintiffs' complaint and which the defendants, as officers of the law, were attempting or were threatening to enforce at the time the preliminary injunction was sought and obtained by the plaintiffs. The authorities cited by the appellants in support of their foregoing contention have relation to statutory offenses which the officers of the law referred to therein are engaged in enforcing, and which the persons against whom such enforcement is sought are seeking to evade prosecution upon the showing either that they are not guilty of such statutory offense or that the law defining the same does not apply to such a person or class of persons. In the present case, however, it is the respondents' contention that there is no statute which renders unlawful the acts of the plaintiffs in seeking to transport the salmon which they have lawfully taken upon the high seas, and which at the time of their attempted or threatened prosecution they were engaged in transporting to a place wherein they were lawfully entitled to possess and sell fish thus lawfully taken. It is to this question, therefore, that we must direct our attention in considering this case upon the merits.

[1] We do not deem it necessary to restate the law which has been heretofore consistently decided by this court touching the right of the state in the exercise of its police power to regulate and control the taking, possession and sale or other transportation of fish and game. It will suffice for the purposes of this cause to cite but a few of the leading cases declaring this uniform rule: Paladini v. Superior Court, 178 Cal. 369, 173 P. 588; People v. Stafford Packing Co., 193 Cal. 719, 227 P. 485; People v. Monterey Fish Products Co., 195 Cal. 548, 234 P. 398, 38 A. L. R. 1186, and cases cited. That the principle thus asserted is applicable to sea products caught upon the high seas beyond the three-mile limit of state jurisdiction and sought to be brought into or transported over portions of the state which have been subjected to statutory regulation affecting the taking, possession, and sale of fish, and other marine products, see Van Camp Sea Food Co. v. Department of Natural Resources (D. C.) 30 F.(2d) 111; Union Fishermen's, etc., Co. v. Shoemaker, 98 Or. 659, 193 P. 476, 194 P. 854; State v. Schuman, 36 Or. 16, 58 P. 661, 47 L. R. A. 153, 78 Am. St. Rep. 754; Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 37 P. 402, 42 Am. St. Rep. 129.

We thus arrive at the particular facts of this case with which the trial court undertook to deal in the issuance of its preliminary injunction. The plaintiff and their fellow members of the Eureka Fishermen's Union have been engaged for some time in conducting fishing operations out of the city and harbor of Eureka in Humboldt county, in the course of which they were wont to fish for salmon in the waters of the Pacific Ocean at points exceeding three miles west of the coast line of the state of California and which points are also to the westward of certain fish and game districts which have been created by the legislature of the state of California and which lie along the coast line of said state and within the boundaries of the several coast counties thereof which extend from Humboldt to Santa Cruz. The several fish and game districts immediately concerned in this litigation are numbered districts 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and also district 1½, which latter district embraces or includes the city of Eureka.

The particular statute defining these several districts was adopted in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1058) and was from time to time amended down to the year 1927, when it took on the form and content existing at the time of the commencement of the present action (St. 1927, p. 1128). In the meantime those several sections of the Penal Code relating to violations of the laws for the preservation of fish and game were being amended and enacted until they also took on the form in which they stood when this action was begun. An examination of these statutes and of the said provisions of the Penal Code disclose that the times within which salmon may be taken, possessed, and sold within these several districts varies, so that at certain times it is lawful to take, possess, or offer for sale salmon in one of said districts when at the same time it is unlawful so to do in another one or more thereof. It is out of this state of the law that the present controversy has arisen, since, as asserted in the plaintiffs' complaint, the plaintiffs having lawfully engaged in fishing for salmon upon the high seas at points exceeding three miles west of the coast line of the state of California, were undertaking to bring their catch, thus lawfully taken, into the state of California and over and across fish and game districts 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 thereof, for the purpose of possession and sale thereof in the city of Eureka, which lies within district No. 1½ thereof, and in which at said time the possession and sale of salmon was not unlawful. It was asserted by plaintiffs in their complaint and found to be the fact by the trial court as the basis for the making of its said order that the defendants herein, as members and officers of said fish and game commission, were attempting and threatening to prevent the plaintiffs from so transporting the salmon, thus by them lawfully taken, across such of said fish and game districts in which the possession and sale of salmon caught or taken therein was at the time unlawful, in order to reach their destination at the city of Eureka, wherein they might lawfully possess, offer for sale, and sell their said fish.

The vital question involved in this situation is that presented by the interpretation to be placed upon the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 634 of the Penal Code, as said section read at the time of the commencement of this action (St. 1927, p. 958). This section of the Penal Code has special reference to the taking, catching, killing, possession, and sale of salmon. By the terms thereof, as it then read, it was provided substantially that: Every person who takes, catches or kills in any manner, or possesses, any salmon other than as provided for in this act is guilty of a misdemeanor. Subdivision 3 thereof, however, contains the proviso that every person who in fish and game district 1½ between the 1st day of June and the 31st day of July of the same year, both dates inclusive, or between the 17th day of September and the 14th day of November of the same year, both dates inclusive, "takes, catches, kills, or has in his possession more than two fresh salmon during any one calendar day, or who buys, sells, offers or exposes for sale any fresh salmon, is guilty of a misdemeanor; provided that nothing in this act shall prohibit the possession or sale at any time of any salmon from Oregon or Washington, or the possession or sale of any salmon lawfully taken in any fish or game district." A fair interpretation of the foregoing provision of the Penal Code would seem to be that it was not therein intended to declare unlawful the possession or sale in any district, and especially in the districts specifically mentioned in subdivision 3 of said section of the Penal Code, at any time of salmon brought into the state of California from Oregon or Washington, or the possession or sale at any time, in said or any fish and game district, of salmon lawfully taken therein or in any other fish and game district. If the foregoing proviso contained in subdivision 3 of section 634 of the Penal Code, as the same read at the time of the commencement of this action, is thus truly interpreted, it would seem to follow that the possession and sale of salmon in any fish and game district, which had been lawfully taken or caught in any of the other fish and game districts, was not prohibited under any provision of the law relating to the possession or sale of salmon. If this be true, it would seem to further follow that the provisions of the fish and game laws which purport to render unlawful the possession or sale of salmon in any particular district during the closed season therein must be held to have relation only to such salmon as had been unlawfully taken or caught therein or in some other of the fish and game districts of the state. It is significant in this connection to note that at the very time when this action was commenced the Legislature had undertaken to clarify the language of subdivision 3 of section 634 of the Penal Code by an amendment thereof which provided that "the sale of salmon legally taken in all other districts or shipped into the state is not prohibited." It is true that the above amendment of this section of the Penal Code, although enacted at said time by the Legislature, had not yet become effective. But, nevertheless, it serves some purpose as indicating the legislative intent with respect to the lawfulness of the possession and sale of salmon lawfully taken in any district or lawfully brought into the state from elsewhere. The appellants herein concede in their final brief herein that the spirit and intent of this latest expression of the legislative will should govern the disposition of the present action. Before leaving the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 634 of the Penal Code, as the same read when the present action was begun, it may be proper to state that while said provision does not specifically refer to salmon lawfully taken or caught upon the high seas, it would be quite unreasonable to infer that it was not within the legislative intent to render lawful the possession and sale of salmon within the state of California wherever lawfully taken or caught. The section in its present form clearly evinces such intent. We look vainly through the many and complex regulations of the fish and game laws for any provision therein which could or should be so construed to render it unlawful to possess or sell anywhere or at any time this edible and perhaps most universally desired and used of all marine products when it appeared that the same had been caught or taken upon the high seas and beyond the three-mile limit of our state boundaries and jurisdiction.

[2] By the foregoing course of reasoning we are brought to consider the final and precise contention of the appellants, which is that notwithstanding the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 634 of the Penal Code, the transportation of salmon from a place where it has been lawfully taken across a particular district during the closed season therein, and at a time when the possession of salmon therein was unlawful, is an offense against the fish and game laws which the fish and game commission, its members and officers, were entitled to prosecute and for the prosecution of which as against these plaintiffs they could not be lawfully enjoined. We look again vainly for any provision of the fish and games laws which expressly renders it unlawful to transport salmon from the place where it has been lawfully taken or caught to another place within the state wherein it may at said time be lawfully possessed and sold. On the contrary, we find that wherever in the fish and game laws the subject of transportation is mentioned it has reference to a transportation which is at the place of inception thereof unlawful, and that nowhere within the provisions of the fish and game laws can any provision be found which renders it unlawful to transport fish or game from the place where lawfully caught and lawfully offered for transportation to the place wherein its possession is also lawful. Sections 627a, 627b, and 632a of said Penal Code have special reference to the transportation of fish and game when the same is undertaken by railroad companies, express companies, transportation companies, or other common carrier, and it is nowhere stated therein or elsewhere that the transportation of these forms of food products from the place where they have been lawfully taken, caught or killed, to another portion of the state wherein they may be lawfully possessed or used is rendered unlawful by the fact that in the course of such transportation such food products may be carried through a fish and game district during the closed season therein.

[3] We therefore conclude that at the time of the commencement of the present action there was no existing statute which prohibited or rendered unlawful the possession or transportation of salmon lawfully taken or caught upon the high seas across any of the fish and game districts referred to in said action in order that the same might be carried to the city of Eureka, wherein such salmon might at said time be lawfully possessed and sold. It follows that the trial court was not in error in the issuance of the preliminary injunction herein. This conclusion renders unnecessary a discussion of the question as to whether the plaintiffs herein have brought themselves within the category of those engaged in interstate commerce.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by Hugh L. Adkins against G. L. Potter, F. K. Potter, J. B. Wilbur, Edward F. Harris, and the Commercial & Savings Bank of Stockton. Judgment in favor of plaintiff against first three defendants, and first two defendants appeal.

Affirmed as to defendant F. K. Potter, and reversed as to defendant G. L. Potter.

Case & Forslund, Carlton C. Case, Warren H. Atherton, Barry McDermott, Louttit & Marceau, and Louttit & Stewart, all of Stockton, for appellants.

George A. Work, of San Francisco, and A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal by two of the defendants from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in an action for damages for fraud and deceit alleged to have been practiced upon the plaintiff by all of the defendants acting in concert, by reason whereof the plaintiff was induced to exchange his real property for real property of one of the defendants. It was also alleged that the defendant vendor made certain false and fraudulent representations which also were the proximate cause of the loss sustained by the plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict in favor of two of the defendants, Edward F. Harris and Commercial & Savings Bank of Stockton, and in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $4,750 against the remaining defendants, G. L. Potter, F. K. Potter, also designated herein as Kyle Potter, and J. B. Wilbur. From the judgment entered upon this latter verdict, the defendants G. L. Potter and F. K. Potter only appeal. The judgment has become final as to the defendant J. B. Wilbur.

The plaintiff, prior to December 12, 1924, was the owner of a lot improved by a residence and situated in Stockton. Prior to that time the defendant Kyle Potter owned a 42-acre farm situated outside of Stockton. On that date the parties effected an exchange of their properties upon terms which will hereinafter appear. About March, 1926, the farm, upon which in the meantime the plaintiff had moved, was sold under the terms of the deed of trust given by the plaintiff as a part of the purchase price. Thereafter the plaintiff brought this action, with the result above noted.

The main contention of the appellants is that the jury's determination must necessarily be based upon a finding that the three defendants, Wilbur and the two Potters, acted in concert, and that the record is devoid of any evidence of a conspiracy among them. It is also contended that the false representations shown to have been made by Wilbur do not constitute actionable fraud.

The evidence favorable to the plaintiff on the theory of conspiracy and which in the main is the plaintiff's own testimony, is, in substance, as follows:

The defendant G. L. Potter had for a number of years been employed by the defendant Commercial & Savings Bank of Stockton as note teller. The plaintiff banked with the Commercial & Savings Bank of Stockton and had had other business dealings with it. In August, 1924, the plaintiff went to G. L. Potter's window at the bank and stated to Potter that he would like to exchange his equity in his Stockton property for a small piece of farming land the value of which would equal the equity in his Stockton property. G. L. Potter informed him that the bank sometimes had property to exchange, and during the same afternoon they drove out near Escalon to look at a piece containing 40 acres, with which the plaintiff was not satisfied because of its size and because it was not suitable to his purposes. On their return to Stockton, Potter informed the plaintiff that his brother, Kyle Potter, owned a place near Manteca, and that he would arrange for the two to meet and go over the place, to which the plaintiff consented. A few days later G. L. Potter called the plaintiff by telephone and stated that he had arranged for his brother to be in the bank on a certain day and for the plaintiff to come in also. At the appointed time G. L. Potter introduced the plaintiff and Kyle Potter. The latter two then proceeded in G. L. Potter's automobile to Kyle Potter's 42-acre farm, the same piece of property which was eventually exchanged for the plaintiff's city property, and looked it over. They also looked at another place. On the drive back to the city of Stockton they stopped at a nearby farm owned by a Mrs. Howe to inquire concerning her place. While the plaintiff waited in the automobile Kyle Potter talked to Mrs. Howe and reported back that the owner wanted $650 an acre for her property. When the question of price for the Potter place came up, Kyle Potter told the plaintiff that he would leave the price to his brother at the bank. A day or so later the plaintiff drove by the Kyle Potter place, but did not stop to look at it. Two or three days subsequently the plaintiff informed G. L. Potter that he was not interested in his brother's place. Thereupon G. L. Potter gave to the plaintiff a list of three or four places which the plaintiff visited by himself, but he was unable to testify that the bank had any connection with them. After a lapse of five or six weeks during which the subject of the Kyle Potter place was dropped, the plaintiff while at the bank incidentally informed G. L. Potter that he was about to close a deal for the exchange of his property for a 20-acre place on the French Camp road.

A day or two later the defendant Wilbur called upon the plaintiff at his residence. According to the plaintiff's testimony he had not met Wilbur before. Wilbur stated that he was in the bank, meaning the defendant Commercial & Savings Bank of Stockton, and that Ed Harris, who was the president of the bank, had sent him out. The plaintiff had known the defendant Ed Harris for some forty years. Wilbur stated to the plaintiff that he knew of conversations which the plaintiff had had about exchanging his place for some lands owned by the bank, that the bank was foreclosing on a 60-acre place near Lathrop belonging to a man named Duden which he thought could be handled in an exchange for his place. They drove to the place, which Wilbur said was worth $60,000 and could be had for $30,000, but the plaintiff objected that he did not have that amount of money and his place was not worth it. Thereupon Wilbur told the plaintiff that it did not make any difference that he did not have the money; that Ed Harris knew him and thought a lot of him, and that the plaintiff could have any piece of land the bank owned by asking for it; that Harris had stated that the bank would finance him for any piece of property he took over; and suggested that the plaintiff put in his city property at a price of $10,000; that Ed Harris would get behind him for any amount of money that was needed to fix up the place until it was resold; that he (Wilbur) was working for the bank and had been working for it for two years; and that, when the property was resold he would divide equally with the plaintiff his 50 per cent. share of the commission on the resale of which the bank retained the other 50 per cent. There was a $3,000 incumbrance on the plaintiff's place, and Wilbur pointed out that the value of the $7,000 equity would be received by the plaintiff on a resale of the Duden place. The plaintiff at that time "signed up to take the (Duden) place," but he never saw the contract again nor heard anything more concerning it.

The next day Wilbur showed to the plaintiff a 100-acre tract and thereafter six or seven other pieces of property represented by him to be owned by the bank, but each time they went to see one of these places the plaintiff testified that Wilbur drove the plaintiff past Kyle Potter's farm and extolled to him good qualities which he represented that it possessed. During this period, on several occasions when the plaintiff and Wilbur were in the bank together, Wilbur went into G. L. Potter's cage and came out with slips of paper on which the plaintiff had seen G. L. Potter write and then hand to Wilbur. Finally, while returning at one time from Manteca, Wilbur drove by the Potter place again, and this time he suggested to the plaintiff that they go in and look at it, to which the plaintiff rejoined that he had already seen it. Wilbur asked the plaintiff to look at it again, whereupon they drove into the place and looked it over. On the way back Wilbur told the plaintiff that the place was for exchange; that Kyle Potter owed the bank $16,000; that the bank was after G. L. Potter about it, and something had to be done immediately, and asked the plaintiff if he would consider an exchange on the same basis as the Duden place, and that he would get both places to fix up and resell; that the bank had 176 of these places coming in within a year, and that "th " wanted the plaintiff "to fix these places up"; that he would get 25 per cent. of the commission for his services; and that the bank would finance all the places for that purpose. The plaintiff testified that Wilbur's conduct satisfied him that he was working for the bank, and that he believed all of his statements. Wilbur thereupon proposed that the plaintiff exchange his residence property at the $10,000 figure subject to the $3,000 incumbrance, and take the Potter place, which was worth $22,000 at $20,000, and execute a deed of trust for $13,000, the difference being the value of the plaintiff's equity in his Stockton property, at the same time stating that it did not matter whether the Potter place was worth $20,000 or $40,000, or whether the plaintiff ever got a crop from it, since it would be resold within five months at the outside, when the plaintiff would have his $7,000 equity and 25 per cent. of the commission on the resale, and that the bank would lend him $3,000, when the papers were signed to fix up the place for resale.

During this period, which was early in December, Wilbur saw the plaintiff every day. One evening, several days after the first trip to the Potter place, the plaintiff and Wilbur called at the Kyle Potter farm and discussed the possibility of making the exchange. Kyle Potter at that time said he would do something about it in a day or two. Subsequently Kyle Potter called at the plaintiff's residence and both indicated that they were ready to close the deal on the terms proposed. G. L. Potter accompanied Kyle Potter to the plaintiff's residence, where Wilbur also was present, and inquired of plaintiff how he proposed to handle the deal and whether he was satisfied to have it go through on those terms. There is testimony that the plaintiff stated that a brother of his in the East would back him, and the plaintiff admitted that he wrote to his brother, who replied that he would be unable to advance any funds.

Instruments to effect the exchange and create the incumbrance on the Potter place by deed of trust from the plaintiff to Kyle Potter for $13,000 were executed on December 12, 1924. The plaintiff continued to reside on his place in Stockton until January 8, 1925, when he moved on the Potter farm. Subsequent to December 12, the plaintiff went to G. L. Potter's window at the bank and informed him that the deal had been made and that he had come to get the $3,000 to go ahead on the place, as Wilbur had told him. The plaintiff testified that G. L. Potter told him to "lay off the Wilbur stuff"; that he knew nothing about it and wanted nothing to do with it; that the plaintiff thereupon informed Potter that if he could not have the money he would have to call off the deal; and that Potter stated that he would have to get the money somewhere else, that the deal so far as they were concerned was closed, and that they would sue him to compel him to go through with it. Sometime later negotiations were completed whereby the plaintiff gave a crop mortgage and a lien on some stock to secure advances from the bank, aggregating $2,500.

There is further testimony that during the negotiations Kyle Potter represented to the plaintiff that the land was irrigable and that he had "irrigated it all over" himself, that the plaintiff had had some previous limited grain farming experience, but that he made no independent inquiries or investigation concerning the value of the Potter farm or its susceptibility to irrigation. The market value of the residence property of the plaintiff at that time is admitted by the defendants to be $8,500. The figures in evidence as to the market value of the Potter place in December, 1924, range from $10,000 to $18,000.

The plaintiff testified that he did not mention the subject of the conversations had between himself and Wilbur with respect to his prospective employment as an agent of the bank to fix up the bank's property for resale with the bank's financial backing, etc., to any of the other defendants, nor to any one else, and that that subject was not discussed in his presence by any one else, and that he did not make any inquiry of any one at any time before the deal was closed as to Wilbur's authority to make any promises on behalf of the bank, although there is testimony that the plaintiff knew several of the officers and directors of the bank and that he was not prevented from making inquiry.

Other facts are presented by the record, but they are not material to the present discussion. The plaintiff defaulted in the payment of the principal of the note secured by the $13,000 deed of trust, and the farm was purchased at the trustee's sale by Kyle Potter for that sum.

[1, 2] We have carefully considered the contention of the plaintiff that the evidence herein narrated supports the jury's verdict, based on a finding that the two Potters were guilty of conspiring in the fraudulent representations made to the plaintiff by the defendant Wilbur, and we are compelled to the conclusion that the contention is without merit. Without entering into any prolonged analysis of the chain of events disclosed by the record, it must be said that any attempt to discover therein any evidence which creates more than the merest suspicion of concerted action would be futile. The most that can be said is that the evidence sustains the inference that G. L. Potter was instrumental in bringing the plaintiff and Wilbur together as well as the plaintiff and Kyle Potter, but the inference that the Potters were parties to any such fraudulent representations testified to have been made by Wilbur is too remote even for conjecture. Even assuming without deciding that an inference of participation by either of the Potters in the fraudulent conduct of Wilbur could be drawn from the evidence, the inference of nonparticipation on their part is at least equally reasonable and equally susceptible. If either conclusion is equally reasonably inferable, "the one favoring fair dealing and the other favoring corrupt practice, it is the express duty of court or jury to draw the inference favorable to fair dealing." Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 799, 800, 158 P. 753, 756. Therefore any responsibility on the part of the Potters for Wilbur's representations must depend on the existence of the relation between them of principal and agent.

[3] It may be assumed that Wilbur was acting as the plaintiff's agent in the transaction. But the record again is devoid of any evidence that the relationship of principal and agent was created between the vendor, Potter, or G. L. Potter and the defendant Wilbur. No commission was paid by the Potters to Wilbur, although Wilbur received a $500 commission from the plaintiff. In fact, the record bears only the inference that Kyle Potter had constituted G. L. Potter as his agent, and the latter appeared to be acting for him throughout.

The foregoing conclusions render it unnecessary to determine whether the representations made by Wilbur constitute actionable deceit.

[4-6] It does become necessary to consider, however, whether the representations made by Kyle Potter that all of his land was easily irrigable because he had irrigated it all over himself may support the judgment as against him. The evidence is uncontradicted that but a small proportion of the land proved to be susceptible of irrigation. That such a material inducement to the contract, when, as here, it is stated as a representation of an existing fact within the knowledge of the declarer, and not merely as a matter of opinion, and which later proves to be false, becomes properly the basis of an action in damages or for rescission cannot be questioned. French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 586, 217 P. 515; Herdan v. Hanson, 182 Cal. 538, 546, 189 P. 440; Barron Estate Co. v. Woodruff Co., 163 Cal. 561, 573, 126 P. 351, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 125; Crandall v. Parks, 152 Cal. 772, 776, 93 P. 1018; Palladine v. Imperial Valley F. L. Ass'n, 65 Cal. App. 727, 737, 225 P. 291; Edge v. Bryan, 47 Cal. App. 312, 315, 190 P. 476. And this is so even though the vendee has seen the property; and the vendee is not required to make independent investigation. French v. Freeman, supra; Teague v. Hall, 171 Cal. 668, 154 P. 851; Palladine v. Imperial Valley F. L. Ass'n, supra.

[7] The appellants contend that nevertheless the plaintiff did not rely on the representations as to irrigability made by Kyle Potter, but relied solely upon the representations made by the defendant Wilbur. But we are unable to perceive any merit in the contention. On the contrary, it may be said that the irrigability of the land would be considered by the vendee as one of the main and controlling elements, even under the fanciful scheme which the plaintiff testified was proposed by Wilbur, as the value of the land on resale would depend largely on its susceptibility to irrigation. The question then as to what reliance was placed by the plaintiff upon Kyle Potter's representations was one for the jury to determine.

Minor points raised by the appeal are without merit or have become unnecessary to consider in view of the foregoing discussion.

The judgment as to the appellant F. K. Potter is affirmed, and as to the appellant G. L. Potter it is reversed.

TAYLOR et al. v. BUNNELL.

Sac. 4362.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 25, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 26, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⚿1214.

In action to establish constructive trust, decision of appellate court holding admission of certain evidence prejudicial error held not determination of facts upon conflicting evidence precluding trial court from exercising on retrial judicial discretion on evidence properly admissible.

> It could not be assumed that District Court of Appeal deemed it within its proper province to weigh evidence which was substantial on each side and sharply conflicting. Facts in opinion were quite generally discussed, obviously as background for determining that errors of law complained of and found to exist were prejudicial.

2. Appeal and error ⚿1195(3).

Appellate court's holding evidence was sufficient to show certain facts as plaintiff contended was not holding evidence was insufficient to support findings actually made for defendant, as regards law of case.

> While court stated that evidence was sufficient to show defendant was owner of only life estate in land, such statement was made merely as bearing on question whether errors in admission of evidence were prejudicial to plaintiff, and was not intended to be taken as holding that evidence was insufficient to support findings court below actually made in favor of defendant.

3. Appeal and error ⚿1195(1).

Doctrine of law of case will not be extended beyond exigencies demanding application.

4. Appeal and error ⚿1195(3).

It could not be assumed that appellate court undertook to decide fact questions within exclusive province of trial court.

5. Appeal and error ⚿1011(1).

Determination of facts requiring weighing of conflicting evidence is within exclusive province of trial court subject to power granted to reviewing courts pursuant to Constitution (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a; Const. art. 6, § 4¾, adopted in 1926).

6. Appeal and error ⚿1216.

Erroneous conception of trial court of appellate court's decision as deciding conflicting fact questions required reversal.

Trial court, by misconstruing effect of decision of District Court of Appeal, deprived itself of power and duty to weigh evidence, and hence judgment required reversal.

7. Appeal and error ⚿1195(3).

Discussion on former appeal, assuming as fact disputed parol promise to hold land in trust, held obiter and not binding as law of case.

8. Trusts ⚿107.

In action to establish constructive trust, burden remained on plaintiff, after showing confidential relationship, to prove deed, while conveying fee on face, constituted grantee constructive trustee as to remainder.

9. Trusts ⚿44(3).

To prove trust by parol under absolute conveyance, evidence must be clear and convincing.

10. Appeal and error ⚿1012(1).

Whether parol evidence to prove trust under conveyance absolute on face is of required degree is for trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Alma Taylor and husband against Edwin Bunnell. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

George R. Freeman, of Willows, Stephen W. Downey, of Sacramento, and Robert L. McWilliams, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Casper A. Ornbaun, of San Francisco, and R. M. Rankin, of Willows, for respondents.

SHENK, J.

This is the second appeal in this case, the first having been decided by the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District. Taylor v. Bunnell, 77 Cal. App. 535, 247 P. 240. The facts recited in the opinion on that appeal, supplemented by what is stated herein, are sufficient for the purposes of this appeal.

The action was brought to establish a constructive trust in certain real property deeded to the defendant, Dr. Edwin Bunnell, by his wife, Margaret A. Bunnell, a short time before her death, and which was her separate property. The trust was sought to be established in favor of the plaintiff, Alma Taylor, who is one of several nieces of the decedent. The plaintiffs alleged that the deed to the defendant was delivered by the decedent upon the parol promise of the defendant made at the time to the grantor that he would convey the property to the plaintiff effective upon his death; that the transaction created, not an estate in fee simple in the grantee which the deed purported to convey, but a life estate in the grantee and a remainder in fee to the plaintiff; that the defendant was therefore a constructive trustee of the interest conveyed to him for said purposes, and that shortly after the death of the grantor the defendant repudiated and denied the existence of the alleged trust.

On the first trial of the action the court found in favor of the defendant. On the appeal from the judgment the District Court of Appeal held that the trial court had erred in admitting in evidence certain statements and declarations of the decedent made subsequent to the time of the delivery of the deed to the defendant. The holding was based on the ground that, having parted with her entire interest in the property, the declarations referred to by the District Court of Appeal were not admissible under any exceptions to the rule forbidding the admission in evidence of hearsay declarations. The District Court of Appeal in its opinion expressly referred to and included within its determination all such declarations whether favorable to the plaintiff or to the defendant. That court concluded that the admission of declarations favorable to the defendant was prejudicial to the plaintiff on the record presented and reversed the judgment.

⚿For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

On the second trial the parties stipulated that the record of the testimony taken at the former trial might be offered and received in evidence subject to such objections, withdrawals and motions to strike as the parties might desire to make, each party to have the right to supplement the record by additional testimony. The record now before us is substantially the same as that presented to the trial court on the former trial, with the exception of the matters found by the District Court of Appeal to have been objectionable, which were excluded. On this record the trial court made findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of the plaintiff and rendered the judgment from which the present appeal is taken. In so acting the court proceeded on the assumption that the judgment of the District Court of Appeal so established the law of the case as to leave the trial court no alternative but to find in favor of the plaintiff and order judgment accordingly. This fact is not and cannot be disputed in view of the record before us. Whether this assumption was erroneous is the crux of this appeal. It is necessary therefore now to determine whether the judgment of the District Court of Appeal established the law of the case not only as to the points of law therein determined, but also as to the facts. On the retrial of the action all parties proceeded on the theory that the law of the case controlled the question of the inadmissibility of the evidence which the reviewing court found to be objectionable and to have been admitted to the prejudice of the appellant.

[1-5] It is the position of the plaintiff that the judgment on the former appeal applied also to the facts. The defendant contends that no such interpretation should be placed on the decision of the District Court of Appeal and that the trial court should have considered itself free to exercise a judicial discretion on the evidence properly admissible.

We think the position of the defendant is well taken. When the transcript of the testimony taken on the former trial, and which is now before us on this appeal, is properly considered, it cannot be assumed that the District Court of Appeal deemed it within its proper province to weigh the evidence, which was substantial on each side and was sharply conflicting. It may be assumed that it would support findings and judgment either way. This must have been readily apparent to the District Court of Appeal, and the fact that that court did not hold the evidence insufficient to support the findings in favor of the defendant is significant. The fact that the court held the evidence "sufficient to show that the defendant is the owner of only a life estate in the land" is not a holding that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings actually made in favor of the defendant. The facts are quite generally discussed in that opinion, obviously as a background for determining that the errors of law complained of and found to exist were prejudicial. As we read the opinion, that court did not decide, as obviously it could not, that the facts were so far undisputed as to constitute the findings unsupported as a matter of law. It did decide, in response to the argument of the defendant, that the errors of law complained of were of material consequence, that such errors were substantial and resulted in prejudice to the plaintiff. Such was the construction of the opinion entertained by this court when the petition for hearing was denied. While the doctrine of the law of the case is a salutary rule of law, its application will not be extended beyond the exigencies which demand its application. Klauber v. San Diego St. Car Co., 98 Cal. 105, 32 P. 876; 5 Cal. Jur. 555. It may be conceded that the decision of the District Court of Appeal is subject to the construction placed upon it by the plaintiff. But it must likewise be conceded, and we think with better reason, that it is subject to the construction placed upon it by the defendant. This is especially true because of the fact that the evidence, apart from that erroneously admitted on behalf of the defendant, was admittedly conflicting and because thereof, and of its substantial character, no question of law was presented thereon for the consideration of the District Court of Appeal, except the question of the prejudicial character of the errors in the light of the whole evidence in the case. It cannot be assumed that the court on the former appeal under these circumstances undertook to decide questions of fact which at that time were within the exclusive province of the trial court to decide. Such is now the law except for the limited extension of power granted to reviewing courts by section 4¾ of article 6 of the Constitution added in November, 1926, and section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure adopted in 1927 (see Tupman v. Haberkern, 208 Cal. 256, 280 P. 970), and which is not applicable herein.

[6] In view of the misconception of the trial court as to the effect of the decision of the District Court of Appeal, thereby depriving itself of its power and duty to weigh the evidence and pass upon the same on the merits, the judgment must be reversed.

[7-10] One other point requires discussion as a guide to the trial court on the retrial. It must not be assumed that on the former appeal it was decided that, upon the mere showing of a confidential relationship between the grantor and grantee, a prima facie constructive trust was created and imposed on the grantee. The discussion on that point assumed the existence of the parol promise to hold the land in trust. It thus assumed the fact in issue in this case. It is therefore obiter and is not binding as the law of the case. After the showing of the confidential relationship the burden was still upon the plaintiff to prove that the deed was not what it purported on its face to be; in other words, to prove that the transaction did not create a fee-simple interest in the defendant, but that the execution and delivery of the deed to him under all the facts and circumstances surrounding or pertinent to the transaction constituted the defendant a constructive trustee entitled to a life estate with the remainder in fee held for the benefit of the plaintiff. O'Brien v. O'Brien, 21 Cal. App. 620, 623, 624, 132 P. 612. The rule is also well established that to prove a trust by parol under a conveyance absolute in its terms the evidence must be clear, satisfactory, and convincing. Bollinger v. Bollinger, 154 Cal. 695, 703, 99 P. 196; Harris v. Harris, 136 Cal. 379, 69 P. 23. And whether the evidence in any case is of this character must be determined by the trial court. Sherman v. Sandell, 106 Cal. 373, 39 P. 797. No other points require discussion.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; CURTIS, J.; RICHARDS, J.; LANGDON, J.; SEAWELL, J.

PRESTON, J., does not participate in the foregoing decision.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. D. McConnell, Judge.

Action by Fred E. Peterson and others, trustees by assignment for benefit of creditors of the Bartlett Music Company, against W. F. Ball and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

Hugh M. Foster, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, Winfield Dorn, and Arthur L. Shannon, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb and Irving H. Prince, all of Los Angeles, for respondent E. J. Salyer.

Anderson & Anderson & Sheahan and Call & Murphey, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ for respondents.

George W. Fenimore, Chandler, Wright & Ward, and Chandler P. Ward, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ in support of motion to dismiss.

PER CURIAM.

Both appellants and respondents being desirous that a rehearing be granted in this case, appellants questioning the correctness of the decision in holding that the cause of action was brought to recover a penalty, and hence was not assignable, and respondents questioning the correctness of the conclusion that the action was saved from abatement by the general provision of section 404 of the Civil Code, and amici curiæ joining with respondents in a petition to grant a rehearing, a rehearing was granted in order that further consideration might be given to the respective contentions of the parties. After a thorough re-examination of the questions presented, assisted by the additional authorities supplied by both appellants, respondents, and amici curiæ, we are convinced that the conclusions reached in our former opinion are correct, and therefore adopt it as the opinion in this case.

This action was brought by plaintiffs as trustees by assignment for the benefit of creditors of the Bartlett Music Company, against the defendants as directors of said company, based upon the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code making directors jointly and severally liable for the full amount of debts created in excess of the subscribed capital stock of the corporation during their administration. The complaint consisted of ten counts, each count of which alleged that the defendants were directors of the Bartlett Music Company, a corporation, and as such directors created an indebtedness in a certain amount which was in excess of the subscribed capital stock. At the trial the defendants moved for judgment on the pleadings, which motion was granted by the court, and judgment was entered for the defendants. From this judgment plaintiffs have appealed.

[1] After the rendition of judgment and the filing of notice of appeal by plaintiffs, section 309 of the Civil Code was amended (Stats. 1929, p. 1266). By said amendment the liability on the part of the directors of a corporation for the creation of debts in excess of subscribed capital stock was completely eliminated therefrom. Defendants, thereupon, filed their motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that as the liability of directors under this section was penal and statutory in character, the amendment operated to abate all proceedings pending thereunder. This motion was argued and submitted with the understanding that it would be considered and passed upon at the time of the determination of the case upon its merits. We will first direct our attention to the motion to dismiss.

The case of Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 155 P. 90, involves a very similar question. In that case the court held, Justice Henshaw writing the opinion, that the Public Utilities Act (Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 18) repealed section 309 of the Civil Code in so far as it had application to directors of public utility corporations, and that as the Public Utilities Act contained no clause saving pending litigation or imperfect or inchoate rights the effect of the repeal was to destroy the right of a creditor to further prosecute a pending action to enforce the liability of the directors under section 309 of the Civil Code for such excess indebtedness. This case is quoted with approval in Freeman v. Glenn County Telephone Co., 184 Cal. 508, 194 P. 705, which involved the question of whether or not the amendment of 1917 to section 309 of the Civil Code operated to cut off the right to enforce the liability of directors under that section for the distribution of the capital stock of the corporation in contravention of the provisions of section 309 prior to 1917. The court in that case, relying upon the authority of Moss v. Smith, supra, held that the amendment operated as a repeal of the statutory liability formerly existing with the result that the repeal operated to destroy the right of action if it occurred at any time prior to final judgment.

An order dismissing the appeal based upon the authority of these two cases, therefore, might well be made, were it not for the fact that there appears to be a general saving clause of actions involving corporations incorporated in the part of the Civil Code dealing with corporations. This is section 404 of the Civil Code, which provides that, "The legislature may at any time amend or repeal this part, or any title, chapter, article, or section thereof, and dissolve all corporations created thereunder; but such amendment or repeal does not, nor does the dissolution of any such corporation, take away or impair any remedy given against any such corporation, its stockholders or officers, for any liability which has been previously incurred."

This section has been in the Code since 1905 and was, therefore, in the Code at the time of the decision of Moss v. Smith, in 1916, and Freeman v. Glenn County Telephone Co., in 1920. Respondents argue that inasmuch as that section did not control in those two cases, it should not control here. The records show, however, that this section was not drawn to the attention of the court in either of these actions. However, had the section been drawn to the attention of the court, it is quite probable that the same result would have been reached in the two cases for the reason that in each case there were present other and controlling factors not present in the instant case. For instance, in Moss v. Smith, it was held by the court that the Public Utilities Act absolutely governed and controlled, as the corporation therein involved was a public utility corporation. Inasmuch as the Public Utilities Act, which, as the court held, contained no clause saving pending litigation, was the sole controlling statute, it follows that section 404 would have no application. In the case of Freeman v. Glenn County Telephone Co., the peculiar phrasing of the saving clause of section 309, as amended in 1917, which expressly excluded from the effects of the saving clause the particular liability of directors upon which that action was based, excluded section 404 from application to that action. Subdivision 2 of section 309, as amended in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 657), reads as follows: "No right, cause of action, or liability now existing or any action or proceeding now pending, shall be affected by this act and such right, cause of action or liability may be enforced and such action or proceeding may be prosecuted in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed; excepting only the liability of a director of a corporation heretofore incurred shall not exist in any case where, all of the debts and liabilities of the corporation to creditors having been paid, the capital stock divided, withdrawn, or paid out constituted all of the capital stock of the corporation and the same was paid out, withdrawn, or divided with the consent of all of the stockholders to or among themselves." It is obvious that this is a special provision governing "liabilities heretofore incurred" under special conditions such as existed in that case, and that therefore the general provisions of section 404 were not applicable.

We find no merit in defendants' contention that section 404 is a general provision and that inasmuch as the 1929 Legislature expressly deleted from section 309, as it existed in 1917, the clause saving pending litigation, it affirmatively expressed its intention that pending litigation should be abated. The Legislature in 1929 made drastic and far-reaching changes in title 1 of part 4 of division 1 of the Civil Code, which deals with corporations in general. Some thirty-six sections were amended, twenty-one sections repealed, and five new sections added to this particular division of the Code. In our opinion, it appears reasonable that in the reframing of the Code applicable to corporations, the superfluity of the saving clause in section 309 was noted and the Legislature deeming it no longer necessary, entirely eliminated it. No other explanation appears to us plausible in view of the provisions of section 283 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 1261), which provides that, "The provisions of this title are applicable to every private corporation, unless there be a special provision in relation thereto inconsistent with some provisions of this title, in which case the special provision prevails."

The motion for a dismissal is therefore denied.

The trial court based its order granting judgment on the pleadings in favor of the defendants upon two propositions of law: First, the liability of directors created by section 309 of the Civil Code for creating debts beyond the subscribed capital stock of the corporation is penal in character, and, second, a right of action to enforce this liability is not assignable. If these two propositions are well founded in law, then plaintiffs' complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendants, and the motion for judgment on the pleadings in favor of the defendants was properly granted.

[2] Section 309 of the Civi Code was before this court in the case of Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 155 P. 90. In that case, after an exhaustive review of the authorities not only in this state but in other jurisdictions, this court concludes (page 786 of 171 Cal., 155 P. 90, 94): "In all of these jurisdictions it is held that a creditors' bill is the proper method to establish rights under like statutes, and in all of them the statutes themselves are declared to be penal in their nature. Indeed, the whole matter may be summed up in the statement that, even if section 309 be remedial so far as the creditor is concerned, it is highly punitive so far as the directors are concerned." The case of Moss v. Smith followed Irvine v. McKeon, 23 Cal. 472, and Moore v. Lent, 81 Cal. 502, 22 P. 875, and in turn has been followed by this court in Talcott Land Co. v. Hershiser, 184 Cal. 748, 761, 195 P. 653. In the state of Montana, where section 309 of the Civil Code of this state has been adopted without change by the Legislature as section 3837 of the Revised Codes of 1907, it was held in the case of Continental Oil Co. v. Montana Concrete Co., 63 Mont. 223, 207 P. 116, 118, "that the liability imposed by section 3837 is purely statutory and is in the nature of a penalty for failure to obey the mandate of the law, and this is in harmony with the decided weight of authority," citing Moss v. Smith, supra, and many other authorities. While the case from the Supreme Court of Montana states that the above rule is in harmony with the weight of authority, we have not been cited to a single authority supporting a contrary rule. We conclude, therefore, that the liability imposed by section 309 against directors who have suffered debts to be created in excess of the subscribed capital stock of the corporation, and which is the basis of the cause of action set out in plaintiffs' complaint, is "highly punitive so far as the directors are concerned."

[3] The next question with which we are concerned is whether a claim, or cause of action arising out of said section 309 in favor of the corporation or in favor of the creditors against the directors, is assignable. The only authority under which the plaintiffs claim the right to institute this action against the defendants is under the assignment made to them by the corporation, the Bartlett Music Company. This assignment is not a statutory assignment for the benefit of creditors for which the Civil Code provides (section 3449), but is one which was executed by the Bartlett Music Company, as party of the first part, to five persons designated as trustees and as parties of the second part, and a number of the creditors of said corporation referred to therein as parties of the third part, and who assented in writing to said assignment. By this assignment, the corporation assigned to said trustees, "All of its property of every kind and nature, wherever situated, both real and personal, including all that stock of merchandise, store furniture and fixtures, book accounts, books, bills receivable, cash in hand, choses in action, insurance policies, and all other personal property of every kind and nature situated in or pertaining to, the stores now owned and conducted by said party of the first part in the City of Los Angeles, California, including any leases and leasehold interest."

The trustees named in said assignment are the plaintiffs herein with the exception of C. W. Jacks and W. C. Lannin, who were selected to take the places of C. H. Mayer and W. H. Munson, named in said assignment as two of said trustees, but who subsequently and before the commencement of this action resigned. It will thus be seen that the plaintiffs take whatever rights they have in the property of the Bartlett Music Company by a voluntary assignment executed in their favor by the corporation and assented to by certain of the creditors. That such an assignment is binding upon the corporation and the creditors assenting thereto is not questioned. Jarvis v. Webber, 196 Cal. 86, 236 P. 138. By this assignment, and as to the corporation and the creditors whose consent was given thereto, the plaintiffs took and thereafter held under the terms of said written assignment, all property of the corporation, which the latter could transfer or assign. We cannot agree with the contention of the defendants that the assignment is not broad enough to cover causes of action. By reference to the language of the assignment, it will be noted that it purports to assign "all property of every kind and nature" belonging to the corporation, including "choses in action." This latter term is sufficiently comprehensive to cover causes of action.

[4] This brings us to the question as to whether the right of action against the directors for creating debts in excess of the subscribed capital stock of the corporation is assignable. If it is, then the plaintiffs acquired such right and may maintain this action for the purpose of enforcing it against the directors. If it is not assignable, then as already indicated this action must fail.

In a recent case before this court we held that the right given by the Usury Act to recover treble interest paid on a usurious note or obligation was not assignable. Primo Degli Esposti v. Rivers Bros. Inc., et al. (Cal. Sup.) 279 P. 423, 424. In that case we said: "The second answer is that the right which the original maker of a usurious note and mortgage is given under section 3 of the Usury Act to recover such interest and to treble the same is in the nature of a statutory penalty, and, under the authorities from other jurisdictions, which we hereby approve, is not assignable. In the case of Pardoe v. Iowa State Bank, 106 Iowa, 345, 76 N. W. 800, a statute containing the same language as that of the usury law of this state was so construed with a quite abundant reference to authorities. A similar ruling was made by the Supreme Court of Kansas upon the terms of a similar statute in the case of Lloyd v. First Nat. Bank, 5 Kan. App. 512, 47 P. 575. See, also, Robinson v. St. Marie's Lumber Co., 34 Idaho, 707, 204 P. 671, 21 R. C. L., p. 2117, § 6; Wilson v. Shrader, 73 W. Va. 105, 79 S. E. 1083, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 886, 893 and notes; Allen v. Petty, 58 S. C. 240, 36 S. E. 586; First State Bank, etc., v. Bank of Jefferson, 112 Okl. 177, 240 P. 311."

In Wilson v. Shrader, 73 W. Va. 105, 79 S. E. 1083, 1084, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 886, the court phrased the question presented on appeal as follows: "If the rights of action for the penalty are not assignable, the declarations are wholly and essentially bad. They set forth no causes of action, the benefit of which the assignee can take. A vital inquiry therefore, is whether penalties under the statute here involved are assignable." The action of Wilson v. Shrader, supra, was instituted for the recovery of a penalty given by section 7 of chapter 79 of the Code of West Virginia against a coterminous landowner for mining coal within five feet of the land of the adjacent owner without his consent in writing. The statute provided for a forfeiture or penalty of $500 in favor of the adjacent owner for each violation of said statute. The declarations set forth three separate and distinct violations of the statute and judgment was asked for $1,500 based upon the facts so alleged. At the time of the alleged violations, one Samuel V. Woods was the owner of the adjacent estate. Before the commencement of the action, he sold the same to the plaintiff, and in his deed to the plaintiff he endeavored to assign his right to recover the amount of the three penalties given under said statute. The opinion of the Supreme Court of West Virginia contains a most thorough citation of authorities upon the question of the assignability of rights of action based upon statutory penalties, and concludes that rights so given by statutes cannot be assigned. The court in that case points out (73 W. Va. 105, 79 S. E. 1086) that: "The reasons that preclude the assignability of mere personal rights, such as actions for slander, assault, and battery, and other pure torts, obviously apply here. Assignability of such claims encourages litigation and strife. The same principle of public policy forbids the conversion of penalties into commodities or assets."

[5] The only answer the plaintiffs make to the contention of the defendants, which appears to be well supported by the authorities just cited, is that the assignment made to them by the corporation and assented to by certain of the creditors, is as valid and binding as if made in compliance with the provisions of sections 3449 to 3473 of the Civil Code, and that such an assignment is valid against the assignor and all creditors assenting to it and serves to vest the assignor's title to all the property absolutely in the assignee, which title can be voided only by a creditor not having assented to the assignment or by a purchaser or encumbrancer in good faith and for value. We may concede that the assignment made by the Bartlett Music Company to the five persons therein named as trustees is as valid and has the same legal effect as an assignment for the benefit of creditors made under the provisions of sections 3449 to 3473 of the Civil Code. In either case, the assignee takes only such property of the assignor as the latter may legally convey or assign. We have pointed out that the right of the corporation to sue the directors for creating debts in excess of the subscribed capital stock is not assignable. Therefore, under the assignment the plaintiffs have no standing in the action.

[6] Appellants make the further contention, however, that the appellants as trustees under such assignment for the benefit of creditors occupy a dual position. They not only succeed to all of the property of the corporation by virtue of the assignment, but they represent and stand in the shoes of the creditors as well, and in this latter capacity they are authorized to maintain this action on behalf of the creditors to recover from the directors upon their liability under section 309 of the Civil Code. It will be noted under the provisions of this Code section as they were previous to the amendment of said section in 1929, that the directors assenting to an excessive indebtedness are made "jointly and severally liable to the corporation, and to the creditors thereof," etc. There is undoubtedly a dual liability created by this section of the Code against the directors, one in behalf of the corporation, and the other in behalf of the creditors. If we understand appellants' position, it is that if they are not able to maintain this action to recover on behalf of the corporation by virtue of said assignment, they are, at least, entitled to institute and prosecute the same to judgment as representatives of the creditors under the terms of said section of the Code making the directors liable to the creditors as well as to the corporation. Unfortunately for the appellants, this court has on two occasions held that the assignee even under a statutory assignment for the benefit of creditors "is merely the representative of his assignor, and does not represent the creditors." Francisco v. Aguirre, 94 Cal. 180, 182, 29 P. 495, 496, First National Bank v. Menke, 128 Cal. 103, 106, 60 P. 675. These cases further hold that an assignee for the benefit of creditors under a statutory assignment from his assignor is not a person upon whom the estate of the assignor devolves by operation of law, but that he takes title to whatever estate he possesses by the voluntary act of the previous owner. In other words, the assignee holds solely under the assignment made by the assignor for the benefit of his creditors. We do not think it can be successfully contended that the appellants, who are made trustees under a nonstatutory assignment, are possessed of any greater powers, or stand in any more favorable position regarding the property of the assignor, than an assignee under a statutory assignment. The latter has some semblance of reason for contending that he holds his position and exercises the powers of his office under a procedure provided by law, while the former has not. His rights depend entirely upon the voluntary acts of the persons who are parties to the assignment.

The appellants appear to lay great stress upon the case of Hornor v. Henning, 93 U. S. 228, 23 L. Ed. 879. In this case the court had under consideration the Act of Congress of May 5, 1870 (16 Stats. at L. 98), one of the provisions of which made the trustees or directors of any corporation organized under the act liable to the creditors for corporate debts created in excess of the capital stock. The court in that case held that an action at law by an individual creditor to recover the amount due him would not lie against the directors, but that the liability of the directors represented a trust fund for the benefit of all the creditors of the corporation so far as it might be necessary to pay their debts. It is pointed out in that case that while the action as brought could not be maintained, the proper proceeding would be one brought in equity by all of the creditors, or by one or more in behalf of all, for the purpose of subjecting this trust fund to the payment of all of the creditors in proportion to the amount of their debts. The same ruling was made in Moss v. Smith, supra. We confess we are unable to discern how this ruling in any way helps the case of appellants. It may, however, indicate a procedure under which the creditors of a corporation may avail themselves in establishing their rights under the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code prior to its amendment in 1929. But it cannot have any determining effect upon the action now before us.

Our conclusion in this matter is that the plaintiffs have no right to maintain this action and that the trial court acted properly and legally in granting the motion of defendants for judgment on the pleadings.

In the original briefs filed in support of their motion to dismiss the appeal, it was apparently conceded by respondents that section 404, Civil Code, was a general saving clause, the respondents relying upon the argument that the Legislature in the 1929 amendment, by deleting the specific saving clause from section 309, Civil Code, had by affirmative action shown that it did not intend for the general saving clause of section 404, Civil Code, to apply to an action brought to enforce the liability of directors for the debts of the corporation created in excess of its subscribed capital stock theretofore imposed by section 309 of the Civil Code, but eliminated by the 1929 amendment. The court did not agree with this contention, being of the opinion that the clause saving pending causes of action was deleted from section 309, Civil Code, not for the purpose of retroactively cutting off pre-existing rights, but because, in view of the presence of section 404 in the Code, its superfluity was recognized.

After the filing of our former opinion, amici curiæ joined with respondents in petitioning the court for a rehearing upon this phase of the case urging for the first time that section 404, Civil Code, was not a general saving clause. It is argued, in this behalf, that the latter clause of section 404 is governed and controlled by the first clause which must be read in the conjunctive that "the legislature may at any time amend or repeal this part, or any title, chapter, article, or section thereof, and dissolve all corporations created thereunder" and that therefore only in the event of the dissolution of a corporation by legislative act does the latter provision of section 404, Civil Code, operate to preserve existing rights and liabilities. As amici curiæ read and understand section 404, Civil Code, its sole purpose and intent is to authorize the Legislature to dissolve any California corporation by repealing or amending any part of the law relative to corporations and incidental to such dissolution to provide that an amendment or repeal which operates to dissolve a corporation will not operate to impair any remedy against the corporation or its officers for liabilities theretofore existing. In an attempt to prove that this is the correct interpretation, amici curiæ have traced the legislative history of the enactment of section 404, Civil Code. It appears that section 404, Civil Code, is identical in language with section 384, Civil Code, which latter section was repealed in 1907 (St. 1907, p. 578) for the reason that section 384, Civil Code, was not in the proper place in the Code and section 404 was. The repealing act contained a proviso that the rights acquired under section 384 should not be lost but continue in force under the provisions of section 404. It also appears that section 384, Civil Code, is based upon section 31, article 4 of the California State Constitution of 1849 (which section is preserved in somewhat different language in section 1 of article 12 of the California Constitution of 1879), which reads as follows: "Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act except for municipal purposes. All general laws and special acts passed pursuant to this section may be altered from time to time, or repealed." The code commissioners in a note to section 384, Civil Code, after quoting that provision of the Constitution, say: "Under that provision of the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits a state from enacting any law 'impairing the obligation of contracts' it has been settled that the charter of a private corporation is an executed contract between the government and the corporators, and that the legislature cannot repeal, impair, or alter it against the consent or without the default of the corporation judicially ascertained and determined. (* * * Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518 [4 L. Ed. 629]. * * *) In consequence of this construction, it has become usual for legislatures in acts of incorporation, either to make the duration of the charter conditional, or to reserve the power to alter, modify, or repeal the charter at pleasure; 'and as the power of modification and repeal is thus made a qualifying part of the grant of franchises, the exercise of that power cannot of course impair the obligation of the grant.' * * * Section 384 was inserted in this code out of an abundance of caution, and not because it was deemed necessary, for there can be but little doubt that the constitutional provision quoted at the head of this note enters into and becomes a part of the contract, thereby reserving to the legislature the right to repeal, impair, or alter any law relative to the formation of corporations, even though the result reached would be the dissolution of every corporation organized within the state." Civ. Code of Calif., Ann. (1st Ed.) vol. 1, p. 121. It is apparent from the foregoing discussion that the original purpose of section 384, Civil Code, and hence of section 404, Civil Code, which is identical in language, was to neutralize the effect of the Dartmouth College doctrine and to preserve in the Legislature of the state the power to control all corporations by reserving to the Legislature the power to alter, amend, or repeal any law relative to corporations, "even though the result reached would be the dissolution of every corporation organized within the state."

[7, 8] Conceding this to be the purpose of the enactment of section 404, Civil Code, nevertheless we do not believe that section 404 is susceptible of the construction claimed for it by amici curiæ. Amici curiæ claim that rights and liabilities are preserved by the latter clause of section 404 only in the event of the dissolution of a corporation. If the first clause of section 404 is read in the conjunctive, it would follow that the power reserved to the Legislature was to dissolve all corporations by amending or repealing any section of the Code relative to corporations. It is obvious, we think, that the power reserved to the Legislature need not go to the extent of dissolving a corporation, but that any exercise of its power which falls short of that result is equally permissible. The power only to dissolve a corporation without the power to alter or modify its rights or liabilities, or to change the rules and regulations applicable thereto, would be a meager power, and fall far short of the complete control over corporations which concededly section 404, Civil Code, was enacted to preserve to the state Legislature.

If the first clause of section 404, Civil Code, be read, as we think it must, to reserve to the Legislature, not only the power to dissolve any and all corporations in the state but to amend any part, title, chapter, article, or section of the Code relative to corporations regardless of whether such action does or does not result in dissolution, it follows logically that the latter part of section 404 is a general saving clause providing for the preservation of any remedy given against any corporation, its stockholders, or officers, for any liability which had been previously incurred, and which, in the absence of such provision, would be taken away or impaired by such amendment or repeal. In short, the latter clause of section 404, Civil Code, is as broad in its scope as the first clause of section 404, and, inasmuch as the first clause reserves plenary power to the Legislature to amend or repeal any laws relative to corporations, the latter clause preserves all rights and liabilities affected by such amendment or repeal.

[9] Under the decision of People v. McNulty, 93 Cal. 427, 26 P. 597, 29 P. 61, it was held that a general saving clause in the general body of the law is as effective as a special saving clause in the particular section. It is plain from the language of section 404, Civil Code, that it is intended to apply to the amendment or repeal of any part of the Civil Code relative to corporations, and hence to the rights and liabilities arising under section 309 of the Civil Code.

The argument is reiterated upon rehearing that in the 1929 amendment the saving clause of section 309 was expressly omitted with the legislative intent of terminating all rights previously acquired but not carried to final judgment. As before noted, this court was of the opinion that the saving clause of section 309 was omitted because its superfluity was apparent. Confirmation of our opinion is to be found in the comment of Henry Winthrop Ballantine in his book entitled, "California Corporation Amendments (1929)" upon section 309 of the Civil Code. Mr. Ballantine who served in the capacity of draftsman of the committee of the state bar of California on revision of the corporation law, and who was instrumental in preparing the drafts of the amendments enacted by the Legislature in 1929, commenting upon the 1929 amendment to section 309, says:

> "The saving clause as to causes of action or liability now existing or actions now pending against directors was omitted. Under the decision of Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777 [155 P. 90], and Freeman v. Glenn County Telephone Co., 184 Cal. 508 [194 P. 705], it might seem that the amendment would operate to terminate the liability of directors for unlawful dividends even though they were declared and paid long prior to the amendment as well as liability for other violations of section 309, except in the cases covered by the amendment.
> "The cases just cited, however, seem erroneous in that they overlook the general saving clause contained in section 404 which provides that an amendment or repeal of any section of the code does not take away or impair any remedy given against any corporation, its stockholders or officers for any liability which has been previously incurred. Under the decision of People v. McNulty, 93 Cal. 427 [26 P. 597, 29 P. 61], it is held that a general saving clause like section 329 of the Political Code, in the general body of the law, is as effective as a special saving clause in the particular section. It would seem accordingly that the Supreme Court in the future, if its attention be called to this section, would follow the code rather than the prior decisions which overlooked the code section."

As pointed out in our former opinion, special circumstances were present in both the case of Moss v. Smith, supra, and Freeman v. Glenn County Telephone Co., supra, which rendered section 404, Civil Code, inapplicable to these actions. No such factors are present in the instant case.

We are, therefore of the opinion that the motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the amendment of 1929, which eliminated the liability on the part of directors for the creation of debts in excess of subscribed capital stock, operated to abate all proceedings thereunder, was in the first instance properly denied.

The additional authorities furnished us by appellants, questioning the correctness of the conclusion that section 309 imposes a liability penal in its nature and hence unassignable, are of little value. The case of Illinois State Bank v. Queen City Quarry Co., 203 Ill. App. 176, which is merely an abstract of a decision, and which holds that the liability of directors under an Illinois law similar to section 309 is that of a surety, and the case of Swan v. Burnham, 70 N. H. 580, 49 A. 93, which holds that "the effect of these enactments is to impose the liability of sureties for the corporation upon the directors, to the amount of such excess, as a penalty for a violation of these provisions," (italics ours) are cited as proof that the liability imposed by section 309 is a contractual liability. These cases are from other jurisdictions and are not controlling, particularly in view of the fact that it is now settled beyond controversy by the case of Moss v. Smith, supra, and the later case of Talcott Land Co. v. Hershiser, 184 Cal. 748, 761, 763, 195 P. 653, that in California the liability imposed by section 309, Civil Code, is penal in its nature. Moreover, it is to be noted that the case of Swan v. Burnham, supra, expressly states that the liability of a surety is imposed as a penalty. Thompson on Corporations, vol. 2 (3d Ed.) § 1439, page 994, is also cited. An examination of this section and the preceding ones discloses the fact that the section quoted by appellants has reference to the minority view. The introduction to the section that "some courts have held and some able law writers have insisted * * *" clearly indicates this.

Appellants cite no cases in this jurisdiction directly holding said liability to be contractual—indeed, in view of Moss v. Smith, supra, and Talcott Land Co. v. Hershiser, supra, none could be cited. But appellants cite cases which hold the liability of directors under other statutes to be contractual, and argue that the liabilities involved in these cited cases are similar to the liability imposed by section 309 of the Civil Code, and thereby reach the conclusion that the liability imposed by section 309 Civil Code, is contractual, not penal. Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 64 P. 692, 69 P. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153; Brown v. Major (C. C. A.) 164 F. 673; In re Post (D. C. N. Y.) 12 F.(2d) 941. The two former cases deal with the liability of directors under section 3, article 12, of the Constitution, for moneys embezzled or misappropriated by the officers of a corporation or joint-stock association. The New York case deals with a similar liability under the New York law for wrongful misapplication of funds by a director of a corporation. It is true that the state court in Winchester v. Howard, supra, and the federal court in Brown v. Major, supra, following the decision of Winchester v. Howard, held the liability imposed under that section and article of the Constitution to be contractual. However, evidently this same argument was advanced in Moss v. Smith, supra, and there disposed of, for the court there, after definitely holding the liability under section 309, Civil Code, to be penal, for the reason that under section 309 there was no element of compensation for loss, said: "Nothing in Winchester v. Howard [136 Cal. 441, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153, 64 P. 692, 69 P. 77], supra, is in conflict with this; in the first place, because the directors, under section 3, art. 12, of the Constitution, which section was the foundation of the action, are liable solely for loss sustained by embezzlement and misappropriation—a liability involving loss, and thus entirely different in character from that which appellants contend is imposed by section 309."

In re La Jolla Lumber & Mill Co., 243 F. 1004, decided by the District Court, Southern District of California, holding that the liability of a director under 309 could only be enforced by a bill in equity, is cited, apparently to present the point that the remedy being in equity was not a penalty for the reason that an equity court will not enforce forfeitures and penalties. This argument was likewise advanced and answered in the leading case of Moss v. Smith, the court there saying: "The fact that the action may be treated in the nature of a creditors' bill brought on behalf of plaintiff creditor and all others, and that it thus addresses itself to the equitable side of the court, has not the slightest weight in determining the nature of the statute. and no more weight has the invocation of the familiar maxim that equity abhors penalties and forfeitures. The question might have been of consequence in the older administration of jurisprudence where the courts of law and equity were wholly separated, but it ceases to be of consequence under our system, and even under the English system since its Reformed Judicature Act has come into effect. All redress and relief is administered in one forum and by one judicial officer. If as chancellor he revolts at enforcing a legal penalty, he will doff his chancellor's robes and lay aside his great seal, and donning the judicial ermine will enforce the penalty * * *, resuming the regalia of his chancellorship for the purpose of making equitable disposition of the fund." The case of In re La Jolla Lumber & Mill Co., supra, is similar in its holding to Hornor v. Henning, discussed in our first opinion. So likewise is the case of United States Farm L. Co. v. Bennett, 55 Cal. App. 299, 203 P. 794, in which the Supreme Court in denying the petition for a hearing held that the decision of the District Court of Appeal could not be construed to mean that a single creditor could sue a director in a simple action for a money judgment, intimating that a bill in equity for the benefit of all the creditors was the proper remedy.

At first glance, some slight support is apparently afforded to appellants by the holding in Southern Cal. Home Builders v. Young, 45 Cal. App. 679, 188 P. 586. This case involved the unlawful payment of dividends as prohibited under section 309 of the Civil Code. However, it appears upon examination that the holding was to the effect that, even if section 309 be conceded to be remedial and damages must therefore be shown actual damages in the amount that the capital stock was depleted by unlawful dividends had been shown. The proposition that section 309 was remedial being, therefore, only a tentative assumption for the purpose of argument in that case, the decision therein is not actual authority to that effect.

Appellants point out that in the case of United States Farm Land Co. v. Bennett, supra, plaintiff secured judgment against defendant on account of goods alleged to have been delivered "by plaintiff and its assignors," and that in Colcord et al. v. Granzow et al., 137 Okl. 194, 278 P. 654, it was held that the right to sue under section 5336 (similar to section 309) passed to the assignees of notes held by certain creditors of a corporation prior to its dissolution as an incident to the debts. Appellants argue that, if the assignees of creditors may sue, the assignees of the corporation should be entitled to sue. Nothing contained in our former opinion is at variance with the conclusion of these two cases that the assignment of a debt carries with it the right to enforce the statutory liability of a director imposed as a penalty. That question was not then and is not now before us, and we expressly refrain from expressing any opinion thereon. In the instant case, the alleged assignment to the trustees was not an assignment of a debt owing to the corporation which might, perhaps, carry with it as an incident thereof the right to enforce the statutory liability of the directors, but was an attempt to assign the right to sue the directors upon the statutory liability. Nothing contained in either of the cited cases has caused us to change our former opinion that the naked right to sue upon the statutory penalty is not assignable by the corporation.

[10, 11] An amicus curiæ makes the further contention that a distinction has been made both by statute and decisions of courts between the liability imposed upon directors creating excessive corporate debts and those incurred by the directors in the commission of other acts enumerated in section 309 of the Civil Code resulting in the impairment of the capital stock of the corporation, such as declaring of dividends from sources other than surplus profits, and that, while the action of the directors declaring dividends contrary to the provisions of this section of the Code is expressly made a crime by a separate section of the Penal Code (section 560), and would, therefore, be void as to the corporation, no such drastic legislation is to be found against the action of directors creating excessive debts, but, on the other hand, such debts, though created in violation of the statute, are binding upon the corporation. Underhill v. Santa Barbara, etc., Co., 93 Cal. 300, 28 P. 1049. It is true that the legislation in one instance is more extreme in its effect than it is in the other. That the Legislature was of the opinion that the danger which might accrue to corporate property by reason of directors creating excessive debts was less real or serious than that which might arise from their acts in impairing the capital stock of a corporation is apparent from the amendment to section 309 of the Civil Code in the year 1929, which in effect wholly abolishes the liability of directors for their future acts in creating excessive debts while the provisions of said section in other respects were practically left unchanged. As the Code section now reads, as already stated, no action like the present one will lie either at the instance of the corporation, or of the creditors or stockholders. But the distinction which amicus curiæ points out is not the distinction which marks the dividing line between a punitive statute and one that is not. A punitive statute is one which creates a forfeiture or imposes a penalty. "What is meant by a statutory penalty was defined in Los Angeles County v. Ballerino, 99 Cal. 593, 32 P. 581, 34 P. 329, to be: 'One which an individual is allowed to recover against a wrongdoer, as a satisfaction for the wrong or injury suffered, and without reference to the actual damage sustained.'" Moss v. Smith, supra, page 783 of 171 Cal., 155 P. 90, 92. This court in that same case held that the liability against directors for the violation of section 309 in creating excessive debts came within the above definition and could be enforced against the directors without reference to the loss sustained by the corporation as a result of the action of the directors in illegally creating debts in excess of the capital stock. This, therefore, must be held to be the deciding characteristic of a statutory penalty, and the feature which distinguishes it from a mere contractual liability. We are, therefore, unable to agree with amicus curiæ in the above contention.

PER CURIAM.

In this action the same questions are presented as were before the court in the case of Fred E. Peterson et al. v. W. F. Ball et al., L. R. No. 10957, 296 P. 291, this day decided. The parties are practically the same in each action and the only difference in the two relates to the amount of the indebtedness claimed to have been illegally incurred. On the authority of the prior action, the judgment herein is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles C. Montgomery, Judge.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

[1, 2] The first cause of action stated in the complaint is in the ordinary form to quiet plaintiffs' title to lot 31 of tract No. 1600, in the city of Los Angeles. The second cause of action has for its object the annulment of certain building restrictions contained in the deeds, through which plaintiffs deraign their title to said parcel of land. The action was originally brought against the defendant Country Club Park, a corporation. Thereafter a complaint in intervention was filed by the remaining defendants. The pleadings were then amended and said interveners were made parties defendant. The trial court granted the relief prayed for by the plaintiffs. So far as the defendant Country Club Park, a corporation, is concerned, the judgment has become final. All the other defendants have appealed. Appellants contend that the relief asked in this case is not available to the plaintiffs, but applies only to cases where it is sought to enforce restrictions against the use of property. This contention is disposed of in Strong v. Hancock, 201 Cal. 530, 258 P. 60, where it is held that, since the enactment in 1921 of sections 1060, 1061, and 1062, of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to declaratory relief, actions such as this one may be maintained. Appellants further claim that even under the foregoing sections there is no "actual controversy" before the court. We think this claim is refuted by the record in the case as well as by the earnestness with which counsel for appellants is endeavoring to maintain the position that the restrictions against the land are binding and enforceable.

[3, 4] On January 23, 1912, the defendant Country Club Park, a corporation, was the owner of all the lands embraced in the tract No. 1600, hereinabove referred to. On said date, the corporation, having previously subdivided said tract of land, filed a subdivision map thereof, as provided by law. On May 31, 1916, said corporation conveyed to one Edwin B. Sword lot No. 31 of said tract, and through mesne conveyances respondents are now the owners of said lot. Each one of the appellants owns a lot in said tract No. 1600. In the several deeds, by which both the appellants and respondents obtained their respective titles, there is inserted certain restrictions as to the purposes for which said lots may be used. So far as necessary to a decision of the questions involved on this appeal, it is sufficient to say that the use is limited to residences only, to cost not less than $6,000, and to be located within certain lines. There are provisos attached to said conditions and restrictions by which, if there be any violation thereof by the grantee or his successors in interest, the premises revert to the grantor, its successors or assigns; "and as to the owner of and the successors in interest of any owner of any other lot or lots in said tract, all and singular said conditions are and shall be covenants running with the land for the benefit of the grantor herein and for the benefit of each and all of the lots in said tract, and of the owners of such lots in said tract and their respective successors in interest, and the breach of any of said covenants and conditions or the continuance of any such breach may be enjoined, abated or remedied by appropriate proceedings by any or either of such owners, their heirs, assigns, or successors in interest." It is also provided that the restrictions are of no effect after January 1, 1935; that the restrictions and conditions subsequent and the date of termination thereof "apply to and bind only the property hereinabove described and hereby conveyed and the owners thereof, and the grantor expressly reserves the right to make and/or apply the same or varying or different restrictions and conditions subsequent or to omit the same entirely, respecting other lots in said tract, and/or property owned by the grantor." The court found, among other matters, that since the execution and delivery of the said deeds and conveyances, the conditions in the neighborhood where said tract is situated have changed, and that the value of said lots have greatly increased; that said property, and particularly said lot 31, is in a section devoted exclusively to and essentially useful for business purposes; that the plaintiffs are ready, able, and willing to improve said lot for business purposes, and that the improvement thereof will not injure or damage the property of the defendants or any thereof, but on the contrary such improvements will make the property in that vicinity more valuable; that the conditions and restrictions are no longer beneficial for the purposes for which they were placed on said property, and that they have now become oppressive and inequitable, and to enforce them would be inequitable and unjust. The exhibits in the case show that said lot 31 is situated on the northeast corner of the intersection of Pico street and Wilton place; that the appealing defendants own lots on Wilshire place north of said lot 31, but not facing on Pico street. Charles B. Felts testified that he has been sales manager for the defendant Country Club Park for about thirteen years last past; that the last residence on said tract to be erected on Pico street was about eight years prior to October, 1927, the time of the trial; that lot 31 sold in 1912 for $4,000, and at the time of the trial, without the restrictions, had a value of about $40,000, and that other property there has a similar value; that Wilton place has many valuable homes. It was stipulated by the parties that Pico street is a business street from this tract on east. W. C. Skaggs testified that Pico street is a business street, and that the only practical purpose for which lot 31 could be used was for business purposes; a business house on this lot would increase the value of every lot in the tract; it would not harm the tract. F. S. Kadletz testified that his occupation was a real estate appraiser; that he had a large experience in that line of work for the city and county and also for individuals; that he was familiar with the Country Club Park tract of land and with said lot 31; that said lot was only suitable for business purposes; that no other property in the tract would be damaged if it were used for business purposes; that it would not damage the residences in this tract to erect a store building on said lot, because the character of the property as business property was already fixed. The plaintiff Arthur C. Hess testified that the taxes on said property were between $300 and $400 per year; that the assessments for the street lighting system was $360 per year; that the property was not desirable as residence property. It was stipulated that in 1912, when the tract was subdivided, the immediate neighborhood in which lot 31 and the adjoining property was situated was strictly residential district; that at that time Pico street had a width of 50 feet and since then has been widened to 80 feet; that since 1921 said lot and the lot immediately adjoining it to the north and for two lots deep on each side of Pico street from east of Western avenue westerly to the city limits has by an ordinance adopted by the city council of the city of Los Angeles been placed in a zoning district; that by virtue of said ordinance the only class of buildings that may be erected in said district, which includes said lot 31, are certain defined places of business. The exhibits attached to the transcript show that to the east of said lot on Pico street are many business places, to the west of said lot on said Pico street there are a number of business houses, such as a drug store, market, barber shop, oil stations, etc. It is true that none of these buildings is within said tract No. 1600, and that there have been no violations of the building restrictions in said tract. It further appears from the evidence that the said tract contains a total of 165 lots; that the defendant Country Club Park, a corporation, still owns 14 lots; that three lots have been sold by the last-named defendant without any restrictions contained in the deeds; that said tract contains 75 lots, the restrictions upon which expired January 1, 1925; leaving a total of 73 lots upon which, under the covenants contained in the deeds, the restrictions expire on January 1, 1935.

It also appears that there has never been filed in the office of the county recorder of the county of Los Angeles any statement of a common plan of restriction for said tract. We are of the opinion that under the evidence above set forth the trial court was right in declaring that, as to said lot No. 31, it would be unjust, oppressive, and inequitable to give effect to the said restrictions. That courts of equity may under such conditions declare the same null and void is unquestioned. Werner v. Graham, 181 Cal. 174, 183 P. 945; Downs v. Kroeger, 200 Cal. 743, 254 P. 1101; Strong v. Hancock, 201 Cal. 530, 258 P. 60. In Downs v. Kroeger, supra, the portion of the decision of the court applicable to this class of cases is summed up in the syllabus as follows: "Where a tract of land was subdivided and laid out for residential purposes and restrictive covenants running with the land were inserted in all deeds by which parts of said tract were conveyed, prohibiting until a certain time the construction of any structure but residences in the restricted area, a change in the uses to which the property in the neighborhood is being put of such nature that it is no longer residence property renders it unjust, oppressive, and inequitable to give effect to the restrictions, if such change has resulted from causes other than their breach."

In the case last cited it is said: "The findings of the court below under the evidence are binding upon us and we have simply adhered to the well-known rule of law governing us in such a situation."

Many additional cases are cited by both parties to this appeal. However, the cases above cited express the law of this state concerning this character of action, and we deem it unnecessary to further extend this opinion except to add that, the court having found upon substantial evidence that the uses to which the property in the neighborhood where the tract of land is situated have been put has changed this lot from a residence to a business property, it would be "unjust, oppressive and inequitable" to deny to the respondent the right to use said lot No. 31 for business or other lawful purposes.

The judgment is affirmed.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by defendants Estrin and Garbus from an order made by the lower court vacating its previous order dismissing the action and also from the order granting plaintiff permission to file an amended complaint. The appeal on the ground last mentioned has been dismissed. 98 Cal. App. 365, 276 P. 1036.

Plaintiff filed her complaint in the court below claiming damages for alleged personal injuries against the Southland Produce Company and the Liberty Produce Company, corporations. An answer was filed by Liberty Produce Company, "a partnership," and "Nick Estrin and Phillip Garbus, doing business under the firm name and style of Liberty Produce Company," in which, among other denials, was one denying the alleged corporate existence of the Liberty Produce Company. At the trial plaintiff dismissed as to the Southland Produce Company, and, calling the court's attention to the answer of defendants, asked leave to amend by striking out the word "corporation" and inserting instead the word "partnership." This was objected to by counsel for the answering defendants, and, after some argument and introduction of evidence on the question of ownership of the truck alleged to have collided with plaintiff, the following occurred:

"The Court: You are not prepared to prove that this is a corporation?

"Mr. Graves: We take their denial that this is a copartnership and rest on their statement that it is a partnership and ask to amend, without going into the details. We took their statement and asked to amend by inserting the word 'partnership' in the place of 'corporation,' and we hold that that is not an amendment which does the defendants any injustice, and therefore it is within the allowance of our code.

"The Court: I will have to deny the motion.

"Mr. Claassen: Your Honor, I move for a dismissal.

"The Court: I will have to grant the motion."

A minute order was then made pursuant thereto dismissing the action. About twelve days thereafter plaintiff's attorney filed a notice of motion to set aside said order of dismissal on the grounds of "inadvertence and by reason of an oversight on the part of said court," and that the granting of the motion "was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court," as well as other grounds not material here, and at the same time filed a notice of motion for permission to file an amended complaint. The motions came on for hearing December 26, 1928, and both were granted, whereupon defendants appealed.

Appellants contend that the court acted beyond its jurisdiction in vacating the order of dismissal. Respondent urges that the court may of its own motion modify or set aside an erroneous order, and apparently also urges that the action of the court in dismissing the action was mistakenly and inadvertently taken; that the court lacked jurisdiction and also abused its discretion. As authority for her first contention, respondent cites the cases of Ex parte Hartman, 44 Cal. 32, Loomis v. Andrews, 49 Cal. 239, and Domenigoni v. Imperial Live Stock, etc., Co., 189 Cal. 467, 209 P. 36. The first case arose under the Criminal Practice Act, prior to the adoption of the Codes, when a court of general jurisdiction had complete control over a final judgment during the term (Wiggin v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 398, 401, 9 P. 646), and so the action of the court there during the term was within its general jurisdiction as well as in accordance with the provisions of the act. The other two cases cited are also not pertinent.

[1, 2] The rule in California since the adoption of the Codes is well stated in the case of Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 524, 78 P. 11, 12, where the court says: "The decisions of this court are numerous and uniform to the effect that a judgment or order once regularly entered can be reviewed and set aside only in the modes prescribed by statute. If they have been entered prematurely or by inadvertence, they may be set aside on a proper showing, * * * and, if the order as entered is not the order as made, the minutes may be corrected so as to make them speak the truth, * * * but, subject to these exceptions, the order is reviewable only on appeal, and, the decision of the trial court having been once made after regular submission of the motion, its power is exhausted. It is functus officio." An examination of the record in the instant case shows that there was no mistake or inadvertence on the part of the court in the legal sense, and that the order of dismissal was the order intended to be made; and, while the court may have erred in the use of its discretion, there was no abuse of it. The plaintiff asked leave to amend, and the court denied the motion. The plaintiff then could not prove the allegation in her complaint that the defendant Liberty Produce Company was a corporation, and so she could proceed no further with the trial under the circumstances. The court had jurisdiction under subdivisions 4 and 5 of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure to dismiss the action even though it erred in so doing, and its action is conclusive except on appeal or other direct attack authorized by the code. Cozad v. Raisch Imp. Co., 208 Cal. 496, 281 P. 1017. The action of the court in our opinion being merely erroneous and not void, the motion to set aside the order of dismissal would seem to afford no basis for the order made. A motion for new trial would have done so, but it was not made; and, while we are heartily in accord with the principle of determining each case on the merits if possible, we see no way to accomplish that here, as in our opinion the court had no jurisdiction to vacate the order of dismissal under the circumstances shown by the record.

Order reversed.

PATTERSON v. HENDERSON TIRE & RUBBER CO.

Civ. 6141.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 18, 1931.

Set-off and counterclaim 🔑41.

In action for personal services, amount due plaintiff held subject to set-off for merchandise furnished by defendant previous to plaintiff's employment (Code Civ. Proc. § 440, and § 690, subd. 10).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action by F. L. Patterson against the Henderson Tire & Rubber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Leo L. Schaumer and DeGroot & Schaumer, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers and J. R. Girling, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J.

The plaintiff is prosecuting an appeal from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles county, reversing a judgment of the municipal court of Los Angeles city, and ordering a new trial therein and directing that appellant recover costs of appeal. This was based upon the Superior Court's conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to the sum of $31.79 only, which was the difference between the sum of $415.15, the amount owing to plaintiff by defendant for personal services, and the sum of $383.36, the amount owing to defendant by plaintiff on account of merchandise purchased prior to the rendition of the personal services.

The whole dispute between the parties was whether or not the sum of $321, the amount due, owing and unpaid from defendant to plaintiff for the latter's personal services, rendered within thirty days preceding the date of termination of plaintiff's employment, was subject to exemption from the set-off or counterclaim urged by defendant for merchandise furnished previous to the plaintiff's employment; the plaintiff having alleged that said sum of $321 was and is necessary for the use of his family residing in this state, supported in whole by his labor. Plaintiff's contention was sustained by the municipal court, but the Superior Court reached a different conclusion thereon, and ordered a reversal of the judgment of the said municipal court, basing its conclusion on section 440 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that the respective debts or claims of the plaintiff and defendant must be deemed compensated, so far as they equal each other; that is, that the defendant's claim against plaintiff has set off, equalized, and balanced plaintiff's demand against the defendant to the extent of $383.36, the amount which was admittedly due the defendant.

Appellant states that he is not relying upon section 690, subdivision 10, of the Code of Civil Procedure, but he is contending that, to warrant a set-off or counterclaim, the debts must be mutual, and that the principle of mutuality requires that the debts "must not only be due to and from the same person, but in the same capacity."

An examination of this record shows that the set-off or counterclaim allowed by the Superior Court complies with this requirement.

The judgment of the Superior Court is affirmed.

CHEATHAM v. MUNICIPAL COURT IN AND FOR CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

Civ. No. 7681.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 20, 1931.

1. Abatement and revival 🔑8(6).

Purchaser at sale under trust deed could maintain unlawful detainer action against grantor retaining possession, notwithstanding action pending between parties involving same property.

Defendant in unlawful detainer action had filed complaint in another court against plaintiff and others in unlawful detainer action, alleging she had intrusted certain property to defendants in such action as security, and that defendants had failed to account to her for it, but had sold property and embezzled proceeds, and prayed for return of property or for a reasonable compensation for detaining, converting, and embezzling property.

2. Abatement and revival 🔑8(6).

There may be two suits pending between same parties for possession of same land, if second is brought on title acquired after commencement of first.

3. Courts 🔑168.

Municipal court had jurisdiction of unlawful detainer action where plaintiff claimed $35 monthly rental, totaling $50 (St. 1925, p. 658, § 29, subd. 2, as amended by St. 1929, p. 838, § 2).

Petition by Fannie G. Cheatham against the Municipal Court in and for the city of Los Angeles, Los Angeles County, Hon. T. L. Ambrose, Judge Presiding, for a writ of mandate.

Writ denied.

A. E. Putnam, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

IRA F. THOMPSON, Judge.

This is an application for the writ of mandate by which it is sought to compel the respondent court to dismiss an action in unlawful detainer. The alternative writ was not issued, the petitioner preferring to bring the matter on for hearing upon notice to the respondent. From the petition it appears that D. W. Henderson filed a complaint in the municipal court (the petition fails to state the date), alleging a sale of certain property pursuant to the terms of a trust deed executed by the defendant, the petitioner herein; that the plaintiff became the purchaser thereat; that the plaintiff had served the defendant with a notice to vacate, which she had refused to do; that he had been damaged in the sum of $50, the rental value of the property to the time of the filing of the complaint; and that the rental value of the property was $35 per month. The defendant in that action, the petitioner here, interposed a demurrer to the complaint on the grounds, so far as we are able to judge from the very ambiguous pleading, that there was an action pending between the same parties in the superior court involving the ownership and possession of the property, and that the value of the real property was more than $3,000, and hence the court had no jurisdiction of the action. A pleading denominated an answer was also filed setting up verbatim the same matter contained in that which was called a demurrer, and no more. The demurrer was overruled, and, after trial held on November 10, 1930, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of the property and $35. On August 12, 1930, the petitioner filed a complaint in the superior court against Henderson and others, alleging that she had intrusted certain real and personal property to defendants as security, and that the defendants had failed to account to plaintiff for it, but had sold the property and embezzled the proceeds, and praying for a return of the property or for a reasonable compensation in the sum of $17,000, together with a like sum for "intentionally and maliciously taking, detaining, converting, embezzling said property and conspiring to wrongfully deprive plaintiff thereof." Henderson interposed a general demurrer, which was sustained by the court on August 27, 1930, with ten days to the plaintiff there, the petitioner here, to amend. Plaintiff filed no amended complaint, and for her default in that particular the motion of the defendant Henderson for judgment was granted, and the cause dismissed on September 22, 1930. On November 25, 1930, plaintiff gave notice that she appealed from the judgment in Cheatham v. John Doe Jackson (Henderson) et al., filed October 2, 1930, although as we have seen, the judgment was apparently rendered September 22, 1930. This further discrepancy may be noted—the notice of appeal refers to action numbered in the superior court 106316, whereas the action to which we have heretofore referred is 107316.

[1, 2] Was the respondent court bound to determine that the pendency of the action in the superior court was good ground for the abatement of the action in the municipal court? It is difficult to designate the superior court action. It was not an action to recover the real property. In fact, so far as appears in the petition before us, the description of the property was not set forth in the complaint. The statement is made in the complaint that the property was intrusted to the defendants as security, but as security for what we are not told. We are told that the defendants sold the property and refused to account. But whether they sold it pursuant to the terms of the agreement or contrary thereto is not disclosed other than as we are able to imagine from a statement, which as an allegation of fact is utterly without merit, that "defendants have conspired among themselves and others unknown to plaintiff to deprive her of said property and legal rights, without due process of law and in violation thereof." It is obvious, however, that the complaint totally fails to state a cause of action, and it is also patent that the title claimed by the plaintiff in the municipal court as the foundation for his action was acquired by a trustee's deed on September 6, 1930, or a month lacking six days after petitioner's action in the superior court was filed. In Leonard v. Flynn, 89 Cal. 535–541, 26 P. 1097, 1098, 23 Am. St. Rep. 500, it is said: "A plaintiff may have two suits against the same defendant for the recovery of the possession of the same land, pending at the same time, if the second is brought on a title acquired after the commencement of the first. Vance v. Olinger, 27 Cal. 358; Mann v. Rogers, 35 Cal. 318; Larco v. Clements, 36 Cal. 132; Murray v. Green, 64 Cal. 368, 28 P. 118." This concludes the petitioner in this particular, although it should be added that no judgment could have been rendered under the pleading presented which would have been a bar to the action commenced in the respondent court.

[3] All that is necessary to demonstrate that the municipal courts have jurisdiction of unlawful detainer actions where the damages sought are no greater than here involved is to quote subdivision 2 of section 29 of the Municipal Court Act (St. 1925, p. 658) as amended in 1929 (Stats. 1929, p. 838, § 2), which provides that they shall have jurisdiction of "All actions of forcible entry or forcible or unlawful detainer, where the rental value is two hundred dollars or less per month, and where the whole amount of damages claimed is two thousand dollars or less."

Writ denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action by T. J. Niceley against the County of Madera. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Barcroft & Barcroft and Mason A. Bailey, all of Madera, for appellant.

David E. Peckinpah, of Fresno, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

This cause is based upon certain obligations incurred by Welton C. Rhodes, as sheriff of the county of Madera, for detective hire, etc. The items upon which this action is based appear to be in excess of the amount allowed to the office of sheriff by the county budget for the fiscal year beginning June 1, 1928, and ending June 30, 1929. By the budget the sheriff was allowed the sum of $1,000, this sum having been expended on or before October 31, 1928, and further allowances made by the board of supervisors of the sum of $327.43. Thereafter the sheriff incurred expenditures in the sum of $982.46. This expenditure was incurred in running down and ferreting out of certain bands of cattle thieves, and also in connection with a certain crime committed in the county of Madera known as the "Sylva murder case." The board of supervisors disallowed the claims on two grounds: First, that the expenditures were unnecessary; and, second, on the further ground that the fund allowed the sheriff for detective hire, etc., had been exhausted. Upon this appeal no question is made as to the necessity or propriety of the expenditures made by the sheriff, or of the expenses incurred by him, the only contention being that section 3714 of the Political Code, being the Budget Act, is controlling, and that under its provisions the sheriff only is liable for the payment of the expenses furnishing the basis of this action. On the part of the sheriff it is contended that section 4307 of the Political Code governs this action. The claims were all assigned to the plaintiff, and the action is prosecuted by the plaintiff for the collection of the several items of expenditure. The trial court found the allegations of the complaint true, which included the necessity and propriety of making the expenditures, and also held that the expenses constituted a legal charge against the county of Madera, and awarded judgment, as prayed for. The county appeals from this judgment.

The cause of action herein arose prior to the amendments of sections 3714 and 4307 of the Political Code, made in 1929 (St. 1929, pp. 1129, 1969). Hence it is not necessary to consider the argument of counsel relative to any changes made by the Legislature in 1929.

After providing at length, and with a great deal of detail, how county budgets shall be made up and approved, subdivision 5 of section 3714 of the Political Code (St. 1927, p. 725) reads as follows, so far as pertinent here: "Expenditures made, liabilities incurred, or warrants issued in excess of any of the budget appropriations as originally determined, or as thereafter revised by transfer, as herein provided, shall not be a liability of the county, but the official making or incurring such expenditure shall be liable therefor personally, and upon his official bond. The county board of supervisors shall approve no claim, and the county auditor shall issue no warrant for any expenditure in excess of said budget appropriation, as finally adopted or as thereafter increased from the unbudgeted reserve or by a transfer as herein provided by said board of supervisors, or as revised under the provisions herein, except upon an order of a court of competent jurisdiction, or for an emergency, as hereinafter provided." As amended, this act went into effect on the 1st day of January, 1928. In 1927, section 4307 of the Political Code was amended so as to provide for the payment of certain expenditures incurred by the sheriff, the subdivision of that section (section 4307, subd. 2, as amended by St. 1927 p. 1667) reading as follows: "The traveling and other personal expenses of the district attorney and the sheriff incurred in criminal cases arising in the county, and in civil actions and proceedings in which the county is interested, and all other expenses necessarily incurred by either of them in the detection of crime, and in the prosecution of criminal cases," etc., shall constitute a proper charge against the county. As amended, this section took effect within the statutory time thereafter and some months preceding the time of the taking effect of section 3714 of the Political Code. The contention here presented is that section 3714 of the Political Code, taking effect some months after the taking effect of section 4307 of the Political Code, by implication repeals section 4307 of the Political Code, it being argued that the two sections are in irreconcilable conflict.

Before considering the question of whether section 3714 of the Political Code, by implication or otherwise, repeals the provisions of section 4307 of the Political Code, it is important to observe that subdivision 5 of section 3714, supra, does not make final the budget as adopted by the board of supervisors, nor does it make final the sum or allowance made or allotted to any particular official. The question is left open for a determination by the court as to whether any other items of expenditure shall be determined to be a claim against the county, and whether the county shall be held liable therefor. This plainly appears from the words specifying that no payment shall be made, "except upon an order of a court of competent jurisdiction." And this provision follows that portion of the section relating to expenditures outside of, and in excess of, the budget allowance.

[1] In 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 1667) section 4307 of the Political Code was so amended as to make the provisions thereof applicable to sheriffs as well as to district attorneys, and the section as amended, not only makes the traveling and personal expenses of the sheriff, and district attorney a proper charge against the county, but also all other expenses necessarily incurred in the detection of crime and in the prosecution of criminal cases, etc.

This court has had occasion to consider the provisions of section 4307 of the Political Code in several cases. In the case of Thiel Detective Co. v. Tuolumne County, 37 Cal. App. 423, 173 P. 1120, 1122, it was held that the district attorney is authorized to employ detectives at the expense of the county, when necessary for the detection of persons guilty of crimes, or to obtain evidence of their guilt, and that, when a claim for such expenditures is presented and disallowed by the board of supervisors, an action might be maintained to enforce payment. There the question was raised as to whether the district attorney should consult the board of supervisors, and presumably obtain their consent before making such expenditures, and the court, quoting from the case of County of Yolo v. Joyce, 156 Cal. 429, 105 P. 125, used the following language: "'There is no provision of the law which requires the district attorney to consult any court or obtain any order therefrom as a prerequisite for his incurring any expense which he may deem proper in the discharge of his duties in detecting crime or prosecuting of criminal cases.' It may be said also that there is no provision requiring him to consult the board of supervisors, but the matter is left to his discretion in the first instance." The same is true with regard to the sheriff. The section of the Code we are considering does not require the sheriff to consult the board of supervisors or obtain their consent or the consent or order of the court before incurring the expenditures. However, a claim for such expenses must be presented to the board of supervisors, and, if considered unnecessary, may be rejected. In any case the court is the final arbiter of the necessity for the expenditures and the legality of the charge against the county.

Whatever has been said by the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal relative to the power and authority of a district attorney under section 4307 of the Political Code applies now to the power and authority of a sheriff.

In the case of Cunning v. Carr, 69 Cal. App. 232, 230 P. 987, 990, this court had occasion to analyze the various cases having to do with the power and authority of the district attorney. In holding that the district attorney of Humboldt county had authority to employ detectives to assist in ferreting out crimes and obtaining evidence upon which to base prosecutions, this court said: "This court, in the case of Thiel v. Tuolumne County, 37 Cal. App. 423, 173 P. 1120, has also held that the authority is given the district attorney, under said section of the Political Code, to make employment of an agent to detect crime and that the expenses therefor constituted a proper county charge." Practically the same holding is had in Humiston v. Shaffer, 145 Cal. 195, 78 P. 651; Victors v. Kelsey, 31 Cal. App. 796, 161 P. 1006; County of Yolo v. Joyce, 156 Cal. 429, 105 P. 125; Rocca v. Boyle, 166 Cal. 94, 135 P. 34, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 857. We likewise refer to the case of Langdon v. Koster, 157 Cal. 39, 106 P. 209, where the district attorney of San Francisco was held authorized to employ a special agent in the detection of crime and assist in obtaining evidence to prosecute certain alleged offenders in that county.

In the case of Cunning v. County of Humboldt, 204 Cal. 31, 266 P. 522, the opinion in the case of Cunning v. Carr, supra, is quoted at length and approved, and the court sustained the authority of the district attorney to employ detectives and agents to assist in the detection of crime and the collection of evidence, etc. It is true that these cases all involved facts and circumstances arising prior to the 1st day of January, 1928, the date on which the amendment to section 3714 of the Political Code, relative to budgeting, took effect.

In the case of Darrah, District Attorney, v. San Joaquin County, 283 P. 962, this court again upheld the authority of the district attorney under section 4307 of the Political Code to incur expenses, as therein provided for, even though no allowance had been made by the board of supervisors to cover the same, and that such expenses constituted a charge against the county, and the district attorney was awarded judgment for repayment by the county of such expenses. In the case of Darrah v. San Joaquin County, supra, however, section 3714 of the Political Code was not considered. So far as the opinion reads it relates exclusively to the authority of the district attorney to the provisions of section 4307 of the Political Code unaffected by any of the provisions or limitations of section 3714 of the same code.

We may also agree with the contention of the appellant that none of the cases which we have cited consider anything further than the authority conferred by section 4307 of the Political Code, as section 3714 of the Political Code, so far as it relates to budgeting of the expenses, was not then in existence. In support of the contention of the appellant that section 3714 of the Political Code is controlling here, our attention is called to the case of Fitzgerald v. Badaracco, 202 Cal. 18, 258 P. 937, where an attempt was made by the board of public works to raise certain salaries and then compel the board of supervisors of the county of San Francisco to adopt such salary raise and provide for the payment thereof by increasing the budget allowance and levying a tax to cover the same. It was there held that the board of supervisors constituted the ultimate authority in that particular, and the petition of the board of public works was denied. That case, however, does not appear to us to be controlling here. The charter of the city of San Francisco, so far as we are advised contains no such provisions as we find in section 4307 of the Political Code.

The authorities which we have cited definitely establish the right and power of either district attorney or sheriff to perform the acts and incur the expenditures which are involved in this action, unless limited by the provisions of section 3714 of the Political Code. If there is no conflict, then there is no limitation other than as determined ultimately by the courts. In other words, the necessity and legality of the expenditures are first determined by the officer involved, second, by the board of supervisors, and finally, by the courts.

[2-6] As to the two sections referred to, it is contended by the appellant that section 3714 of the Political Code cannot be given full effect unless it is construed as a limitation upon the power conferred upon the sheriff and district attorney by section 4307, and therefore, that section 4307, taking effect prior to the taking effect of section 3714 of the Political Code, is repealed by implication. In determining this question attention must first be given to the subject-matter of the two sections. A reading of all of section 3714 of the Political Code shows that the Legislature had in contemplation a system which would provide for budgeting all the ordinary expenses of the county, and that all of the ordinary and usually anticipated expenses of the conduct of each office of the county should be estimated and set forth in the budget. There is nothing in section 3714 of the Political Code relative to extraordinary or unusual or unanticipated expenditures that might necessarily have to be incurred in the prosecution of criminal cases. In fact there is nothing in section 3714 of the Political Code covering the subject of criminal prosecutions, or of the detection and ferreting out of criminals, or the collection of testimony necessary to be brought forth and presented to the court in the enforcement of our criminal laws. The emergency expenditures referred to in subdivision 6 of section 3714 of the Political Code (St. 1927, p. 725) cannot reasonably be interpreted as applying to any of the acts or expenditures involved in this action. There was no public emergency, no fire, flood, explosion, storm, earthquake, epidemic, riot, or insurrection. Only such occurrences as are provided for in section 4307 of the Political Code are presented to us for consideration. A reading of section 4307 of the Political Code shows that it applies to a specific subject, to wit, the detection of crime and the prosecution of criminal cases, so far as the present action is concerned. Thus, it is apparent that the two sections relate to entirely different and distinct subjects. As stated in 23 California Jurisprudence, page 697: "In order that one statute may repeal another by implication, it seems clear that both must deal with the same subject matter. An act is not repealed by a subsequent act relating to another matter, nor is a section repealed by a subsequent section if the subjects of the two sections are distinct and separate and in nowise in conflict with each other."

We think the foregoing analysis shows that the two sections are distinct and deal with different subjects. We do not need to cite authorities to the elementary proposition that repeals by implication are not favored, nor do we need to question the contention of appellant that the latest valid expression of the legislative will on a given subject is controlling. The law relative to the repeal of statutes by implication is clearly set forth in 23 California Jurisprudence, page 691, et seq., and shows clearly that one section of the Code will not be held repealed by a subsequent section making no mention of the prior section, unless there is an irreconcilable conflict. Here, as we have said, one section relates to the subject of budgeting, and as we have shown by an excerpt taken from subdivision 5 of the section relating to the budget, the court is the final arbiter of whether expenses incurred outside of the budget shall be paid by the county.

We think the cases which we have cited and the sections, as we have analyzed them, demonstrate clearly that section 4307 of the Political Code stands unlimited by section 3714 of the Political Code; that both sections as we have interpreted them may be given full effect; and that the expenditures incurred by a sheriff under section 4307 of the Political Code, when approved by the board of supervisors, or upon a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, constitute a county charge; and that there is nothing in section 3714 of the Political Code operating as a bar to prevent payment.

Unless compelled thereto by the wording of the sections, the conclusion should not be drawn that the Legislature intended that the detection and prosecution of thieves and murderers should be limited or stayed by a budget system relating to the ordinary business of a county—one section relates to the transaction of civil business; the other has to do with criminal proceedings. This, we think, shows the line of demarkation between the purposes and subject-matter of the two sections. The construction which we have given to the two sections does not award a district attorney or sheriff unlimited license in the expenditure of a county's money. The words "expenses necessarily incurred" appearing in the section make the trial court the final arbiter, and, if so found, the county is liable.

The judgment is affirmed.

Levinsky & Jones, of Stockton, and Morgan J. Doyle, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Kilpatrick & Goodman, of Oakland, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a judgment which was rendered upon a verdict for damages for personal injuries resulting from a collision between automobiles.

The only question involved in the appeal is whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

Kettleman lane and Quimby avenue intersect at right angles one mile south from Lodi. The first-mentioned lane runs east and west. The other one extends north and south. Both roadways are surfaced with asphalt pavement. Each is about eighteen feet in width with a dirt shoulder on either side. There is no grade at the intersection of these highways. A danger sign was stationed near the western border of Quimby avenue 200 feet from its intersection with Kettleman lane. November 13, 1929, at 9 o'clock p. m., the plaintiff, accompanied by his wife, was driving southerly along Quimby avenue in their Dodge automobile. At the same time the defendant was driving easterly along Kettleman lane. It was dark, and the headlights of both cars were turned on. The night was clear. The pavement was dry. The brakes on the plaintiff's car were in good condition. There was a line of trees on the westerly side of Quimby avenue, north of Kettleman lane, obscuring the view to some extent. The plaintiff approached the intersection of these streets at about 25 miles an hour. When he reached a point 30 feet northerly of the intersection his speed was reduced to 16 miles an hour. His view being somewhat obstructed by the trees to his right, the plaintiff did not observe the headlights of the defendant's car until he reached a point about 10 feet from the intersection. The defendant's machine was then 50 or 75 feet westerly from the intersection and was running at a speed of about 45 miles an hour. There were stop signs on Kettleman lane along which the defendant was driving. When the plaintiff first saw the lights of the defendant's car, he shut off the gas, but permitted the car to roll along on its own momentum, thinking the defendant would stop on account of the signs. Almost instantly he realized the defendant was not slackening his speed, and therefore began to put on his brakes. At first they were not applied with full force. The plaintiff did not think the defendant would run past the stop sign without stopping. Realizing very soon that the defendant was not going to stop, the plaintiff applied his brake with full force causing the rear wheels to skid, and instantly turned his machine to the left to avoid the collision which seemed imminent. The machines came in contact near the center of the intersection. Defendant's car ran off the road some 75 feet and landed in a vineyard. The plaintiff's car was overturned. Both the plaintiff and his wife were seriously injured. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $2,000. The amount of this verdict is not challenged.

[1-3] The question of contributory negligence under the circumstances of this case was a problem for the determination of the jury. 19 Cal. Jur. 735, § 141; Swartz v. Acme Exp. & D. Co., 102 Cal. App. 615, 283 P. 358. Where the circumstances are such that reasonable minds may differ regarding the question as to whether a plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence, a judgment in his favor will not be disturbed on appeal. Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125. There is ample evidence to support the judgment and implied findings of the jury to the effect that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

The plaintiff testified:

"At the northerly boundary line of the intersection * * * [my machine was going] not over fifteen miles an hour. * * *

"Q. What did your speedometer register at that time [30 feet before reaching the intersection]? A. About sixteen [miles an hour]. * * *

"Q. Did you see a machine coming? A. Not until I was within about ten feet of the intersection line. * * *

"Q. Where were these lights you saw on Kettleman lane, * * * how far west of that westerly boundary line were the lights, in feet? A. Between fifty and seventy-five feet. * * * I saw the flash of the lights and slapped on my brakes, and I got hit then. * * *

"Q. Did those lights appear to be moving rapidly? * * * A. I should judge about forty-five miles an hour. * * * I had taken my foot off the accelerator, but had not thrown out the clutch. * * *

"Q. Were your brakes in good condition? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. How many feet would it take you to stop the car [running sixteen miles an hour]? A. I should judge twelve or fifteen feet. * * *

"Q. Why is it your car did not stop? * * * A. I expected him to stop at the intersection. * * * I applied the brakes when I saw he did not slack up at the intersection. * * * As I came to the intersection line, I started to push in my brake * * * but did not apply them enough to stop the car at that point, * * * ten feet north of the boundary line. * * * I saw the lights were not stopping, and I turned to the left * * * trying to get out of the way. * * *

"Q. How far west [was the machine then]? A. I suppose twenty-five feet. * * * I don't think they slacked up in speed at all. * * *

"Q. Could you have stopped your car in a distance of twenty feet? * * * A. I could have if I had thought it was necessary. * * *

"Q. Why didn't you bring your automobile to a stop right then? A. Because nobody is supposed to pass a stop sign. A stop sign is there. * * *

"Q. Will you tell us where you were * * * when you first realized that the lights which you saw on the other car would not be able to stop? * * * A. I had crossed the line of intersection. * * * [I made] the turn to the left to prevent him from hitting me. * * *

"Q. How soon after you realized the other car would not stop, did you turn to the left and jam on your brakes? A. As soon as I possibly could. * * *

"Q. Where were you at the time you saw this car at 'A 3'? A. In the intersection. * * *

"Q. At that time you realized that car could not stop? * * * A. I didn't know whether it could or not. * * * I applied my brakes as soon as I thought it was necessary."

Under the circumstances of the present case it seems quite clear the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence. At least it became a question for the jury to determine, and there is sufficient evidence to support the finding in this regard which is favorable to the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

This is an appeal from an order dismissing a petition to revoke the probate of a will.

[1] The dismissal was ordered on the ground that the petition was filed too late. Section 1327 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by an amendment which took effect on August 14, 1929 (St. 1929, p. 860, § 2), allows a contest of a will after probate to be filed within six months after admission to probate. In the present case the decedent departed this life on August 3, 1929, and on August 21 of the same year his will was admitted to probate. The contest here in question was filed on April 7, 1930, more than six months after the will was probated. Under the direct terms of section 1327 it is plain that the filing was too late.

Appellant, however, sets forth several alleged reasons why the limitation prescribed by the statute should not be allowed to apply in the present instance, but we think it so plain that they are not true reasons that we forbear further to discuss them.

[2] Section 1333 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "If no person, within one year after the probate of a will, contest the same or the validity thereof, the probate of the will is conclusive; saving to infants and persons of unsound mind, a like period of one year after their respective disabilities are removed." So the section has stood since 1874. A part of the amendment of section 1327, passed in 1929, was in changing the words "one year," theretofore in the section, to "six months." It is contended that section 1333 is a statute of limitation and that it is applicable to the present case. But section 1327 is undoubtedly a statute of limitation, and, if section 1333 is to be regarded as such a statute, in form, it is plainly in conflict with 1327 and to the extent of the conflict was repealed by implication by the amendment of the latter in 1929.

Order affirmed.

Ex parte BRIDWELL.

Cr. 206.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Feb. 16, 1931.

1. Criminal law 🔑90(4).

Criminal jurisdiction of justice's court in township of 30,000, or more, is confined to offenses committed within township in which court is situated (Pen. Code, § 1425, as amended by St. 1929, p. 861).

2. Criminal law 🔑90(4).

Justice court of Santa Ana township, having population over 30,000, was without jurisdiction of misdemeanor for failure to support minor children, where defendant and children were not residents of township (Pen. Code, § 1425, as amended by St. 1929, p. 861).

Application of D. N. Bridwell for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the Sheriff of Orange County.

Writ granted, and petitioner discharged.

John F. Groene, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner was tried in the justice's court of Santa Ana township, county of Orange, upon a complaint charging him with failure to support his minor children, a misdemeanor; the complaint charging that this offense was committed within the county of Orange, state of California. He was found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for the term of one year. It fully appears that the petitioner and his said minor children were not residents of Santa Ana township, but that they were, and for more than five years had been, residents of the township of La Brea, in the county of Orange. Petitioner attacks the jurisdiction of the justice's court of Santa Ana township over the offense charged. This township has a population in excess of thirty thousand, and the question presented is whether or not a justice's court in such a township has county-wide jurisdiction over such a misdemeanor.

While section 1425 of the Penal Code formerly gave to justices' courts jurisdiction over offenses committed within the respective counties in which such courts are established, this section was amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 861), and now reads as follows:

"The justices' courts have jurisdiction as follows:

"1. In cities, cities and counties, towns and judicial townships having a population of thirty thousand or more, said courts shall have jurisdiction in all criminal cases amounting to misdemeanor only, except those of which the juvenile court is given original jurisdiction.

"2. In those having a population of less than thirty thousand said courts shall have jurisdiction in all criminal cases amounting to misdemeanor only, punishable by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

We think the question before us has been practically decided in the case of Antilla v. Justice's Court of Big Bear River, etc. (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 43, 45, in which it was held that the jurisdiction of justices' courts in criminal cases is confined to the township wherein the offense was committed. While that case involved the jurisdiction of a justice court in a township which actually had a population of less than thirty thousand, over an offense committed in another similar township in the same county, the court does not rest its decision upon that fact. In that case the court used the following illustration: "For example, under the construction contended for by respondents, in a county having one township of the larger population and five of the lesser population, the justices' court of the former would, under well-settled holdings of the court, have exclusive jurisdiction of every offense of the higher type committed in any part of the county and concurrent jurisdiction, with the other justices' courts, of all the lesser offenses as well. Green v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. 556, 21 P. 307, 541; Application of Westenberg, 167 Cal. 309, 316, 139 P. 674; In re Luna, 201 Cal. 405, 257 P. 76, supra. This result may not have been intended by the Legislature."

Not only do the inference from this illustration, and the fact that the decision is not expressly limited to the jurisdiction of a justice court in a township of the lesser population, support the contention of petitioner here, but the principles and reasoning set forth in that case would seem to apply as well to the jurisdiction of justice courts in townships of the larger population. The former county-wide jurisdiction of justice courts having been withdrawn, by the amendment of section 1425, such jurisdiction is no more to be presumed for the one class of such courts than for the other.

[1, 2] We conclude that under section 1425 of the Penal Code, as now existing, while a justice's court in a township having a population of thirty thousand or more has an enlarged jurisdiction in certain respects, the territorial limits of its jurisdiction are the same as those of a justice's court in a smaller township, and that its jurisdiction in criminal cases is therefore confined to offenses committed within the township in which it is situated. The justice's court of Santa Ana township, under whose process this petitioner is held, had no jurisdiction over the offense involved, since it is not situated in the township in which the offense was committed. See, also, In re Cohen (Cal. App.) 290 P. 512.

The writ is granted, and the petitioner is discharged from custody.

KUTNER-GOLDSTEIN CO. v. WORKMAN.

Civ. 307.

Rehearing Denied March 16, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 20, 1931.

1. Sales 🔑286.

Reasonable time to put grain binder in satisfactory working condition would be such time as permitted test in actual use and worked no injury to purchaser (Civ. Code, § 1657).

Grain binder proved defective during harvesting season, whereupon seller and purchaser entered into new contract in writing providing for sale of binder and payment of purchase price. At same time, seller signed and delivered to purchaser a letter wherein seller agreed as per contract at its expense to put binder in, and turn same over to purchaser in, satisfactory working condition within a reasonable time. To properly determine whether binder was put in satisfactory working condition involved testing it in actual use.

2. Evidence 🔑52.

Court could not take judicial notice of time for harvesting grain and thereby contradict direct evidence.

3. Sales 🔑441(3).

Evidence held insufficient to support finding that seller within reasonable time attempted to put grain binder in satisfactory working condition (Civ. Code, § 1657).

4. Sales 🔑286.

Seller of grain binder, having agreed to put binder in satisfactory working condition, could not require purchaser to give few weeks' notice before harvest season.

At time of agreement by seller to put grain binder in satisfactory working condition within reasonable time, purchaser had harvested his crops for that particular season and had no use for it until the following harvesting season. Subsequently seller wrote letter to purchaser requesting purchaser to give seller few weeks' notice before ready to use binder, and in letter agreed to then proceed to put binder in first-class working condition.

BARNARD, P. J.

In April, 1926, the plaintiff sold to the defendant a new grain binder and engine, which proved defective during the ensuing harvesting season. A new contract was entered into in writing between the parties on the 24th day of August, 1926, providing for the sale of the binder and engine to the defendant for $515, $104 of which was paid in cash, and the defendant agreed to pay the balance of $411 on June 15, 1927. At the same time the plaintiff signed and delivered to the defendant a letter reading as follows: "Relative to grain binder, as per contract signed today, this is to advise that we will, at our expense, put same in and turn same over to you in satisfactory working condition, within a reasonable time."

At that time the defendant had completed the harvest of all of his crops for the year 1926, and it is admitted that he had no use for the binder until the harvesting season of 1927. On January 13, 1927, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant as follows: "Regarding the binder there is nothing we can do until about the time you are ready to use this, and if you will give us a few weeks notice we will then proceed to get same in first class working condition."

The defendant testified that he did not recall getting this letter, but that he might have gotten it. On or about May 10, 1927, an employee of the plaintiff, with a representative of the company that manufactures the binder, went to the defendant's ranch for the purpose of putting the binder in condition. The record shows that the defendant told these visitors that the big portion of his grain was then too ripe to cut with a binder, that he could not accept the machine, and that he did not want it. The visitors left without fixing the binder, and on June 10, 1927, the defendant served upon the plaintiff a written notice of rescission of the contract. On June 17, 1927, the plaintiff brought this action to recover the balance due, according to the contract. In his answer, the defendant set up the defense that the plaintiff had not complied with its agreement, in that it had not repaired the binder as agreed, and that he had rescinded the contract, and a return of the $104 already paid was prayed for. The action was tried before the court without a jury. The court found that the binder and engine were not in working condition, but that the plaintiff had agreed to put the same into satisfactory working condition; that on or about the 10th day of May, 1927, the plaintiff sent employees to the defendant's ranch to properly repair the binder and engine; that at that time the defendant told these employees that he would refuse to accept the binder and engine, even if the same were put in good condition and properly repaired; that, as a consequence of the refusal of the defendant to accept the binder and engine, the plaintiff did not put the same into working condition; and that the said visit of the plaintiff's employees to the defendant's ranch occurred within a reasonable time after the execution of the written contract of August 24, 1926. This appeal is from the judgment for the plaintiff, which followed.

It is admitted by all parties that the machinery was not in proper working condition. Appellant's first contention is that the finding that he told respondent's employees that he would refuse to accept the binder and engine even if the same were put into good working condition is not supported by the evidence. Without further referring to the record, we have no hesitation in saying that this contention is without merit.

[1-3] Appellant next argues that the finding that the visit of respondent's employees to appellant's ranch on or about May 10, 1927, was within a reasonable time after the execution of the contract, is not supported by the evidence. We feel that this point is well taken, and that the same is determinative of this appeal. While appellant argues that, under the provisions of section 1657 of the Civil Code, these repairs should have been made immediately after August 24, 1926, it will be noted that the agreement relied upon is silent as to the exact time when the repairs shall be made, but that it provides that the machine is to be turned over in satisfactory working condition "within a reasonable time." To determine whether or not it was put in satisfactory working condition involved testing it in actual use, and, since the harvesting season of 1926 was past, it could not be so tested until the next season. Under the circumstances, a reasonable time would be such a time as permitted such test, and also a time which would work no injury to the defendant. We think this must be held to be a time making it available for the harvesting of the next crop, in the year 1927. One element in determining whether the time is reasonable, is whether it is within such time as will work no injury on the other party. Spaeth v. Ocean Park, etc., Inv. Co., 16 Cal. App. 329, 116 P. 980. It seems apparent that, if this machine was not repaired in time to harvest the crop of 1927, it would result in injury to the appellant. Whether the attempt of the respondent to put the machinery into the required condition was made within a reasonable time, as found by the trial court, depends then upon whether this was done in time for the harvesting of the crop of 1927. As to the fact in that regard, the appellant testified that, when the respondent's employees came to his ranch to repair the binder, his grain was too ripe to cut with a binder; that it is necessary to cut grain with a binder before it is near so ripe; that this must be done long before it may properly be harvested with a harvester; that, if you try to cut grain with a binder after it is overripe, the binder does not work well, you cannot do much with it, and the grain shatters out; but that, if you cut it with a binder at the right stage, it can be handled by the machine with little waste and the grain is all of good quality. Appellant's son testified that he was present when respondent's employees visited the ranch, and that at that time, it was too late to harvest this grain with a binder. This evidence is uncontradicted, so far as shown by the record. However, the respondent argues that the court could take judicial notice of the fact that a wheat harvest in Kings county, in an ordinary year, begins some time between June 15 and July 1, and that it practically never commences before June 1. In support thereof it cites Haines v. Snedigar, 110 Cal. 18, 42 P. 462, 464. In that case the opinion states that the court could take judicial notice of the fact that in San Joaquin county, "the time for harvesting of small grain has arrived on the 11th of July." Not only do we find no evidence in this record to show that the grain growing upon appellant's ranch was wheat, rather than some other variety of grain, but there is a wide difference between taking judicial notice that a general harvesting season for small grain has arrived by the 11th of July, and taking judicial notice that on a certain day in May, it is not too late for a particular method of harvesting a certain grain, the variety of which is unknown to the court. In addition to all other considerations, the degree of ripeness of grain on a specific day would vary in different seasons, even though the season be considered ordinary, and there is no evidence here that this was an ordinary season. Under the circumstances here presented, the doctrine of judicial notice may not be invoked to contradict the direct evidence upon the fact. Upon the record before us, it must be held that the finding in question is not supported by the evidence.

[4] Respondent further contends that May 10, 1927, was a reasonable time within which to offer to repair the machinery because of the letter of January 13, 1927, asking for a few weeks' advance notice, and that respondent was entitled to wait, relying upon the appellant to give such notice before he was ready. While it would appear that appellant might well have complied with this request, we know of no rule of law that compelled him to do so, or that permitted respondent to delay in the belief that he would.

A number of other points are raised, which require no consideration. The entire controversy turns on whether respondent's attempt to repair the binder was made within a reasonable time. While no legal obligation rested upon the appellant to notify the respondent, as requested, a few weeks ahead of the time when he should need the machine, the fact that he did not do so, with other circumstances, rather indicates that he desired to avoid the contract. Because of this, and the fact that the evidence which is missing from this record may be available to respondent, we think the case should be retried.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiff sought to recover damages for an injury sustained when bitten by a dog belonging to defendants. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and, from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Plaintiff alleged in her complaint that the dog was of "vicious disposition and dangerous character, and evilly disposed toward human beings and other dogs, and accustomed to attack them without provocation, all of which matters were well known to defendants." The court found that the dog was of a "mischievous disposition and of a dangerous character, and evilly disposed toward other dogs and accustomed to attack them, all of which matters were well known to defendants." No finding was made relating to any propensity on the part of the dog to bite or attack human beings. Appellants contend that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings and judgment, and in our opinion this contention must be sustained.

It appeared that the dog had been owned by appellants for six years. There was no evidence to show that prior to the day in question the dog had ever bitten or attacked or attempted to bite or attack anyone. Appellants testified that their dog had engaged in a few fights or tussles with other dogs, but it did not appear that he had ever bitten or injured any other dog. Although permitted to run at large and to mingle with adults, children, and animals, it was not shown that the dog had ever done any harm or that any complaint had ever been made concerning his actions. On the occasion in question the dog was barking at respondent's dogs and the injury was received when respondent picked up her two small dogs to carry them away.

[1-3] The well-settled rule relating to the liability of the owner of a dog is stated in 2 California Jurisprudence, page 73, as follows: "In an action to recover damages resulting from the biting by a dog, it is necessary to prove: (1) that the dog bit the plaintiff; (2) that the dog was vicious and accustomed to bite people; (3) that this fact was known to the defendant, and (4) that the dog was harbored or kept by the defendant." Smith v. Royer, 181 Cal. 165, 183 P. 660; Halminska v. Kobler, 100 Cal. App. 598, 280 P. 699. In our opinion the evidence in the present case was insufficient to show knowledge that the dog had previously exhibited any vicious propensities toward either human beings or other animals. As there was no evidence whatever showing any vicious propensities toward human beings, the trial court omitted all reference thereto in its findings. Even assuming that evidence of knowledge of a few fights or tussles over a period of years was sufficient to charge the owner with knowledge that the dog was possessed of vicious propensities toward other dogs, liability for injury to a person may not be predicated on such knowledge. 3 Corp. Jur. 120, and cases cited.

In effect, respondent urges the abandonment of what is termed the "time worn" doctrine, "that every dog is entitled to his first bite before he becomes a biting dog." 2 Cal. Jur. 74. Although this may not be an entirely accurate statement of the existing rule, the law of this state has never imposed liability upon the owner of a dog for injuries inflicted upon other persons in the absence of a showing of knowledge on the part of the owner that the dog possessed such vicious propensities. As a matter of policy it may well be argued that under present-day conditions, an absolute liability without regard to knowledge should be imposed upon the owner of a dog for injuries to others especially in cases where the dog is permitted to run at large. However, this is a matter of legislative concern. The Legislature has heretofore adopted a rule of absolute liability covering cases where dogs inflict injuries upon sheep, angora goats, cashmere goats, and poultry. Civ. Code, § 3341. Equal solicitude might be shown by the Legislature for the welfare and protection of human beings if this situation were called to its attention. Until such time as the Legislature acts, we find no justification for departing from the well-settled law of this state on the subject.

The judgment is reversed.

BARNARD, P. J.

The defendant was convicted by a jury of assault with intent to commit rape, and from the judgment which followed this appeal is taken.

At 8:30 p. m. on the evening of September 11, 1930, Miss C. E. Ruttinger left a prayer meeting in Riverside, Cal., and, after walking three or four blocks to her home, stopped to do some watering in and about her garden before she entered the house. During the time she was watering she went into the house for the purpose of making a telephone call, and at that time turned on a dome light in the hallway of the second story of her home. Leaving this light burning, she returned to her watering, and at 9:15 again entered the house. She went into a kitchen on the second floor, where she turned on a light, lit the gas, and put on a teakettle. She then passed along the hallway, where the light had been left burning, and, as she arrived at the doorway to her bedroom, she saw a man standing just inside the door. She asked him what he was doing in her house; he did not reply but reached forward, caught her by the throat, and threw her on a bed in the room. She fought as much as she could, and tried to scream, but could make very little noise, as he held his hand over her mouth. Her glasses were broken and her lips and arms were scratched and cut. She testified that her assailant kept moving his hands, which resulted in getting blood all over her clothes. She tried to pull his hands away and tore a number of buttons from his shirt. He held one of her legs down with his knee or leg. She got her other knee up and was kicking him when he got one knee into her stomach and crushed her so she could not breathe, and at that point he let go of her and ran. She got up and tried to turn the light on, but found that the globe had been unscrewed in its socket so that it would not light. She then went out on a balcony and shouted for help, her shouts bringing a number of the neighbors. A man's coat was later found at the foot of the bed in the bedroom.

[1] The appellant first contends that the evidence is not sufficient to show that this assailant was a man. The prosecuting witness testified a number of times that it was a man who attacked her; that she did not see his face because of the darkness, but that he had on a white shirt unbuttoned at the throat, and dark trousers, and that his neck and arms were brown. Mr. and Mrs. Herrick, who live about 200 feet from Miss Ruttinger's home, testified that they heard her scream for help while they were standing in the front yard of their home. Just after they heard these screams they saw a man running rapidly away from the position of Miss Ruttinger's house, and, as he ran up the street, he passed within a few feet of them. They testified that he had on dark trousers, and a white or light shirt which was torn, loose, and hanging outside of his trousers. This evidence, with the presence of the defendant in the courtroom, and the other evidence identifying him as the assailant, is sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury in this regard.

[2] It is next urged that the evidence is not sufficient to establish the identity of the appellant as the assailant in question. The Herricks, in addition to their testimony above referred to, testified that through the aid of a nearby street light they took a good look at the running man as he passed, and, while they were unwilling to swear positively that the defendant was the same man, they both stated that they were almost positive of this fact. Some torn and bloody underwear was found at appellant's residence which he admitted was his. A light shirt torn and bloody, and which he admitted to be his, was found in his landlady's washing. Appellant's trousers matched the coat found in the bedroom. While he admitted ownership of the coat, and professed ignorance of how it got in the bedroom, his explanation of how he lost it is little short of ridiculous. A railing on the porch of Miss Ruttinger's home had been newly painted that afternoon, and in the fresh paint were found imprints of a man's fingers. The appellant's finger prints were taken by the officers and an enlargement of these, together with an enlargement of the finger prints on the porch railing, were introduced in evidence, and an expert along that line testified that the finger prints on the porch railing were those of the appellant. The finding of the jury that the appellant was the assailant, is amply sustained by the evidence.

[3] In connection with the finger prints referred to, appellant urges that the evidence of his finger prints was improperly admitted, being in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of the state of California and the Constitution of the United States, to the effect that no person shall be compelled, in a criminal case, to be a witness against himself. It is his theory that a defendant can no more be compelled to submit his body for examination to secure evidence against him, than he can be compelled to submit his mental faculties to such an examination, and that finger prints are therefore in the same category as oral testimony. There is no evidence that appellant's finger prints were taken by force, or that he made any objection to the taking of the same. Objection is not here made to the taking of such finger prints, but to their introduction in evidence. Appellant relies upon the case of People v. Hevern, 127 Misc. Rep. 141, 215 N. Y. S. 412. In that case the court was passing upon the constitutionality of a law which required the taking of the finger prints of an arrested person before admitting such person to bail. In People v. Sallow, 100 Misc. Rep. 447, 165 N. Y. S. 915, 924, the question of the admissibility of the finger prints of a defendant, as evidence in a criminal case, is fully and ably discussed. A number of quotations from this decision follow:

"It has always, at common law and in the practice prevailing under the Constitution and laws of our state, been permissible to put in evidence for the purpose of identification of the defendant, testimony as to his personal appearance, his hair, his eyes, his complexion, marks, scars, teeth, his hands, and the like. Finger prints are but the tracings of physical characteristics or the lines upon the fingers."

"No volition—that is, no act of willing—on the part of the mind of the defendant is required. Finger prints of an unconscious person, or even of a dead person are as accurate as are those of the living. * * * By the requirement that the defendant's finger prints be taken there is no danger that the defendant will be required to give false testimony. The witness does not testify. The physical facts speak for themselves; no fears, no hopes, no will of the prisoner to falsify or to exaggerate could produce or create a resemblance of her finger prints or change them in one line, and therefore there is no danger of error being committed or untruth told. The taking of finger prints is not a violation of the spirit or purpose of the constitutional inhibition."

"The admission in evidence of the fact that certain conditions exist, which fact has been ascertained by a reasonable examination of the defendant, that requires no torture for its ascertainment and no act of volition on the part of the defendant, is not a violation of the defendant's constitutional privilege."

"The proof was not the defendant's proof. She was not called as a witness. It was proof by a competent witness, based upon the record of this examination of the defendant. The constitutional inhibition, in my opinion, has reference to testimonial utterances by the defendant, and may not be used to prevent the establishment of the truth as to the existence or nonexistence of certain marks of identity upon the defendant's fingers."

While our attention has been called to no California cases upon this point, the introduction of such evidence is supported, not only by long established usage, but, in our opinion, by the better reasoning. As pointed out in the case just referred to, such evidence is not the evidence of the defendant, but is the evidence of a competent witness, and, while it is based upon an examination of the defendant, it is no more inadmissible than would be the testimony of one who testified to the existence of a scar.

[4] Appellant's principal contention is that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the assailant of Miss Ruttinger intended to commit rape upon her. It is argued that there is no evidence to indicate that the assailant in this case had any intent other than to escape, and that the evidence shows that he fled as soon as he could release himself from the hold of the prosecuting witness. Reliance is placed upon such cases as People v. Moore, 155 Cal. 237, 100 P. 688, 690, People v. Fleming, 94 Cal. 308, 29 P. 647, and People v. Norrington, 55 Cal. App. 103, 202 P. 932. Without reviewing all of the cases cited, these cases and others like them, considered most favorably to this appellant, merely hold that, where the evidence tends to show that a defendant did not intend to use the requisite force to accomplish his purpose, but where it rather shows that he did not at any time intend to use such a degree of force, the evidence is not sufficient to sustain a conviction. For example, in the case of People v. Fleming, supra, which is especially relied upon by appellant, the court remarks that the evidence in that case preponderated to the effect that the accused depended for success in his efforts upon his own solicitations and blandishments, and further says that it appeared from the evidence that physical force was not an element in the defendant's mind in attempting to carry out his intention. In People v. Moore, supra, in discussing cases of this kind where verdicts have been set aside upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence upon the point in question, the court says: "The principle underlying those decisions is that a charge so easily fabricated should not be sustained upon the sole testimony of the prosecutrix, where it is not only uncorroborated, but is contradicted by the surrounding circumstances. It has no application to a case like this, in which all the outward facts are clearly established, and the only question is what the defendant intended." In the same case the court also said: "In all such cases the intent with which an assault is committed is a fact which can only be inferred from the outward act and the surrounding circumstances. It is, in other words, a question of fact for the jury, and not a question of law for the court, except in a case where the facts proven afford no reasonable ground for the inference drawn."

In People v. Estrada, 53 Cal. 600, the court said: "The question as to the intent with which the assault was committed is a question of fact; and if there was evidence tending to prove that the intent was as alleged in the indictment, the verdict will not be set aside on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict."

We are unable to say from the evidence in the instant case that there is no reasonable ground from which the jury could draw the inference that the assailant intended to commit rape, and intended to use all requisite force to accomplish that purpose. The evidence and the surrounding circumstances are susceptible of that inference, and it is therefore a question of fact for the jury. This assailant apparently had every opportunity to know that the prosecuting witness was around her premises, that she was alone, and that she could reasonably be expected to come in soon. Some preparation was shown. Although the evidence shows without conflict that it was a chilly night, the assailant had removed his coat, unscrewed the electric light bulb in its socket so that it could not be turned on in the usual manner, and waited in the darkness just inside the bedroom. He grabbed the prosecuting witness as she entered, and made particular efforts to stop her from screaming, threw her upon the bed, held one of her legs down with one of his legs, and got upon her sufficiently to put the other knee upon her stomach. In our opinion these facts are sufficient to justify the submission to the jury of the question of the intent of the defendant. People v. Mit Singh, 59 Cal. App. 64, 209 P. 1013. The intention found by the jury not only appears a most natural and reasonable one, but under the circumstances existing it is rather difficult to imagine any other. The appellant argues that it would be more reasonable to assume that he was committing burglary, that at all times after the appearance of Miss Ruttinger he was attempting to get away, and that he fled as soon as he was able to escape from her clutches. Even if that were the more reasonable view, it would only be one of two conflicting inferences, and is not one that the jury was bound to draw. However, we cannot agree that it is the more reasonable. If his object was burglary, no reason appears for his taking off his coat on this chilly night. Nothing in the house was disturbed, although a pocketbook lay on a table and another on a dresser. If his only object was to escape, he had ample chance while she was engaged in the kitchen, or he could easily have rushed past her in the hall, surprised as she would have been. Or by waiting in the dark bedroom while she went to the center of the room to attempt to turn on the light, which he knew she could not readily do, he would have had a wonderful opportunity for flight. The evidence shows that she did not hold him, but that he held her, and that, instead of trying to restrain him, she was trying her best to release herself from him. Instead of trying to escape, the evidence shows his principal effort was directed toward keeping her from screaming, and holding her down, and that he continued to hold her down in spite of her fighting to release his hands from her body. Appellant argues that he might have accidentally fallen upon the bed in his effort to get away, but the position he assumed and the general circumstances shown justified the jury in reaching a different conclusion.

[5] Appellant further contends that the prosecuting witness was finally overpowered, and that the fact that her assailant then fled, after she was entirely within his power, shows that he had no such intention as that charged. In this regard we are again cited to People v. Fleming, supra. That was a case where the defendant never intended to use force, but the prosecuting witness had become exhausted by long and continued solicitations and blandishments, and had finally ceased to refuse and oppose the defendant's solicitations. And the court points out that the fact that the defendant then ceased his attempts, and the further fact that he did not flee, were important facts in showing what had been his intention. In the instant case we have a different situation. A careful reading of the entire evidence plainly shows that the prosecuting witness was not completely exhausted and was not completely in the power of her assailant, but that, long before she became exhausted from fighting, she was prevented from breathing by the knee in her stomach and the hand on her throat. Nothing appears to indicate that this was more than temporary, nor that her ability to fight would not have been restored had he changed his position to accomplish his purpose. She was fully able to get up, attempt to turn on the light, unlatch the door, walk to a balcony, and call for help, as soon as he released her. The fact that he released her and ran indicates that something happened to scare him away, rather than that his entire purpose had been to escape. In any event, the facts were sufficient to go to the jury. If the appellant at any time had the intent charged, but abandoned it, this fact does not free him from the legal consequences of his act. People v. Stewart, 97 Cal. 238, 32 P. 8; People v. Bowman, 6 Cal. App. 749, 93 P. 198. The contention that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict of the jury is without merit.

[6] Appellant complains of the following instruction given to the jury by the court: "Rape, embraces assault with intent to commit rape, also assault. Also embraced within the offense charged in the indictment are two other offenses, viz: 'Assault with intent to commit rape' and 'assault', sometimes called simple assault. An assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability to commit a violent injury on the person of another."

However, appellant admits that in other instructions the jury were told correctly what the charge was. As we understand the objection to this instruction, it is that it told the jury that the defendant could be convicted either of assault with intent to commit rape, or of simple assault, and the argument is made that the evidence will support a conviction of nothing more than simple assault. This objection is without merit, and the jury were properly instructed that the offense charged included both assault with intent to commit rape and assault. It does not clearly appear that appellant objects to the use of the word "other" in this instruction. This word, as used in the instruction, has no meaning, and should not have been included. However, we fail to see where it could have done any harm, and, as appellant himself points out, any possible error was cured by the other instructions.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: MARKS, J.; JENNINGS, J.

112 Cal. App. 117

PEOPLE v. MYRICK.

Cr. 1145.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 20, 1931.

1. Indictment and Information ⟜91(1).

Information, charging grand theft by feloniously taking property, held sufficient, though first count omitted word "unlawfully" (Pen. Code, § 952, as amended by St. 1929, p. 303).

The first count of the information accused defendant of grand theft, committed by wrongfully, willfully, and feloniously taking a cow belonging to a named company, while the second count accused him of the same crime, committed by wrongfully, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously taking an automobile belonging to a named person. Pen. Code, § 952, as amended by St. 1929, p. 303, declares a count sufficient, if it contains in substance statement that accused has committed some public offense therein specified, and provides that in charging theft it shall be sufficient to allege that defendant unlawfully took the labor or property of another.

2. Criminal law ⚿1130(2)

Where transcript pages are not referred to in brief, nor assigned errors stated in substance or alleged form, appellate court need not search record therefor.

3. Larceny ⚿68(1)

Whether cattle sold by defendant, who assigned interest in contract for automobile, were those purchased by him on conditional contract, held for jury in trial for grand theft (Pen. Code, § 484).

4. Larceny ⚿65.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for grand theft of cow and automobile (Pen. Code, § 484).

5. Larceny ⚿70(1).

Instruction to convict of grand theft, if defendant took cow with intent to deprive owner thereof, held erroneous (Pen. Code, § 484).

6. Criminal law ⚿1186(4).

Instruction to convict of grand theft, if defendant took cow with intent to deprive owner thereof, held not reversible error, in view of preliminary instructions (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In the preliminary instructions, the court set forth the counts of the information and stated that defendant's plea of not guilty put in issue every material allegation thereof and that it devolved on the prosecution to establish defendant's guilt of crimes charged beyond reasonable doubt.

7. Criminal law ⚿1186(4).

Judgment will not be reversed for errors in instructions which could not have prejudiced defendant, did not affect result, or were cured by evidence, other instructions, or verdict (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Joseph Myrick was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

C. I. Bennington, of Oroville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J

The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction based upon two counts in an information, which counts are in the following words and figures, to wit:

"Count I. In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the county of Butte, the 28th day of July, 1930. The said Joseph Myrick is accused by the district attorney of Butte county, by this information, found this 28th day of July, 1930, of the crime of grand theft, a felony, committed as follows: The said Joseph Myrick did on or about the 1st day of October, 1929, at Butte county, and State of California, and before the filing of this information wrongfully, wilfully and feloniously take one Jersey cow branded BS on the right shoulder and with ear tag with No. 4 on the right ear. Said Jersey cow then and there being the property of the Pacific Finance Company of Los Angeles, contrary to the form, force and effect of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of The People of the State of California.

"Count II. In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the county of Butte, the 28th day of July, 1930. The said Joseph Myrick is accused by the district attorney of Butte county, by this information, found this 28th day of July, 1930, of the crime of grand theft, a felony committed as follows: The said Joseph Myrick did, on or about the 5th day of April, 1930, at Butte county, and State of California, and before the filing of this information, wrongfully, wilfully, unlawfully and feloniously take certain personal property of Victor G. Strain, consisting of one 1930 Buick sedan automobile, engine number 2483927, 1930 license No. 2D9210, of the value of $1,100.00, contrary to the form, force and effect of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of The People of the State of California."

The information contained three counts, but as the defendant was acquitted on the third count, no attention need be given thereto.

[1] The first contention by the appellant is to the effect that neither count 1 nor count 2 of the information charges a public offense. As no demurrer was filed by the appellant, only the bare question as to whether a public offense is stated can be considered. While neither count does state fully all the particulars set forth in section 484 of the Penal Code, relative to grand theft and the offenses included under that designation, we think, in the absence of a demurrer, the counts are good. Each count charges the defendant with grand theft, a felony, and then particularizes the acts upon which the crime of theft is based without again alleging that the acts themselves constitute the crime of grand theft. Under section 952 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 303), no particular words are necessary. That section reads: "In charging an offense, each count shall contain, and shall be sufficient if it contains in substance, a statement that the accused has committed some public offense therein specified. * * * In charging theft it shall be sufficient to allege that the defendant unlawfully took the labor or property of another."

The first count charges that the defendant wrongfully, willfully, and feloniously took the property of another. The second count charges that the defendant wrongfully, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously took the property of another. Thus, the second count uses all the words necessary to comply with the provisions of section 952 of the Penal Code, and while the word "unlawfully" does not appear in the first count, it does charge the defendant with willfully and feloniously and wrongfully taking the property of another, which fully advised the defendant as to the offense with which he was charged. Very similar informations have been upheld by this court. People v. Campbell, 89 Cal. App. 646, 265 P. 364; People v. Plum, 88 Cal. App. 575, 263 P. 862, 265 P. 322.

[2] A long list of assignments of error is set forth in the appellant's brief, but as the pages of the transcript are not referred to in many instances, and the alleged errors are not set forth either in substance or in the form in which the errors are alleged to have taken place, we do not feel that we are called upon to search through a record of some 500 pages to ascertain whether the assertions of the appellant's brief are or are not well founded. It has been frequently held that where an appellant sets forth no part of the record, and does not refer to the pages of the record to support his contentions, the court will not burden itself with an examination of the record to ascertain if error has been committed.

In the case of People v. Clark, 183 Cal. 677, 192 P. 521, quoting from pages 686 and 687 (192 P. 521, 525), we find the following: "Appellant's third assignment of error is to 'all of the rulings of the court overruling the objections of his counsel, or sustaining the objections of the district attorney, * * * together with the giving of the instructions as they appear in the record.' No portions of the record are referred to or quoted, no authorities are cited or discussed, and, indeed, appellant does not specify wherein the court erred in the giving of the instructions or in the rulings on the evidence. We do not feel called upon to consider points so presented." Citing Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 108 P. 278; Dore v. Southern Pacific Co., 163 Cal. 182, 124 P. 817; Born v. Castle, 175 Cal. 680, 167 P. 138; Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 181 Cal. 345, 184 P. 672, 12 A. L. R. 1007. See, also, People v. Lloyd, 97 Cal. App. 664, 275 P. 1010.

In People v. Morales, 77 Cal. App. 483, 247 P. 221, 222, in considering assignments of error such as we have presented in the instant case, this court, speaking through Justice Hart said: "The appellate courts are not supposed to perform the work of counsel who present cases thereto for review. The rule thus stated and to which the appellate courts of this state almost uniformly adhere is explained as follows in People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, 309, 67 P. 770, 771: 'We again repeat what we have said before that we will not examine alleged errors presented in this way. It is due to this court from the members of the bar to point out clearly and concisely the rulings complained of as erroneous and the reasons why they are so, with reference to authorities, if any. In case counsel will not take the trouble to do so, we shall deem the matter as of not sufficient importance to merit notice in an opinion.' " (Citing a number of authorities.)

In the instances where the pages of the transcript are referred to, no reasons are presented showing why such alleged errors are prejudicial. We will cite a few instances: "The court erred further in his remarks before the jury on pages 275 and 276 of the testimony transcribed, to show what money was paid to the defendant." And, further: "It is not competent for the prosecution to prove the commission of independent crimes committed by defendant, the evidence of which has no tendency to prove some material fact in connection with the offense charged." Our attention has not been called to any portion of the transcript where such testimony was admitted, nor has anything been set forth to show, if such testimony was admitted, that it was not competent to prove some issue in the case. The specifications of error, in the argument of counsel, do call our attention to alleged erroneous instructions given to the jury, which we will consider after first stating the substance of what the testimony shows.

[3, 4] The record shows that the defendant and a man by the name of Allen were engaged in dealing in cattle; that some time prior to October, 1929, E. A. Allen of Chico entered into a conditional sales contract with the defendant for the sale of some 30 or 40 head of cattle. Upon this contract the defendant made a small cash payment. The contract provided that Allen was to retain title to the cattle until they were all paid for. Title to the cattle in question never passed from Allen to the defendant. After the defendant obtained possession of the cattle included within the conditional sales contract, he sold one cow to a man by the name of S. S. Peters of Gridley, who paid him therefor the sum of $100. This is in substance what is included in the testimony relative to the first count. Thereafter, the record shows that the defendant sold, on a conditional contract of sale, to one Ramsey, 10 head of the cattle he had obtained from E. A. Allen; that the defendant represented to Ramsey that he owned the cattle. A conditional sales contract was entered into between the defendant and Ramsey, whereby Ramsey agreed to pay the defendant a certain sum of money for said cattle, the balance remaining unpaid on the contract being the sum of about $1,100. The record shows that some time before the contract of sale and purchase of the cattle in question was entered into between the defendant and Ramsey, Mrs. Myrick, the wife of the defendant, had purchased from a man by the name of Strain a Buick automobile, upon which there was still owing the sum of $1,100. After the execution of the conditional contract of sale for the cattle just referred to, the defendant assigned his interest in the contract to Strain, in full payment of the balance due upon the automobile, and obtained the "pink slip" therefor. Shortly after these occurrences, the defendant left the county of Butte, and was thereafter apprehended in the state of Oklahoma. The testimony introduced on the part of the people was to the effect that Myrick had no title to the property; that his sale thereof was fraudulent; and that by reason of these transactions he obtained possession of the title to the Buick automobile. In addition to what we have stated, the testimony shows that the defendant was loaned the sum of $800 to plant certain crops, and that the money loaned was not used for that purpose, the defendant and his wife having departed from the county of Butte shortly after obtaining title to the automobile and the $800 referred to.

On the part of the defendant considerable testimony was introduced relative to the transactions had between E. A. Allen and the defendant, to the effect that the 10 head of cattle mentioned and included in the contract of sale executed between the defendant and Ramsey, were not any of the cattle included in the conditional contract of sale entered into between Allen and the defendant. On the part of the prosecution, again, there was testimony introduced to the effect that they were the same cattle, description and markings being testified to. This, of course, was a question of fact for the jury. It is sufficient to say that a resume of the testimony shows that if the jury believed the testimony introduced on the part of the people, it is amply sufficient to remove all reasonable doubt as to the defendant's guilt. With this in view we will now consider the two instructions alleged to be erroneous.

[5] One instruction relates to count No. 1, and one instruction relates to count No. 2. The setting forth of the instruction relative to count No. 1 will be sufficient, as the instruction as to count No. 2 is subject to the same objections. The instruction as to count No. 1 reads: "If you believe from the evidence solely produced here in the court room before you, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that on or about the 1st day of October, 1929, at Butte county, and State of California, and before the filing of this information that the defendant Joseph Myrick did take one Jersey cow branded BS on the right shoulder, and with ear tag number 4 on the right ear, and convert the same to his own use, and that said Jersey cow was then and there the property of the Pacific Finance Company of Los Angeles, and with the intent then and there to deprive the alleged owner of its property, then you should find the defendant guilty of the charge alleged and made against him in count 1 of the information. Otherwise, you will find him not guilty as to the charge made in said count." It requires no argument to show that this instruction is erroneous, and should not have been given in the language in which it is couched. By its terms it would permit the finding of the defendant guilty upon acts not constituting a criminal offense. The instruction given in relation to count No. 2 is likewise as unquestionably erroneous.

[6] Following these instructions, however, the court did read to the jury a portion of section 484 of the Penal Code, to wit: "Every person who shall feloniously steal, take, carry, lead, or drive away the personal property of another, or who shall fraudulently appropriate property which has been entrusted to him, or shall knowingly and designedly, by any false or fraudulent representation or pretense, defraud any other person of money, labor, or real or personal property, * * * is guilty of theft."

In the preliminary instructions given to the jury the court set forth counts 1 and 2, and then said: "To this information, upon his arraignment in this court, the defendant entered a plea of not guilty to each of said counts, which plea puts in issue every material allegation of the information and charge, and it devolves upon the prosecution to establish to your satisfaction, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he, the defendant, is guilty of the crimes, or of any one of them, charged against him in the information." From this we conclude that the jury, as reasonable men, would understand, and did understand, that the defendant was charged with grand theft, and that grand theft meant willfully and feloniously depriving another of his property, and that the acts must be so performed as to constitute a felony, before the defendant could be found guilty, and not that the simple taking of property belonging to another constituted the crime of grand theft. Under such circumstances, section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution is applicable, where it provides that no new trial shall be granted on the grounds of misdirection of the jury, unless the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

[7] The text found in 8 California Jurisprudence, p. 628, we think states the rule that should govern our decision here. We quote as follows: "While formerly an erroneous instruction was presumed to be injurious unless the contrary clearly appeared, under the present state of the California law a judgment will not be reversed because of an error in misdirecting the jury, unless in the opinion of the appellate court, after an examination of the entire case, the error resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Hence, a judgment will not be reversed because of an error in instructions if the error can in no way prejudice the rights of the defendant, if it appears that the result would have been the same if the erroneous instruction had not been given, or if the error was cured by the evidence, or by other instructions, or by the verdict. Instructions which are calculated to mislead the jury under the circumstances of the case are erroneous and require a reversal, if they result in a miscarriage of justice. But mere uncertainty or lack of perspicuity which cannot have the effect of misleading the jury will not authorize a reversal, especially when the uncertainty is removed by other instructions."

As we have stated, a review of the testimony leads to the conclusion that the jury was not misled to the prejudice of the appellant. We may here state that we have read the entire transcript, notwithstanding that under the circumstances we were not required to do so, and have found nothing which would justify a reversal of the judgment, nor do we find anything that requires further special consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

112 Cal. App. 125

KAST v. DUBUQUE FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. OF DUBUQUE, IOWA, et al.

Civ. 4149.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 20, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1).

Findings of trial court on conflicting evidence are conclusive.

2. Insurance ⚷246.

Evidence held to support finding that there was cancellation of fire policy by consent of parties (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3735, p. 1354, § 1).

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by C. S. Kast against the Dubuque Fire & Marine Insurance Company of Dubuque, Iowa, and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Dennett & Zion, of Modesto, for appellant.

Redman, Alexander & Bacon, of San Francisco, and Griffin & Boone, of Modesto, for respondents.

Justice pro tem. McDANIEL delivered the opinion of the court.

This action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants to recover upon a certain policy of fire insurance. Judgment was against the plaintiff and appellant and in favor of the defendants and respondents. After judgment a motion for a new trial was made by the plaintiff on the grounds: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision of the court; (2) that the decision is against law; and (3) on account of errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the plaintiff. The motion for a new trial in due course was denied by the court, and the only issue upon this appeal is the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and judgment of the trial court.

According to the complaint summarized, the plaintiff on the 17th day of April, 1927, was the owner of a certain frame hotel building situate in the town of Chowchilla, Cal., which building on the 4th day of August, 1927, was destroyed by fire; the value of the building was alleged to be $12,000; at the time of the fire and destruction of said property, it was subject to the lien of a deed of trust in favor of the San Francisco Building & Loan Association, but since said date said obligation has been paid; on the 17th day of April, 1927, the defendants issued to plaintiff the policy of insurance against loss by fire, in the form known as "California Standard Form Fire Insurance Policy," that form being as prescribed by the law of California; the policy, by its terms, recited that the loss, if any, shall be payable to San Francisco Building & Loan Association, "mortgagee"; the said last-named building and loan association having been paid in full since said fire, the plaintiff is entitled to the proceeds of said policy, which was averred to be in full force and effect on the date of the fire; all of the proofs of loss, etc., have been duly made by the plaintiff; plaintiff prays for judgment against the defendants for the sum of $3,000, interest and costs.

The issue presented by the answer, which admits the issuance of the policy of insurance on the 17th day of April, 1927, is that the said policy of insurance had been duly canceled at the request of the plaintiff; that defendant had been informed by the plaintiff at the time he requested cancellation of the policy that he intended to obtain other fire insurance in the same amount in another insurance company, and had done so by procuring from the American & Foreign Insurance Company insurance against loss by fire for the period of one year, in the sum of $3,000, covering the said property referred to in the complaint, which said last-named policy was in full force and effect at the time of said fire, and has since been paid by said American & Foreign Insurance Company to said plaintiff, by payment of the sum of $2,900, in satisfaction of all claims against it, arising out of said loss. Defendants deny that on August 4, 1927, the policy sued upon was in force and effect, but aver, as before stated, it had been canceled.

We have examined with care the evidence, and are satisfied the judgment of the court below must be upheld, for the reason that, by a preponderance thereof and without contradiction other than the contradictions found in the testimony of the plaintiff himself, it supports the judgment.

The facts, summarized chronologically as nearly as may be, are as follows:

For the year preceding April 17, 1927, the property was covered by a policy of insurance for $3,000, issued by the respondent. It expired on said date. It had been obtained for plaintiff by the company's local agent at Modesto, one William Falger, who was the local agent of the Pacific Coast agency, the general coast agent of the respondent companies. The plaintiff made no request of Falger for a renewal of this first policy upon its expiration, nor did Falger solicit the renewal, for the simple reason, he said, that Mr. Kast was in the hospital at San Francisco, and "I learned from parties from Modesto that his son was writing insurance. * * *" The policy was renewed, however, at the request of the secretary of the San Francisco Building & Loan Association, Mr. Steinbaugh, who, by letter dated April 16, 1927, addressed to plaintiff, notified him of the renewal, giving the number of the policy, the name of the company, the amount of the insurance, $3,000, and the premium of $135 for one year. On April 28, 1927, either the appellant or his son (who attended, as agent, to the business of his father in the latter's absence) wrote and mailed a letter to the loan association of San Francisco, concerning said policy. A copy of this letter, dated April 28, 1927, is not in evidence. Its contents, however, are indicated by the testimony of Steinbaugh, when considered with the statements in his letter of reply to Kast, which letter he wrote on May 2, 1927. It appears from that reply and from Steinbaugh's testimony that appellant was figuring on other insurance, and on handling the insurance matter himself, rather than to have the association do so, and did not wish to keep in force the policy now in question. Steinbaugh's letter to appellant follows: "Your valued favor of the 28th ulto., in regard to the fire insurance policy on the Chowchilla Hotel is at hand and contents appreciated. Regret that you are late in getting a new policy, as the old policy expired on April 17th. Same was renewed in the Reserve Underwriters for $3,000.00, premium $135.00 for one year, policy number 57,632, Pacific Coast Agency Company, Ltd., 60-Sansome Street, San Francisco, California. There might have been a serious loss, if we had not kept the insurance in force. Any arrangement you may make with the Pacific Coast Agency, provided we are protected, is all right with us. Regretting that you did not take this up 30 days ago, and hoping it will be adjusted to our mutual protection and satisfaction. With kind regards, we remain, Yours respectfully, San Francisco Building & Loan Ass'n, D. A. Steinbaugh, Secretary."

Steinbaugh, referring to the April 28, 1927, letter from appellant, testified as follows: "Q. Now will you state again what your recollection is as to the contents of that letter that you received from Mr. Kast? A. Just what this implies, that he was figuring on other insurance or handling the matter himself rather than us and he wanted to handle it rather than us—here is the idea—this will clear up the situation—he had been practically acting as agent for himself in that and other companies and he got the original Reserve policy and I renewed it—now the question was whether he was going to arrange to pay it down there or arrange for the commission, or whether we were going to get it, or whether he would pay it here—that seemed to be the line I was working on."

On the 29th day of April the appellant had made application through one Griffin, an insurance agent at Sacramento, from whom appellant's son, C. H. Kast, expected an appointment as an insurance agent, for a $3,000 policy in the American & Foreign Insurance Company, covering the same Chowchilla property. This policy was issued by the American & Foreign Company and duly sent to the San Francisco Building & Loan Association, the same being the policy to take the place of respondents' policy as security for Kast's indebtedness to the association.

On or about July 10th the plaintiff went to see Falger, the local agent of the respondent companies at Modesto, with whom he had a conversation concerning the policy here in question. The appellant states: "I asked Mr. Falger if he had renewed the policy. He said 'No,' and I told him that Mr. Steinbaugh wrote to me that he took out a policy for $3,000.00, and that my boy was in the insurance business now, and if he had a policy, I would want him to cancel it if he had rewritten it, and if he had not written it, not to write it, as my boy is in the insurance business, and I would give the boy the commission, and that would be all the insurance I would want to carry on the building."

The witness Falger, with reference to the same occasion, said that the plaintiff said to him: "Mr. Falger, that policy that has been issued, I have ordered it canceled, because my son is now writing insurance and is going to have a policy written and I want him to have the commission."

The court below must have interpreted this conversation as referring to appellant Kast's letter to the San Francisco Building & Loan Association of April 28th. On or about July 15, after having received from the Pacific Coast Agency Company a report of insurance business and outstanding premiums, Falger wrote the respondent company, informing it that "in speaking to Kast he said that this policy had been returned for cancellation, for the reason that one of his sons was now writing life and fire and he had rewritten same."

Falger also directed in the same letter that the premium charged against him for collection on policy number 57,632 of C. S. Kast, premium $135, should not be charged to the Falger account. Immediately after the receipt of that communication the respondent company, through its agent at San Francisco, Mr. George P. Duncan, who had delivered the policy to the San Francisco Building & Loan Association theretofore, made a notation upon the Falger letter, "Not received and should have E. P.," meaning that the policy was not returned to the respondent company, and that it should receive earned premium, i. e., from April 17, 1927, to July 15th or 16th.

Mr. Duncan, when a witness, stated that, upon receipt of the information from Falger, he called up Mr. Steinbaugh on the telephone and read the letter of Falger telling him the policy was canceled as of the date of July 15, 1927. He also informed Steinbaugh that the company was entitled to the earned premium from and after April 17th to date of cancellation. There were several conversations to the same effect with Steinbaugh, who interposed no objection as to the payment of the earned premium, but said "that it would receive attention right away." Steinbaugh failed to pay the premium or to return the canceled policy. Steinbaugh at all times represented both appellant and the San Francisco Building & Loan Association in the insurance transaction. Steinbaugh also informed Duncan, representing the respondent at the time of the conversation, that the association had received another insurance policy to take the place of the canceled policy.

It next appears that on August 9th, five days after the fire, Steinbaugh, acting for appellant C. S. Kast, mailed to respondent companies a check for $135, the total year's premium. This check was never cashed by the respondent companies, but retained in their possession, after notifying the maker that it was too large in amount, as the company had only coming to it the earned premium from April 17th to the date of cancellation on July 15, 1927. It was retained, Duncan testified, only as evidence of the attempt to pay the premium after the property had been burned.

In all of the transactions relating to the fire insurance company it appears that Steinbaugh, secretary of the San Francisco Building & Loan Association, acted for its protection as well as for the appellant. He procured the policy and must be considered appellant's agent in the transaction; he had been informed of appellant's intention to substitute a policy of appellant's own procurement in place of the policy sued upon and had kept appellant duly notified in all matters concerning the business.

The trial court evidently construed all of the foregoing facts, fairly weighed and interpreted, to mean that the policy, at appellant's request, was canceled on July 15, 1927, and as supporting by adequate preponderance the material averments of the complaint.

While it is true that no explicit and direct statement appears in the evidence to have been made by appellant requesting the policy in question to be canceled, the fair inference from all that was said and done by himself and his agents is that he actually did request the cancellation.

[1] The findings of the trial court upon conflicting evidence are conclusive. It is unnecessary to cite any authorities in addition to those used by respondent on this appeal. Migala v. Dakin, 99 Cal. App. 60, 61, 277 P. 898; Mercantile Investment Co. v. How, 99 Cal. App. 182, 186, 278 P. 243; Dellarowe v. Kirchner, 99 Cal. App. 599, 601, 279 P. 210.

[2] It is an admitted fact, alleged in the complaint and not denied, that the standard form of insurance policy was the form of the policy sued upon, and, under the law of California, that standard form contains the provision that the policy "shall be canceled at any time at the request of the insured." 1 Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, p. 1354, Act 3735, § 1. The facts, also, preponderate to support the court's finding that there was cancellation by consent of the parties.

We quote from Westchester Fire Ins. Co.

v. McMinn (Tex. Civ. App. 1916) 188 S. W. 25, 26, as follows: "A policy of insurance may be canceled at any time before loss, by agreement between the parties. And there may be cancellation by consent of the parties, independent of the terms of the policy; and in such case an immediate payment of the unearned premium may not be required in order to make valid the agreed cancellation. As to whether there was an agreement here was a question of fact."

In Stevenson v. Sun Ins. Office, 17 Cal. App. 288, 119 P. 529, 531, the following quotation is applicable and determinative of the instant appeal: "There is no merit in the contention discussed and urged by plaintiff that the contract of insurance in the case at bar cannot be considered as canceled merely because the policy in controversy was not formally and physically surrendered into the possession of the defendant prior to the fire. A contract of insurance must be governed and interpreted by the same rules which ordinarily apply to other contracts, and it will be enforced only according to the manifest intention of the parties. It is a self-evident proposition that a contract of insurance may be as readily rescinded, as it was made, by the mutual agreement of the parties or their authorized representatives; and, while the surrender of a policy of insurance by the insured and its acceptance by the insurer is usually prima facie evidence of cancellation, yet a formal physical surrender is not absolutely necessary to a rescission and cancellation of the contract. The formal surrender and acceptance of the policy is at best a piece of evidence tending to show a cancellation, and, if the fact of rescission is established (as we think it was in this case) by the mutual agreement of the parties, the rescission is as complete and effectual as if the policy had been actually indorsed 'canceled,' and surrendered into the possession of the defendant."

The judgment is affirmed.

EY v. FITTS, Dist. Atty., et al.

Civ. 7266.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 20, 1931.

1. District and prosecuting attorneys ⚷3(1).

District attorney's specifications of reasons for discharging deputy held specific in showing district attorney considered deputy inefficient and out of harmony with administration of office.

> Reasons assigned by district attorney for discharge were incompetency, failure to perform duties, either through inability or neglect, lack of interest in work, and in welfare of those deputy served, failure to obey rules formulated by office, failure to meet standard required by office, and that efficiency and economy required that deputy be relieved from further duty.

2. Mandamus ⚷172.

If discharge of deputy district attorney was effective, question whether office was abolished is immaterial on petition for mandamus to reinstate.

3. Appeal and error ⚷750(1).

Specification of error that good faith in abolishing office must be shown held not specification that finding of good faith of district attorney in making charges was unsupported; hence argument against good faith could be ignored.

4. Appeal and error ⚷231(1).

Particular finding attacked must be specified.

> Such finding must be specified so that adverse party may know what evidence by way of amendments to embody in statement or bill and that trial court's attention may be directed to designated matters.

5. District and prosecuting attorneys ⚷3(1).

District attorney's letter requesting deputy's resignation without reflection upon ability or integrity held not necessarily to show bad faith in subsequent discharge.

> It could not be said that first letter was not open to construction that no charges were made and that it was courteous way of saving embarrassing situation, in view of subsequent letter wherein district attorney stated that he had earnestly sought to avoid embarrassment of discharging deputy from position, but that deputy's failure to respond to request for resignation necessitated formal action discharging him. First letter was purely in negative without affirmation of ability.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James A. Smith, Judge.

Petition by Frank F. Ey for a writ of mandate against Buron R. Fitts, as District Attorney of Los Angeles County, and others. From a judgment denying the writ, petitioner appeals

Affirmed.

Frank F. Ey, of Los Angeles, in pro. per.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard and Fred M. Cross, Deputy Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Earl Warren, Dist. Atty., Frank M. Ogden, Asst. Dist. Atty., and James H. Oakley, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of Oakland, amici curiæ.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

The petitioner sought a writ of mandate in the superior court to compel the respondent Buron Fitts, as district attorney, of Los Angeles county, to reinstate petitioner as a deputy district attorney, the respondent Sam J. Chappel, as secretary of the civil service commission of Los Angeles county, to certify his name to the payroll as a deputy district attorney, and the respondent Payne, as auditor of Los Angeles county, to issue a warrant for petitioner's salary covering the period since January 15, 1929. The writ was denied, and this is an appeal from that judgment.

The appellant contends that this appeal is different from and not governed by the case of Fee v. Fitts (Cal. App.) 291 P. 889. However, the only point presented by him in his opening brief, and we quote it verbatim, is as follows: "The authority to remove an employee in the classified service is vested by the Constitution of the state of California, the charter of the county of Los Angeles and county ordinance No. 929, new series, in the Board of Supervisors only." This argument was directly determined against appellant in the case mentioned, and we can see no useful purpose to be served by a repetition herein of the reasons for our conclusions therein.

In his reply brief, the appellant, in addition to resisting two points raised by the respondents, assigns the following two reasons for a reversal of the judgment: "Purported reasons set forth in the letters of purported discharge served upon petitioner were 'not specifically stated'" and "Good faith in the abolition of an office must be shown."

[1] The first of these is identical with the argument presented in the Fee Case and which was determined adversely to appellant upon the authority of Cronin v. Civil Service Commission, 71 Cal. App. 633, 236 P. 339, 341. Without requoting at length from this last-cited authority, which construed the same rules involved in the instant appeal, it is not inappropriate to call special attention to the following language of the court: "While the commission is given power * * * in this one instance, we fail to find in this regulation of the commission any intention to divest the principal of his general power to remove and discharge deputies and employees whom he considers inefficient or out of harmony with his administration of his office. * * *" The reasons assigned by the respondent Fitts for appellant's discharge are as follows:

"1. Incompetency to perform the duties of deputy district attorney.

"2. Failure to perform the duties of your position, either through inability or neglect.

"3. Lack of interest in your work, and in the welfare of those you serve.

"4. Failure to obey the rules formulated by this office.

"5. Failure to meet the standard required by the present District Attorney's office.

"6. Efficiency and economy require that you be relieved from further duty."

If a hearing were provided for by the civil service regulations, it might be necessary to set forth concrete instances, but it definitely appears from the specifications, and their meaning cannot be doubted, that the district attorney, the respondent Fitts, discharged the appellant because he considered him "inefficient" and "out of harmony with his administration of his office." The charges were specific in these particulars.

[2-4] Turning then to the last assignment, to wit, "that good faith in the abolition of an office must be shown," it is first of all to be observed that, if the discharge of the appellant was effective, we need not concern ourselves with the question whether the office was abolished. It is also to be noted that assignment No. 4 of the specifications of error reads as follows: "The evidence plainly shows that the position occupied by plaintiff and petitioner was not in good faith abolished, but on the contrary, the evidence shows that defendant and respondent Buron R. Fitts attempted to fill the same position by a person other than petitioner on or about the time of his attempted removal." We would therefore be justified in closing our consideration of the question by a statement that the assigned error is not material to a disposition of the cause. In paragraph XV of appellant's complaint he alleged that the charges upon which he was discharged were a mere subterfuge "adopted by the said defendant Fitts for the purpose of avoiding, evading, circumventing and nullifying the provisions and requirements of the civil service law, and for the further and ulterior purpose of creating lucrative positions for his political friends at the public expense; and that none of said charges were made in good faith or in the interest of either efficiency or economy or for any other reason or reasons than above stated." The finding of the court responsive thereto is: "That the allegations contained in paragraph designated XV of the petition herein are not true; except that the court makes no finding with reference to the truth or falsity of the reasons set forth in the letters of December 29, 1928, and of January 3, 1929." The court below very obviously set forth the exception in the above finding on the ruling of the case of Cronin v. Civil Service Commission, supra, to the effect that the rules and regulations did not contemplate a hearing before a principal could discharge a deputy. It is evident that the specification of error to which we have directed attention is not a specification that the finding here quoted is unsupported by the evidence, and hence we are under no necessity of determining the argument advanced by appellant on the oral presentation hereof that the evidence discloses a lack of good faith on the part of respondent Fitts in discharging appellant from his staff of deputies. It has always been the rule that the particular finding attacked must be specified, so that, as is said in Crow v. Crow, 168 Cal. 607, 143 P. 689, 690, "the adverse party may know what evidence by way of amendments to embody in the statement or bill and that the trial court's attention may be properly directed to these designated matters." See, also, Mazuran v. Stefanich, 95 Cal. App. 327, 272 P. 772; Schultz v. City of Venice, 200 Cal. 50, 251 P. 913; Citizens' Bank of L. A. v. Jones, 121 Cal. 30, 53 P. 354; State Compensation Ins. Fund v. Rothwell, 103 Cal. App. 607, 284 P. 943.

[5] However, this further observation may be made. It is the contention of appellant that it must be said, because the respondent Fitts wrote a letter to appellant on December 18, 1928, requesting his resignation in which he said, "This action is not to be construed by you as any reflection upon your ability or integrity as a deputy but on the contrary this office wishes you the best of success in your future career as a lawyer," that his discharge for the reasons heretofore quoted was not in good faith. This conclusion does not necessarily flow from the two letters. In the second it is said: "We have earnestly sought to avoid the embarrassment of discharging you from your present position. Your failure to respond to this request necessitates formal action discharging you from further duties as Deputy District Attorney." We cannot say, particularly in the face of the finding of the trial court, that the first letter is not open to the construction simply that no charges were made, and that it was a courteous way of saving an embarrassing situation. It is to be noted that the first letter is purely in the negative without affirmation of ability.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Jules Peronnet and others against William A. Ralph, George R. Frampton, and others, in which the last-named defendant filed cross-complaint. From judgment for cross-complainant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

W. W. Butler, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Courtney A. Teel, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

This is an action of claim and delivery. The property involved constitutes all the equipment, furniture, and fixtures contained in and pertaining to a certain theater known as the Tujunga Valley Theatre, situate at Tujunga, Cal., of the stipulated value of $5,000. Judgment was entered in favor of the cross-complainant, George R. Frampton, for the return of said property, or for $5,000, the value thereof. The plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment.

The bill of exceptions shows that on April 14, 1924, the plaintiffs Peronnet and the defendants William A. Ralph and Lulu E. Ralph entered into the following agreement:

"I hereby hand you my check for the sum of $100.00 to apply on the purchase of the lease and equipment of the Tujunga Theatre, situate at Tujunga, California. The lease is to be for the term of five years from April, 1924, at a monthly rental of $75.00, same to be straight transferable. The equipment is to be free and clear of all encumbrance except the sum of $2,300.00 due on organ, payable $45.00 per month or more, which I agree to assume. The organ contract is to run for a term of three years.

"The full purchase price is to be $6,500.00, payable as follows: $1,000 00 upon the signing of the lease, and the balance of $5,500.00 to be paid ninety days after the signing of the lease, this sum to be secured by demand note bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent per annum.

"The above lease is to be secured by the first and last month's rent.

"Possession to be given on or before May 1, 1924. All bills, deposits, rents, taxes, insurance, etc., to be prorated date of delivery.

"The check for $100.00 to apply on purchase price when deal is consummated, otherwise to be returned to me. * * *

"I, R. Peronnet, owner of the above lease and equipment, hereby accept the above proposition and will deliver the above mentioned lease, and will render a clear bill of sale upon the payment to me of the sum of $6,500.00. Bill of sale not to include the organ. * * *

"It is agreed between the parties hereto that the bill of sale, lease and note are to be escrowed in a reputable bank until the terms of this agreement have been fully performed."

Two days later another agreement was entered into by the same parties as follows:

"Received of W. A. Ralph and L. W. Ralph the sum of one thousand one hundred and fifty ($1,150.00) dollars to apply on the purchase of the Tujunga Valley Theatre equipment and lease situate at Tujunga, California. One thousand dollars ($1,000.00) to apply on the purchase price of $6,500.00, and $150.00 to apply on the first and last month's rent, in accordance with the lease. * * * Possession of the above mentioned theatre is to be given April 24, 1924, and all bills, taxes, insurance, deposits and other expense bills are to be prorated date of delivery.

"R. Peronnet."

In accordance with said agreements, the Peronnets leased the theater building to the Ralphs for the term of five years, and the latter were let into possession of the building in accordance with the terms of said lease, and were given possession of all of the personal property. On April 16, 1924, the said lease, together with the following escrow instructions, were delivered to the Tujunga Valley Bank:

"I hand to Mr. Ralph Peronnet, cash paid out of escrow $1,000 a lease of Tujunga Valley Theatre and other papers to be signed and executed by me in connection with this escrow—which you are instructed to use when you can hold for me:

"(1) Covering the following described property:

"Bill of sale of theatre equipment, signed and acknowledged lease by all parties in interest. * * *

"Rent on theatre and equipment (full lease) paid till June 1, 1924, and no refund to be made to seller on same.

"Insurance adjusted out of escrow.

"Taxes adjusted out of escrow.

"One copy of lease goes to Mr. Ralph, and one copy to Mr. Peronnet, and bill of sale to be delivered to Mr. Ralph, all duly executed, upon the payment of that certain promissory note of $5,500.00, which is made and executed by W. A. Ralph and L. E. Ralph, April 16, 1924. Seven per cent interest due in 100 days from date.

"I have read the foregoing instructions and understand the contents thereof: I have also read the conditions printed on the back of this form, governing the administration of this escrow, and same are satisfactory to me.

"[Signed] William A. Ralph.
"[Signed] Lulu E. Ralph.

"The conditions above are hereby approved, and I will hand you a lease and bill of sale executed by Jules Peronnet and Ralph Peronnet in favor of William A. Ralph and Lulu E. Ralph, son and mother, leasing property as above described, which you are authorized to deliver upon payment to you for my account the sum of $6,500, $1,000 already paid outside escrow, and the balance of $5,500 to be by one certain promissory note of $5,500, dated April 16, bearing 7 per cent interest, and due in 100 days from date, within the time as above provided. * * *

"I have read the foregoing instructions and understand the contents thereof; I have also read the conditions printed on the back of this form, governing the administration of this escrow, and same are satisfactory to me.

"[Signed] Ralph Peronnet."

Among the conditions printed on the back of the escrow form is the following: "Bank reserves right to withhold performance in case parties disagree."

The promissory note mentioned in the foregoing escrow instructions was signed by the Ralphs and deposited with the lease and bill of sale as aforesaid. The Ralphs entered into possession of the theater under the terms of said lease and also took over the theater equipment. They failed to make any further payments than those heretofore mentioned. On July 24, 1924, the Peronnets gave instructions to the Tujunga Valley Bank that the Ralphs had failed to make any payment of the $5,500 note which was due at the expiration of said 100 days, to wit, July 25, 1924, and that they had asked for and had been granted an extension of time to July 30, and authorized the bank to accept payment of $2,750 on or before that date, and, in event of such payment, the time for the balance would be extended three months. On September 17, 1924, no payments having been made by the Ralphs, the Peronnets notified them that the contract of April 16, 1924, had been violated, and it was therefore declared forfeited, and demanded that all the property be returned to them. This the Ralphs refused to do. On October 6, 1924, the Ralphs were indebted to the cross-complainant Frampton in the sum of $1,500, and, after proceedings in accordance with section 3440 of the Civil Code, the Ralphs sold all of said property to Frampton for said indebtedness. Frampton thereupon endeavored to take possession of said personal property, but was refused the same by the Peronnets, who had previously obtained possession of the real property in which the personal property was situated, for nonpayment of rent by the Ralphs. Thereafter the Peronnets commenced this action against the Ralphs and Frampton, seeking to recover the possession of said personal property. The defendants Ralph made no defense, but Frampton appeared and filed a cross-complaint, claiming the ownership of said property, and demanded its return to him or the value thereof.

[1-3] The trial court concluded that under the foregoing facts the transaction constituted a completed sale and that the title to the property vested in the Ralphs. Appellants contend that the sale by them to the Ralphs was conditional and that the title to said property did not pass, but remained in them until the payment in cash of the sum of $5,500 still due them.

"The owner of personal property has the right to make an agreement to sell the same and deliver possession thereof to the buyer, upon the condition that the title thereto shall nevertheless remain in the seller until the price agreed on has been fully paid, and the title so withheld by the owner will, until full payment, be superior to that of a subsequent mortgagee or purchaser of such personal property from the buyer, even if such subsequent mortgage or purchase was made without knowledge or notice of the reservation of title and paid full value for the property." Oakland Bank of Savings v. California P. B. Co., 183 Cal. 297, 191 P. 524, and cases there cited.

"The question whether or not a given contract is or is not a contract of conditional sale is to be determined wholly by the intent of the parties, expressed in and deducible from the contract itself. In arriving at the solution of the question the whole contract is to be considered, and no detached term or condition is to be given prominence or effect over and above another. So that, if the legal effect of the whole contract be to establish a mortgage or a lease or an option to purchase between the parties, the mere negation or denial in another part of the contract of that legal effect will not control. But if, upon the other hand, the intent be clear that title shall not pass until the performance by the vendee of a condition precedent or concurrent, such a contract becomes a conditional sale, and not repugnant to any principle of justice or equity, even though possession of the property be given to the proposing purchaser. Harkness v. Russell, 118 U. S. 663, 7 S. Ct. 51 [30 L. Ed. 285]; Rodgers v. Bachman, 109 Cal. 552, 42 P. 448." Van Allen v. Francis, 123 Cal. 477, 56 P. 339, 340.

In support of their claim that the parties to the transaction intended that the sale was conditional, appellant cites that portion of the language of the acceptance as follows: "I * * * accept the above proposition, and will deliver the above mentioned lease, and will render a clear bill of sale upon the payment to me of the sum of $6,500.00," and the further language, "It is agreed between the parties hereto that the bill of sale, lease and note are to be escrowed in a reputable bank until the terms of this agreement have been fully performed," and "One copy of lease goes to Mr. Ralph and one copy to Mr. Peronnet, and bill of sale to be delivered to Mr. Ralph, all duly executed, upon the payment of that certain promissory note of $5,500, which was made and executed by W. A. Ralph and L. E. Ralph on April 16, 1924, 7 per cent interest, due in 100 days from date," and also the language in the contemporary instructions of the seller Peronnet referring to the lease and bill of sale, "which you are authorized to deliver upon payment to you for my account in the sum of $6,500.00, $1,000.00 already paid out of this outside escrow, and balance of $5,500.00 to be by one certain promissory note of $5,500.00, dated April 16, bearing 7 per cent interest, and due in 100 days from date within the time as above provided."

[4] On the face of the foregoing instruments, it appears that the appellants accepted the offer of the Ralphs to purchase the property, and agreed to render a clear bill of sale upon payment to them in the sum of $6,500; that the Ralphs were to execute a promissory note in the sum of $5,500, bearing interest in the sum of 7 per cent. and due 100 days from its date; that the lease, bill of sale, and note were to be put in escrow in a reputable bank until the terms of the agreement had been fully performed, when they were to be delivered to the Ralphs. It is true that, in the instructions given by the appellants, but without reference to any other portion of the several agreements, the language used would seem to indicate that the balance due on the property sold, after the payment of the $1,000 in cash, should be paid by the promissory note, but, as said in Palmer v. Howard, 72 Cal. 293, 13 P. 858, 1 Am. St. Rep. 60, the intention must be collected from the whole transaction and not from any particular feature of it.

[5] It is apparent from reading the several instruments that they were not drawn by a person skilled in the law, and it is a matter of common knowledge that such persons usually believe that to complete a sale, such as the one in the case at bar, a bill of sale is necessary to convey title. However, no good reason has been shown why the documents were put in escrow, except that the sellers would not give "a clear bill of sale" of the property until the purchase price had been paid. Counsel for respondent claims that the documents in escrow were placed there as security for the payment of the sum due on the note, but he has not pointed out in what way they would amount to any security. We are satisfied from the record that the sale was a conditional one and that title did not vest in the Ralphs, but remained in appellants. At most, all that the respondent could have obtained by his purchase from the Ralphs was whatever equity, if any, the Ralphs had in the property.

The judgment is reversed.

WOODS et al. v. BERRY et al.

Civ. 3843.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 11, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⇨612(2).

Judge has jurisdiction to sign and certify transcript as long as appeal was pending (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

2. Appeal and error ⇨1195(3).

Opinion on former appeal from order denying change of venue became "law of case," as regards right to certification of transcript (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 953a).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Law of the Case," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Appeal and error ⇨939.

Presumption favors judge's ruling certifying transcript having effect of bill of exceptions (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 953a, 1963, subds. 15, 16).

4. Appeal and error ⇨657(1).

Application for judge's certification of corrected transcript held properly granted within judge's discretion (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 953a, 1963, subds. 15, 16).

5. Statutes ⇨243.

Statute authorizing amendments, time extensions, and relief from proceedings taken through mistake or inadvertence, is liberally construed (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

6. Appeal and error ⇨643(3).

Appellants who, immediately following discovery that transcript was not certified, applied to judge for certification, which judge erroneously refused, held not guilty of laches, and hence certification was justified (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 953a).

7. Appeal and error ⇨553(1).

Appellants' narrative statement of substance of affidavits on motion for change of venue, being certified by judge as correct, becomes portion of judgment roll, and can be considered on appeal in lieu of bill of exceptions (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a, 953c).

8. Appeal and error ⇨553(1).

Where appellants' brief quoted order denying change of venue, and stated parts of some affidavits and substance of others, and respondents set out their affidavits, appeal could properly be considered on merits (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a, 953c).

9. Venue ⇨22(2).

Principal and sureties sued on indemnity bond, not being residents of county of forum, held entitled to change of venue (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 382, 383, 395).

10. Indemnity ⇨15(2).

In action on indemnity bond, principal held proper and necessary party (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 382, 383).

11. Parties 🔑30.

In action on joint obligation, all persons jointly liable must be united as defendants (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 382, 383).

12. Abatement and revival 🔑43.

Action on indemnity bond does not abate merely by principal's insolvency or bankruptcy (Code Civ. Proc. § 385).

13. Bankruptcy 🔑391 (2).

Bankruptcy of person against whom judgment has been rendered will not prevent prosecution of appeal in his name (Code Civ. Proc. § 385).

14. Bankruptcy 🔑391 (1).

In action on indemnity bond, principal, being proper party, held entitled to be heard on any defense to defeat judgment against him or sureties, notwithstanding principal's adjudication of bankruptcy (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 382, 383, 385).

15. Bankruptcy 🔑391 (1).

In action on indemnity bond, principal, notwithstanding alleged bankruptcy, held not merely nominal party; affidavits concerning bankruptcy being hearsay and immaterial (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 382, 383, 385).

> So far as appeared, no order was made in trial court staying proceedings, and no supersedeas or stay order was issued from United States District Court in which alleged adjudication of bankruptcy was made.

16. Bankruptcy 🔑391 (1).

Filing petition in bankruptcy does not prevent commencement of action against bankrupt (Code Civ. Proc. § 385).

17. Venue 🔑80.

In action on indemnity bond, where principal was entitled to change of venue, sureties' motions and obligees' counter motions on ground of witnesses' convenience could be considered in proper county after transfer (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 382, 383, 395).

18. Venue 🔑70.

On motion by defendant for change of venue, his unchallenged affidavit of merits must be accepted as true (Code Civ. Proc. § 395).

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by Alfred D. Woods and another against Harry Berry and others. From an order denying defendants' motions for change of venue and granting plaintiffs' countermotion to retain the cause in the county in which it was brought, defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Herbert Choynski and Sidney Rhein, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for respondents.

Justice pro tem. McDANIEL delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from an order denying defendants' motions for change of place of trial from Shasta county to the city and county of San Francisco; and granting respondents' counter motion to retain the cause in Shasta county.

It is agreed that the action is a transitory one. Chew v. Storrie (Cal. App.) 291 P. 610. This case was here before on motion of respondents for affirmance; opinion filed April 4, 1930. Woods v. Berry, 286 P. 1073. The facts of the case are sufficiently stated therein. The motion for affirmance rested upon the claim that the transcript had not been properly authenticated by the trial judge. It was ordered by the Appellate Court that the transcript be withdrawn and returned to the superior court in and for Shasta county for the purpose of having the same certified by the judge, as required by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. The corrected and completed transcript, containing all of the affidavits used at the hearing of the motions for change of the place of trial, has been returned and filed. The respondents objected in the court below to the certification of said transcript, notwithstanding direction of this court that it be sent back for that purpose. The objections were overruled, and, by stipulation, were included in the transcript before us, and are on four grounds, to-wit: "1. That this court has no jurisdiction to act in said matter at this time; 2. That no proceeding in accordance with law has been taken or is pending before this court for the correction of any defect in said transcript; 3. That the application for the certificate and approval of said transcript by the trial judge comes too late; 4. That defendants have been guilty of laches in obtaining and filing a correct transcript upon the appeal herein."

In support of the objections which are again asserted here, although no appeal from the ruling of the court was taken by respondents, it is argued that the correction of the transcript was not based upon proceedings taken under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, to relieve appellants of the default in procuring and filing a reporter's transcript within the time provided by statute, and that the charge of laches were obviously well taken.

[1-3] There is no merit in these objections. The demand for a transcript was in time. Immediately following the discovery by appellants that the original transcript was not signed and certified by the trial judge, they applied to him with request for his certification. Erroneously he refused to sign. The court had jurisdiction as long as this appeal was pending. The opinion and decision, supra, settled the fact and the law of the case, in so far as the right to certification of the record upon proper application therefor is concerned, and the correction was made on August 7, 1930, within six months thereafter. The record as now before us is in effect a bill of exceptions. "While it does not appear that the defendant in response to said objections made a formal motion for relief from his default under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it does affirmatively appear therein that the trial judge 'exercised his discretion in favor of certifying said transcript,' and thereupon made an order that the same be settled, allowed, and certified as and for the bill of exceptions in said cause." Stenzel v. Kronick, 201 Cal. 26, 255 P. 199. The presumption is in favor of the ruling of the trial court. Weyse v. Biedebach, 86 Cal. App. 728, 261 P. 1096; section 1963, Code Civ. Proc., subds. 15 and 16.

[4, 5] It does not appear from the record herein whether or not appellant's application for certification of the corrected and completed transcript was for relief under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. The application, however, was made and granted over the objections of respondents, in the exercise by the court of a sound discretion. Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 P. 935. It does not appear there was an abuse of discretion in so doing. Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 29 P. 332. Courts give very liberal interpretation to the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. Estate of Simmons, 168 Cal. 392, 143 P. 697; Anstead v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 201 Cal. 198, 256 P. 209; Gross v. Hazeltine, 206 Cal. 130, 273 P. 550.

[6] As to laches, it appears to this court that appellants moved with reasonable celerity and due diligence to obtain the said transcript. The case of In re Barney, 191 Cal. 18, 214 P. 853, does not conflict with the foregoing views, when the fact is kept in mind, that the only default in obtaining proper certification in the case on appeal was chargeable, not to appellants, but to an erroneous ruling of the trial court.

Another objection of respondents to a hearing on the merits rests upon the claim that appellants have failed to print in their brief portions of the record necessary to be considered by the Appellate Court on appeal, or sufficient to justify a reversal, citing Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 239 P. 1054; Filmer v. Davis, 91 Cal. App. 195, 266 P. 985; Keele v. Clouser, 92 Cal. App. 526, 268 P. 682, and Code of Civil Procedure, § 953c, requiring the printing by appellants in their brief of such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court.

There is no quarrel with the foregoing authorities, which correctly state the rule; but they are hardly applicable in this case.

[7] Appellants, in their brief, did quote verbatim from the transcript the order of the lower court, that of February 8, 1929, from which they appeal, i. e., denying the change of place of trial. They also set out parts of the affidavits used in evidence by the respondent to retain the place of trial in Shasta county. They stated in narrative form the substance of other affidavits now incorporated in the record, and the narrative is not contradicted nor disputed by respondents as to any matter of form or substance. The dispute is only as to the legal effect of the record facts herein. No reporter was present; the showing before the court was entirely documentary, and the statement, certified as true and correct by the judge, became a portion of the judgment roll, and may be considered on appeal in lieu of the bill of exceptions. Section 953a, Code Civ. Proc.

[8] Respondents in their reply brief set out in the appendix their counter motion to retain the cause in Shasta county, together with the affidavits in support of their motion. Under these conditions, we have felt it our duty to consider this appeal upon the merits.

The Merits.

[9] The defendant Berry's motion for a change of venue on the ground that he and his codefendants are all residents of the city and county of San Francisco and are not now and never have been residents of Shasta county, where the action was commenced, should have been granted. The respondents, in response to the application and demand of the defendant Berry for a change of the place of trial, contend that since the commencement of the action Berry had been adjudicated a bankrupt in the United States District Court, Northern District of California, that said Berry had made application for his final discharge, and no longer has any personal interest in the outcome of the action, and that said motion and demand for a change were not in good faith, but merely to bolster up the demand and motions of the other defendants, Lesser and Ballen, for a change of the place of trial.

[10-13] Respondents do not find fault with the formal showing on behalf of Berry. The latter's notice of motion, demand for change, affidavit of merits, and demurrer to the complaint were in form and substance in accordance with the requirements of the law. It appears that the defendant Berry was a principal in the action on the bond. He was a proper and necessary party under section 383, Code of Civil Procedure. When liability is joint, all persons upon whom it rests must be united as defendants in an action upon the obligation. This rule is general and applies to undertakings and promises of all descriptions. Section 382, Code Civ. Proc.; 20 Cal. Jur. 502, 503; Farmers' Exch. Bank v. Morse, 129 Cal. 239, 61 P. 1088. The action did not abate by reason of the insolvency or bankruptcy of the defendant Berry. Code Civ. Proc., § 385. The bankruptcy of a party against whom a judgment has been rendered before the taking of the appeal will not prevent the prosecution of the appeal in his name. O'Neil v. Dougherty, 46 Cal. 575.

The respondents in their complaint allege that Berry was insolvent. He was not served with summons until December 7, 1928, while motions upon the question of change of place of trial of his codefendants, sureties on the bond in question, were pending. On that date, however, he was served with summons, and made his appearance December 17, 1928, by filing his demurrer, and making his demand, etc. His codefendants, Lesser and Ballen, whose motions for a change of place of trial to the city and county of San Francisco were pending, in addition to their demurrers, had filed answers and amended answers. In opposition to their demands, counter motions of the respondents were presented to retain the cause in Shasta county, based upon the convenience of witnesses.

[14, 15] As a proper party to the action, Berry is entitled to be heard in whatever defense he may have to defeat the judgment against his sureties, as well as against himself. This is true, notwithstanding his adjudication of bankruptcy. Plaintiffs have not moved to dismiss the action against Berry, have made no request that the trustee in bankruptcy, if any, be substituted in Berry's place as defendant. No order was ever made in the trial court staying proceedings in this action, no supersedeas nor stay order ever issued from the United States District Court, so far as the record of this case shows. The statements in the affidavits on file herein concerning his bankruptcy were matters of hearsay and immaterial, as no change in his status as defendant has occurred in this case. He was neither an improper nor unnecessary party, nor merely a nominal party to the action.

[16] The liability of his codefendants is primarily dependent upon Berry's liability. "The filing of a petition in bankruptcy does not prevent the commencement of an action against the bankrupt." 7 Cor. Jur. 349, and citations, note 74. "The proper practice appears to be that the application for a stay should be made in the court in which the action is pending, and it should make the necessary order staying the proceedings. * * *" Id., on page 349, 350, note 85. "A statement of defendant's counsel at the trial that defendant was in bankruptcy could not operate as a stay of proceedings." McGowan v. Bowman, 79 Vt. 295, 64 A. 1121.

Even on this appeal respondents ask affirmation of the order denying Berry's application for a change of place of trial, and they continue to ask personal judgment against him, as well as his codefendants. Under these circumstances, it appears he is not merely a nominal party. The case of Donohoe v. Wooster, 163 Cal. 114, 124 P. 730, cited by respondents, is not in point. The facts in that case are not at all analogous in any sense to the facts of the case at bar.

"The language of section 395 requires the action to be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside, not where they do not reside. The consent of certain defendants not residing in the county where the action is brought could not take away from the defendants who did not reside there the right to have the cause transferred to the county of their residence. To hold otherwise would be a violation of the provisions of section 395.

"The right of a defendant to have an action brought against him tried in the county in which he has his residence is an ancient and valuable right, which has always been safeguarded by statute and is supported by a long line of judicial decisions. 'The right of a plaintiff to have an action tried in another county than that in which the defendant has his residence is exceptional, and, if the plaintiff would claim such right, he must bring himself within the terms of the exception.' Brady v. Times-Mirror, 106 Cal. 56, 39 P. 209." Brown v. Happy Valley Fruit Growers, 206 Cal. 515, 274 P. 977, 979.

[17] The motions for change of place of trial of all three defendants were heard at the same time, and were denied with the one order herein appealed from; and in the same order were included the rulings of the court with reference to plaintiffs' motion to retain the cause in Shasta county on the ground of convenience of witnesses, and the orders striking out certain portions of the answers filed by the two answering defendants, namely, Lesser and Ballen. As Berry's motion was for the benefit of the other defendants as well as himself, and it must be granted, it will be unnecessary to follow counsel further in their argument as to the rulings of the trial court with reference to the motions of Lesser and Ballen, and the counter motions of respondents on the ground of the convenience of witnesses. Under the authorities cited, these last matters may be considered in the proper county, i. e., the city and county of San Francisco, after the transfer.

The appellants contend that the answers of Lesser and Ballen were filed merely on account of the then prevailing rule of the judicial council requiring the filing of answers at the same time demurrers were interposed to complaints in trial courts, and, that, therefore, the filing of answers under such circumstances should not open the door to plaintiffs to make a counter showing on the ground of convenience of witnesses. This contention may or may not have merit. It is unnecessary now to consider it.

[18] The charge of bad faith against Berry is overborne by his affidavit of merits. That affidavit stands unchallenged and must be accepted as true.

The said order denying the change of place of trial from Shasta county to the city and county of San Francisco is reversed.

PEOPLE v. SCOTT et al.

Cr. A. 584.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.

Feb. 20, 1931.

1. Vagrancy ⚿1.

At common law single act did not constitute person a vagrant.

2. Vagrancy ⚿1.

Evidence that defendants danced in nude on single occasion at smoker sufficiently supported their conviction as "dissolute" persons under Vagrancy Statute (Pen. Code, § 647, subd. 5).

> "Dissolute" is defined as "loosed from restraint, unashamed, lawless, loose in morals and conduct, recklessly abandoned to sensual pleasures, profligate, wanton, lewd, debauched."

3. Criminal law ⚿254.

If evidence shows single act that no one not of lewd or dissolute character would do such act even once, inference to be drawn therefrom is exclusively for trial court (Pen. Code, § 647, subd. 5).

Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; Ellis A. Eagan, Judge.

Ruth Scott and Dolores Moreno were convicted of vagrancy, and they appeal.

Affirmed.

MacDonald & Thompson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles P. Johnson, City Prosecutor, and John L. Bland and Joe W. Matherly, Deputy City Prosecutors, all of Los Angeles, for the People.

McLUCAS, P. J.

Defendants were convicted of vagrancy, as being dissolute persons, and appeal from the judgment. According to the undisputed evidence, defendants presented dances on a stage before several hundred men assembled at a smoker. Upon the first appearance of defendants, they were partially clothed in dancing costumes, and thereafter each of the defendants in turn came back upon the stage and presented dances before the assembled men, and each of defendants upon the last occasion appeared and danced in the nude for a period not exceeding five minutes. There was no evidence offered that defendants had danced in the nude on any other occasion.

Appellants contend that the evidence was insufficient to support the conviction of vagrancy, for the reason that a single or specific act is not sufficient to constitute the actor a vagrant under subdivision 5 of section 647 of the Penal Code, which defines "every idle, or lewd, or dissolute person, or associate of known thieves" as being a vagrant. "Vagrancy at common law was defined as the wandering or going about from place to place by an idle person who has no lawful visible means of support, and who subsists on charity and does not work for a living though able so to do, but it has not infrequently been held by many courts that the statutes, in both England and America, have so much and so frequently dealt with the subject of vagrancy, that the common law on the subject has become unimportant. Where the legislature of a state has taken upon itself the regulation of vagrants by statute, the words therein must bear the interpretation thereby made or intended, and owing to the different wording of such statutes it is impracticable to lay down a definition that will include all who are vagrants, or to give the description of all those who come within this class in the various states." 8 R. C. L., p. 339.

It is generally conceded that, within certain broad limitations, the Legislature may by statute define vagrancy and impose punishment for the offense. Ex parte Hudgins, 86 W. Va. 526, 103 S. E. 327, 9 A. L. R. 1361. In Re McCue, 7 Cal. App. page 766, 96 P. 110, 111, it is said: "We are inclined to the view that while idleness, whether it be that of the 'idle rich' or 'idle poor,' is a prolific source of crime, still it is not competent for the Legislature to denounce mere inaction as a crime without some qualification. But this cannot be said of lewdness or dissoluteness, terms often used interchangeably, but each of which applies to the unlawful indulgence of lust, whether in public or private. 'Any practice, the tendency of which, as shown by experience, is to weaken or corrupt the morals of those who follow it, * * * is a legitimate subject for regulation or prohibition by the state, * * * and unless it clearly appears that a statute enacted for this purpose has no real or substantial relation to these objects, and that the fundamental rights of the citizen are assailed under the guise of a police regulation, the action of the legislative department is conclusive.' Ex parte Tuttle, 91 Cal. 590, 27 P. 933. The elements of lewdness and dissoluteness, under the accepted definition of those terms, come directly within the inhibited practices and are proper subjects of regulation and prohibition. The statute, then, is a valid exercise of police power as to these elements, and it is within the power of the court to determine whether one charged comes within the class of lewd or dissolute persons. Ex parte Ah Fook, 49 Cal. 404."

[1] Undoubtedly at the common law, and under many provisions of the statutes, a single act is not sufficient to constitute a person a vagrant. Under most of the provisions of section 647 of the Penal Code, a single act is not enough to make a person a vagrant. Appellants, in support of their contention, have cited many cases in which it has been held that a single act is insufficient to constitute vagrancy, but in each case the statute must be read in order to determine whether the statute requires more than a single act to be committed. In People v. Denby, 108 Cal. 54, 40 P. 1051, 1052, under a statute defining as a vagrant a "healthy beggar who solicits alms as a business," Penal Code, section 647, subdivision 2, prior to 1911 amendment, it was held that the Vagrancy Statute has no application to single instances of conduct, which, if habitual, would amount to vagrancy. It is self-evident that proof of habitual conduct was necessary under the language of the statute in the foregoing case. But, on the other hand, there are many cases in which the Vagrancy Statute was held to permit proof of a single act of vagrancy. See note 14 A. L. R., page 1498. In People v. Phelps, 189 App. Div. 775, 179 N. Y. S. 289, 290, it was held that, under a statute making one who offers to commit prostitution guilty of vagrancy, proof that the defendant offered to commit prostitution is sufficient to convict, and it is not necessary to establish "that the defendant was a common prostitute or nightwalker, that she solicited to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passers-by, and that she was there in a public place for the purpose of prostitution." In People v. Edwards (Gen. Sess.) 180 N. Y. S. 631, 634, under the statute which defined a vagrant as "a person who offers to commit prostitution," it was stated that "a man who induces, entices, or procures a woman to commit prostitution, either with himself or with another, is a vagrant, and the man who aids or abets or participates in the commission of prostitution by a woman is a vagrant." For further cases holding that a single act may constitute vagrancy under the statute, see People v. Lorraine (Sp. Sess.) 196 N. Y. S. 323; People v. West (Sp. Sess.) 204 N. Y. S. 234. In Ex parte Karnstrom, 297 Mo. 384, 249 S. W. 595, where the statute read, "every person found tramping or wandering around from place to place without any visible means of support, shall be deemed a vagrant," it was held (page 395 of 297 Mo., 249 S. W. 595, 596) that it is not necessary to establish a continuing offense or a habitual course of conduct extending over an appreciable period of time. In State v. Rayburn, 170 Iowa, 514, 153 N. W. 59, L. R. A. 1915F, 640, it was held that, under a statute forbidding the resorting of any person to a house of ill fame for the purpose of prostitution or lewdness, proof of one act would be enough, or the evidence might be such that the crime would be complete without proof of such single act if the evidence was sufficient to show the intent or purpose in resorting to the place, and that it was for the purpose of prostitution or lewdness. In State v. Gardner, 174 Iowa, 748, 156 N. W. 747, L. R. A. 1916D, 767, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 239, it was held that a single offense will support a conviction of resorting to a house of ill fame for the purpose of lewdness.

Appellants rely upon certain language in People v. Craig, 152 Cal. 42, 91 P. 997. In that case the court discussed the statutory definition of vagrancy contained in Penal Code 647, and especially subdivisions 5 and 6, which then read as now:

"Every idle, or lewd, or dissolute person, or associate of known thieves; or,

"Every person who wanders about the streets at late or unusual hours of the night, without any visible or lawful business."

The court said (page 46 of 152 Cal., 91 P. 997, 999): "We think the evidence was clearly relevant, as tending to prove that the arresting officers were personally cognizant of facts constituting the appellant a vagrant within the statutory definition of vagrancy. Pen. Code, § 647, and especially subdivisions 5 and 6. It was to the effect that for a period of three months prior to the assault charged he had been seen by Sergeant Wilson at all hours of the night, from 9 p. m. to 3 a. m., in and about the saloons clustering around Second and L streets, 'McCarthy's,' 'The Art,' 'The Palm,' and 'The Casino,' and in the immediate neighborhood of the 'Concentration Camps' (a local euphemism for houses of ill fame). It was to the further effect that he had no visible or lawful business and that he associated with a reputed prostitute. This was vagrancy, and, if vagrancy of this species is a misdemeaner which can be committed 'in the presence' of an observer, this misdemeanor, supposing the evidence to be true, was committed in the presence of the arresting officer. If, as a witness, he could testify from actual knowledge to every element of the offense, the offense must have been committed in his presence. And it makes no difference that this species of vagrancy cannot be committed by a single act observable at one point of time. A series of acts extending over a considerable period of time, and only constituting a criminal offense because of their continuance and repetition, alone or in conjunction with other circumstances, being capable of observation and actual knowledge by a peace officer, will justify him, when the series of acts is complete, in making an arrest without a warrant as fully as in the case of any other misdemeanor committed or attempted in his presence."

We do not interpret this language of the court as holding that under no circumstances is proof of a single specific act sufficient to support a conviction of vagrancy, as a dissolute person, but rather that, under the facts as stated, such species of vagrancy cannot be committed by a single act observable at one point of time.

[2, 3] Webster's Unabridged Dictionary defines "dissolute" as "loosed from restraint, unashamed, lawless, loose in morals and conduct, recklessly abandoned to sensual pleasures, profligate, wanton, lewd, debauched." We conclude that the evidence is sufficient to support the judgment of the trial court that the defendants are dissolute persons as so defined. Conceding that vagrancy is chronic rather than acute, as stated in People v. Craig, supra, yet we think the existence of such a chronic condition may be ascertained from a single examination, if the characteristic reactions of that condition be found present. There are many acts which, if committed repeatedly over a period of time, would be evidence of the species of vagrancy here charged, but which are of such doubtful import, because they might proceed from other causes than a lewd or dissolute character, that a single instance would afford no certain foundation for the inference that the actor is a person of such character. There are, however, other acts which are of such nature as reasonably to justify an inference that no one not of lewd or dissolute character would do such an act even once. If the evidence shows a single act of the kind last mentioned, the question as to the inference to be drawn therefrom is one for the trial court, and we cannot interfere with its decision. We think the acts of the defendants, taken in conjunction with the circumstances under which they were performed, as shown by the evidence, are of this class.

Judgment is ordered affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; BISHOP, J.

BISHOP, J.

Appellant's conviction on the charge that she was illegally in possession of intoxicating liquor is dependent entirely on the proof that it was present, with her knowledge, in the residence where she and her husband lived. Were she living alone, or were there any evidence that she claimed or had exercised any dominion or control over the liquor, we would have no hesitation in affirming the judgment. We do not believe that a conviction of a wife is supported when no fact is established other than the presence of the liquor in the house of herself and her husband, even though she had knowledge of its presence.

So far as we are aware, the precise question has not been decided by any appellate court of this state; but we are not without the guidance of judicial authority. In Tewmy v. Commonwealth (1925) 206 Ky. 522, 267 S. W. 1087, the wife was convicted of the possession of whisky found in a chicken coop twenty feet back of the premises where she and her husband resided. He had already been convicted on the same charge. We find this pertinent language in the court's opinion: "Appellant's guilt must be found, if at all, from inference arising from the presumption of guilt because of her occupancy of the premises upon which the contraband liquor was found as a member of her husband's household, he of course being, under the proven facts, the head of the family as well as the controller of the premises."

The court then expressed a doubt of the validity of the conviction even had the wife known of the presence of the liquor, "since we do not conclude that under such circumstances she would be called upon, in order to exculpate herself, to abandon her home, and separate from her husband, and dissolve the bonds of matrimony between them," but, as the wife had no knowledge, her conviction was held to be without doubt improper.

This Tewmy Case was followed with approval in Gullett v. Commonwealth (1928) 225 Ky. 194, 7 S.W.(2d) 1050, where a wife and husband were jointly charged with possession of a still. The location of the still was known to the wife in this case, a fact that made no difference in the result. The court said (page 198 of 225 Ky., 7 S.W.(2d) 1050, 1051): "Of course we do not mean to hold that a married woman cannot commit the offense under consideration, or similar ones, but we do declare her conviction must be sustained by something with more probative force, and of more tendency to convict, than the mere inference to be drawn from the fact of her being the wife of a husband with whom she resides in the household where the contraband goods were discovered."

The wife was the owner and in possession of the key to the residence of herself and husband in the case of Wampler v. Corporation of Norton (1922) 134 Va. 606, 113 S. E. 733, 735. They were jointly charged with the possession of liquor found hidden under the floor and in the yard. His conviction was upheld, but hers was set aside, the court saying:

"None of the many progressive changes made by the laws of this state in respect to marital rights has gone so far as to destroy the theoretical status of the husband as the responsible and authoritative head of the family and director of conditions in the home. * * *

"But where a married woman is charged with keeping ardent spirits for sale there must be something more to establish her guilt than the mere finding of the spirits on premises where she and her husband jointly make their home, no matter to whom the premises belong."

In reversing a judgment of conviction of possession, the court in Crocker v. State (1922) 148 Tenn. 106, 251 S. W. 914, 915, based its decision on much the same reasoning, as will appear from these quotations.

"There is nothing in the state's evidence which shows that the defendant, rather than her husband, owned or stored the whisky, or that she, and not the husband, was keeping it at their residence for the purpose of present sale.

"The leased premises were under the dominion and control of the husband, not the wife. The husband's domicile was, of course, that of the wife. * * *

"But the husband is in law the head of the family. * * * The family must have one head."

With respect to the effect of her knowledge that the liquor was on the premises, the court said: "We do not think that the mere fact that the defendant may have known (and in this case did know) of the presence of the whisky on the premises is sufficient to show a violation of this statute."

In State v. West (Mo. Sup. 1930) 24 S.W.(2d) 1005, 1006, liquor was found in a restaurant operated by defendant's husband. Anent the insufficiency of the evidence to support her conviction, the court said: "There must be something more to convict a married woman of the possession of whisky than the fact that she was washing dishes on premises controlled and operated by her husband, even though she was aware that whisky in violation of the law was stored on the premises."

To the same effect, we find Watson v. State (1929) 113 Tex. Cr. R. 210, 24 S.W.(2d) 830. No case to the contrary has been called to our attention, nor has one been discovered by us.

The conclusion agreed upon in these cases is predicated upon the fact that the husband is the head of the family, at least "theoretically," as was said in Wampler v. Corporation of Norton, supra. This was his status at common law, 13 R. C. L. 984, and is his position under our Code. Section 156 of the Civil Code reads: "The husband is the head of the family. He may choose any reasonable place or mode of living, and the wife must conform thereto." And in section 157 it is declared: "Neither husband nor wife has any interest in the property of the other, but neither can be excluded from the other's dwelling."

We conclude, therefore, that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment of conviction. The judgment is reversed; the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: McLUCAS, P. J.; SHAW, J.

DUNN v. MULLAN et al.

Sac. 4371.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 25, 1931.

1. Husband and wife ⚷262(1).

Deed naming both husband and wife as grantees presumptively vests property in spouses as tenants in common.

2. Husband and wife ⚷262(1).

Interest of wife under deed naming both husband and wife as grantees is presumptively separate property, and husband's interest community property (Civ. Code, § 164, as amended by St. 1923, p. 746).

3. Husband and wife ⚷262(1).

Presumption that interest of wife under deed naming both husband and wife as grantees was separate property is form of evidence binding unless controverted (Civ. Code, § 164, as amended by St. 1923, p. 746; Code Civ. Proc. § 1957).

4. Husband and wife ⚷258.

Generally, improvements during marriage on separate property of either husband or wife, though with community funds, belong to spouse owning separate property.

5. Husband and wife ⚷258.

Expenditure of community funds by husband in improvements did not create lien in favor of community as to wife's separate property.

6. Husband and wife ⚷266.

Mere fact of conveyance of separate or community property by husband to wife raises prima facie presumption that it was intended as gift.

7. Husband and wife ⚷266.

Husband expending community funds for benefit of wife's separate property may be presumed to have intended gift.

8. Husband and wife ⚷265.

Rules arising from existence of marital relationship prevail in case of conflict with those arising out of relationship of tenancy in common.

9. Husband and wife ⚷270(1).

Action to quiet title was not proper action for determination of whether marital community was entitled to reimbursement for expenditure of community funds in improving wife's separate property.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by Loren B. Dunn, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Patrick J. Lyons, deceased, against Helen Mullan and another, as administratrices, and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford and A. P. Hayne, all of Stockton, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

Action to quiet title. Plaintiff, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Patrick J. Lyons, deceased, sought to quiet title to certain described property, consisting of sixty-eight acres located in the San Joaquin Valley. Patrick J. Lyons and Margaret Lyons were husband and wife; their marriage occurring in the year 1913, and continuing up to the time of the death of Patrick J. Lyons on the 9th day of June, 1924. His wife, Margaret Lyons, died the following day. Patrick J. Lyons by will left all of his property to his wife, and Margaret Lyons by will left all of her property to her husband. By virtue of the fact that her husband predeceased her Margaret Lyons became entitled to all of the property by the terms of his will and to all practical purposes died intestate. The property in controversy at the time of their death stood in the name of both Patrick J. Lyons and Margaret Lyons; thirty-eight acres of it having been conveyed to them by deed dated June 28, 1917, and the remaining thirty acres having been conveyed to them by deed dated November 28, 1917. It appears without dispute that in each deed of conveyance Patrick J. Lyons and Margaret Lyons were named the grantees as husband and wife. It further appears that on June 28, 1917, they executed a trust deed to the thirty-eight acre parcel to secure the payment of $3,000 and on November 28, 1917, they executed a trust deed to the thirty-acre parcel to secure the payment of an amount not indicated in the record. On November 30, 1917, a reconveyance by the holders of the trust deed, covering the thirty-eight acre parcel was made to both husband and wife; and on August 8, 1919, a reconveyance by the holders of the trust deed covering the thirty-acre parcel was made to both husband and wife. Subsequent to the acquisition of the sixty-eight acres, a five or six room bungalow with concrete basement, barn, garage, and tankhouse was constructed. These improvements, according to the testimony of the inheritance tax appraiser of San Joaquin county, who in that capacity had made the appraisement for the estate of Margaret Lyons, deceased, were of the reasonable value of $5,000.

The suit to quiet title was opposed by the joint administratrices of the estate of Margaret Lyons, and the findings were in accordance with the answer filed by one of the administratrices, in which she alleged that one-half of the property involved was the separate property of the deceased wife and the remaining one-half interest was the community property of the deceased wife and her deceased husband.

The judgment of the trial court, based on said findings, was to the effect that on the date of the death of Patrick J. Lyons, his wife, Margaret Lyons, was the absolute owner of an undivided one-half interest in and to all of the real property described in the complaint as her separate property; that the remaining one-half undivided interest in said real property was the community property of Patrick J. Lyons and his wife, Margaret Lyons, and that immediately upon the death of Patrick J. Lyons said community property became vested in Margaret Lyons, as his surviving wife, by and pursuant to the terms of the last will and testament of said Patrick J. Lyons, deceased; that the administrator of the estate of Patrick J. Lyons, deceased, was entitled to the possession of the undivided one-half interest in said real property which was the community interest for the purpose of the administration of the estate of Patrick J. Lyons, deceased; and that the administratrices of the estate of Margaret Lyons, deceased, were entitled to the possession of the remaining one-half interest which was the separate property of Margaret Lyons for the purpose of the administration of the estate of said Margaret Lyons, deceased. It was further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the heirs of Patrick J. Lyons were entitled to a one-half interest in the community property (which interest was, therefore, a one-fourth interest in the entire property in controversy), and that the heirs of Margaret Lyons were entitled to a one-half interest in the community property and to the whole of the separate property of Margaret Lyons (which interest was, therefore, a three-fourths interest in the entire property in controversy). From this judgment, the administrator of the husband's estate has appealed on the judgment roll and bill of exceptions.

No evidence was offered as to the source of the funds used for the purchase price of the two parcels of land. The deeds in which the wife was named as one of the grantees were offered in evidence, and the presumption expressed in section 164 of the Civil Code (1923) that, "in case the conveyance is to such married woman and to her husband, * * * the presumption is that the married woman takes the part conveyed to her, as tenant in common, unless a different intention is expressed in the instrument," was relied upon in support of the claim that an undivided one-half interest in the property belonged to the wife as her separate property. Neither was there any evidence offered as to the source of the funds used to pay off the incumbrances represented by the trust deeds or to pay for the improvements constructed on the land. An attempt was made on behalf of the administrator of the husband's estate to show that a portion of the purchase price was the proceeds of money owned by the husband before marriage, but the finding of the trial court was against this claim, and it is conceded by appellant that the evidence offered in that behalf was not sufficient to overcome the presumption that it was community funds.

[1, 2] Appellant contends, first, that if, under the presumption set forth in section 164 of the Civil Code, the wife is to be deemed to hold her share of the property as her separate property as a tenant in common, it must necessarily follow that the husband holds his share of the property as his separate property as a tenant in common and not as community property. It would follow therefrom that, if an undivided one-half interest in the property were the separate property of the husband, upon the death of his wife without issue, the heirs of the husband under subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code would be entitled to this undivided one-half interest which had been the husband's separate property. Although we may concede that there appears to be some merit in this contention, nevertheless in view of the fact that it is definitely and distinctly held in Miller v. Brode, 186 Cal. 409, 414, 199 P. 531, and Estate of Regnart, 102 Cal. App. 643, 283 P. 860, that deeds naming as grantees both husband and wife presumptively vest property in spouses as tenants in common, the interest conveyed to the wife being presumed under section 164 of the Civil Code to be her separate property and that conveyed to her husband the community property of the marriage, we think this question is no longer open to controversy. Community Property, Cal. Jur. Suppl. 1930, § 51, p. 76.

[3] An attempt is made to distinguish these cases from the instant case upon the ground that in each of the cited cases some evidence that the property was purchased with community funds was adduced in support of the findings, whereas in the instant case the findings are supported only by a presumption. The cases cannot, however, be distinguished upon this ground, for the reason that it has been repeatedly held that the presumption, although disputable and susceptible of being overcome by other evidence, is a form of evidence under section 1957 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, unless controverted, the court is bound to find in accordance with said presumption. Estate of Jolly, 196 Cal. 547, 238 P. 353.

It follows that, in so far as this objection is concerned, the findings of the trial court that Margaret Lyons at the date of the death of her husband was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in said property as her separate property, and that the remaining undivided one-half interest in said property was held by the husband as community property was correct, and the judgment based thereon must be affirmed.

Appellant, however, contends that the marital community was entitled to compensation or contribution for sums advanced by it in making improvements and paying off the trust deeds upon the wife's separate property and that the court erred in quieting title to one-half of the property as the separate property of the wife without requiring as a condition precedent thereto that reimbursement be made to the community for one-half of the improvements made and incumbrances discharged with community funds.

[4, 5] We cannot agree with appellant's contention. At the very outset appellant admits that title to an undivided one-half interest in the improvements was vested in the wife by virtue of her ownership of an undivided one-half interest in the real property. This is necessarily so, for it is the general rule that improvements made during marriage on the separate property of either husband or wife, although with community funds, belong to the spouse owning the separate property. 21 Cyc. 1648; Peck v. Brummagim, 31 Cal. 440, 89 Am. Dec. 195; Shaw v. Bernal, 163 Cal. 262, 267, 124 P. 1012, 1014; Potter v. Smith, 48 Cal. App. 162, 191 P. 1023; Smith v. Smith, 47 Cal. App. 650, 191 P. 60. Appellant also concedes, as indeed he must, that no lien was created in favor of the community on account of the expenditure of community funds by the husband. This rule is also well established. Peck v. Brummagim, supra; Carlson v. Carlson, 10 Cal. App. 300, 303, 101 P. 923, 925; McRae v. McRae, 67 Cal. App. 480, 227 P. 933; Flournoy v. Flournoy, 86 Cal. 286, 24 P. 1012, 21 Am. St. Rep. 39. In Carlson v. Carlson, supra, the court said: "In the absence of any specific agreement, no lien would be created on account of money expended by a husband upon the separate property of the wife. * * * The law will not infer from such expenditures alone an agreement either to change the character of the property or an intent to charge the same with a lien. It must rather be presumed that it was the intention of the husband to advance the money paid for the benefit of the wife's estate, and that it was intended to accrue to her interest."

[6, 7] We think the same reasoning which warrants a presumption that a husband did not intend by the expenditure of community funds for the benefit of his wife's separate property to create a lien upon said property compels the conclusion that he did not expect repayment for the community funds expended by him to improve his wife's separate property or to relieve it of an incumbrance. It is well established that, if a husband conveys to his wife his separate or community property, the mere fact of the conveyance itself will raise the prima facie presumption that he intended the conveyance to be a gift. It has also been held that any moneys furnished by the husband before or after marriage in payment of the purchase price of property taken in the separate name of the wife will be presumed to be intended as a gift, and this presumption has been extended to apply when a man prior to marriage procured a deed to property to be taken in the name of his intended wife and thereafter paid off a trust deed thereon with his own separate property. Alferitz v. Arrivillaga, 143 Cal. 646, 77 P. 657; Kimbro v. Kimbro, 199 Cal. 344, 347, 249 P. 180. With like reason, we think it may be presumed that, if a husband expended community funds for the benefit of his wife's separate property he intended, in the absence of any evidence of a contrary intent, such improvements or benefits to be a gift, and that he made such expenditures without expectation of repayment.

This conclusion is not impaired by the fact that in some of the community property states it has been held generally that the separate estate of one member of the community must reimburse the community for improvements made in good faith upon the separate lands of either. Rice v. Rice, 21 Tex. 58; Sims v. Billington, 50 La. Ann. 968, 24 So. 637; Legg v. Legg, 34 Wash. 132, 75 P. 130. In California a distinction is made between the case where, as here, the husband has improved his wife's lands with community funds and where he has improved his own lands with community funds. In the former case he is presumed to have intended a gift. In the latter case a right of reimbursement is granted to the wife upon the theory that to permit a husband to appropriate the community property under his management to his own separate use operates as a constructive fraud upon his wife. McKay, Community Property (2d Ed.) § 1017, p. 661. The reason underlying this distinction is well expressed in Provost v. Provost, 102 Cal. App. 775, 283 P. 842, 844. In that case findings had been made by the trial court that the husband after improving his separate property at the expense of the community had deeded the property to a daughter by a prior marriage for the fraudulent purpose of depriving his wife of her right to separate maintenance, and it was held therein that the wife, through proper proceedings and pleadings, had a right to compensation in the amount of her share in the community, measured by the improvement that such property had effected in his separate property. After a careful analysis of the California cases dealing with the question of the expenditure of community funds upon the separate property of a spouse, the court points out that all of these cases, with one exception, involved a situation where a husband had expended community funds upon the separate property of the wife, and said: "It is apparent that the reason back of each of these decisions stressed in the opinion on the subject * * * is that a husband had authority to control the disposition of the community funds, and that he voluntarily annexed them to the separate property of the wife, who exercised no such power. From these facts the intention of the husband is presumed to have been that the improvements made with the community money should become a part of the separate property of the wife. To merely state a case where the facts are reversed and the husband has spent community funds in improving his own separate estate is to make manifest the palpable impropriety of applying these decided cases as precedents for holding that, simply because community property is annexed to the separate property of one of the spouses, the whole is thereby for all purposes the separate property of that spouse. Since the facts are reversed, logic compels the conclusion that the community funds do not merge in the separate property where the husband has, without the consent of the wife, improved his own separate property with that belonging to the community. To hold otherwise would be to permit the authority of the husband in controlling the community property, given him in the interest of greater freedom in its use and for its transfer for the benefit of both himself and his wife, to become a weapon to be used by him to rob her of every vestige of interest in the community property with which the law has expressly invested her. Such a conclusion would violate every sense of justice, and outrage every principle of fair dealing, known to the law."

Appellant stresses the fact that the wife is presumed to hold her separate property as a tenant in common, and insists that, entirely eliminating from consideration the question of the right of the marital community for reimbursement by virtue of the expenditure of community funds, a lien exists by reason of the relationship of tenancy in common, and that this lien is enforceable in favor of the community irrespective of the existence of the marital relationship.

[8] Conceding it to be true, as appellant alleges, that a tenant in common who has paid a debt or obligation for the benefit of the joint property is entitled as a matter of right to have his cotenant refund to him a proportionate share of the amount paid and that it is proper to provide in the decree of partition that the share of the latter be charged with a lien (Rich v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 775, 148 P. 545; Willmon v. Koyer, 168 Cal. 369, 143 P. 694, L. R. A. 1915B, 961), it is at once apparent that a conflict exists between the rules arising out of the marital relationship and those arising out of the relationship of tenancy in common. The community property system is a comprehensive system governing and controlling all of the property rights and obligations of the spouses during the continuance of the marital relationship or arising from such relation, and in case of a conflict there is no question in our minds but that the rules arising from the existence of the marital community must prevail.

[9] Moreover we are of the opinion that the judgment herein might well be affirmed upon the ground that, there being no lien upon the separate property of the wife, an action to quiet title was not the proper action for a determination of whether or not the marital community was entitled to reimbursement. The complaint was in the ordinary form of an action to quiet title containing the usual averments of ownership, possession, etc., of the described property, and nothing contained in any of the pleadings or even in the specifications of error indicates that a claim for reimbursement was presented to or adjudicated by the trial court. Apparently the purpose of this action, brought pending the administration of the estates of the deceased husband and wife, was to predetermine, prior to the decree of final distribution, the rights of the respective heirs of the husband's and wife's estate. Although an action to quiet title may be a permissible action to determine the status of the property of the spouses, it is not a proper action for an adjudication of all claims and possible equities existing between the estates.

In Shaw v. Bernal, supra, which was a suit in the nature of an action to quiet title brought by the surviving husband against the executor of the will of his deceased wife to determine whether or not certain property was the community property of the spouses, the court expressly declined to consider the question of whether or not the community was entitled to reimbursement, saying: "The authorities hold that the most that the marital partnership may acquire under such circumstances, if anything, is a right to reimbursement to the extent of the value added to the property by the improvements. Whether the right to reimbursement exists in such cases is a question not at all involved in this proceeding and we express no opinion thereon."

The judgment is affirmed.

LANGDON, J.

This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment of the superior court of Los Angeles county, imposing sentence of death after conviction of murder in the first degree, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] On July 14, 1930, the defendant came to the courtroom of Judge Frank C. Collier. A civil trial was then in progress, in which Motley H. Flint, the deceased, was a witness. At the conclusion of his testimony, Flint walked off the stand, and, when he reached the spectator's section, the defendant drew a pistol and fired three shots at him, which took instant effect. Defendant was at once taken to the police station and interrogated. It appeared that he was not personally acquainted with the deceased, but in some manner imagined him to be, with others, responsible for his financial losses. The following day he was indicted for murder. He pleaded "not guilty" and "not guilty by reason of insanity." Subsequently he withdrew his plea of "not guilty," and the trial was held on the other plea. The sole question presented to the jury, therefore, was whether the defendant was legally sane at the time he committed the act.

[2, 3] In order to overcome the presumption of sanity and sustain the burden of proof on that issue, it must be made to appear "that the defendant, when the act was committed, was so deranged and diseased mentally that he was not conscious of the wrongful nature of the act committed." People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 543, 89 P. 124, 129. See, also, People v. Sloper, 198 Cal. 238, 244 P. 362. Responsibility depends upon whether the defendant knew the nature and quality of the act at the time of its commission, and the wrongfulness of the act. If he had sufficient mental capacity to know what he was doing, and to know that it was wrong, he is legally accountable for his act. Even though he may be mentally abnormal or defective, or may suffer from some nervous disorder, he is, under our law, held to full responsibility for his act, unless the evidence brings him within the strict legal meaning of insanity. See People v. Gilberg, 197 Cal. 306, 240 P. 1000; People v. Sloper, supra.

[4] Considerable testimony was presented at the trial which tended to show that the defendant was mentally defective. Indeed, two medical men, one produced by the defendant, and the other an alienist appointed by the court, were of the opinion that he was insane. Other witnesses, including neghbors of the defendant's family, testified to peculiar conduct on his part which tended, in their opinion, to show insanity. There was, however, a great deal of evidence to the contrary, both expert and nonexpert. In the face of this conflict, counsel for defendant concede, as they must, "that there is sufficient evidence in the record to sustain the verdict." Their appeal is taken on the theory that, where there is a strong conflict in the evidence, any substantial error in the proceedings might tip the scales and prejudice the rights of the defendant. We agree that this is so, and have accordingly examined the entire record to determine whether any such error is present. No charge is made that any evidence was improperly introduced; and an objection leveled at an instruction of the court may be disposed of with the observation that the instruction was full and correct in all respects. Apart from the attack on this one instruction, the alleged errors are all concerned with the conduct of the deputy district attorney.

[5, 6] The first of the instances of alleged misconduct was the comment by the deputy district attorney on the failure of the defense to call the family doctor of defendant as a witness. This is vigorously denounced as an attempt to inject matters outside the record. The record shows that the defendant had been a patient of Dr. Walker, that the doctor was present at the jail when the defendant was being examined by the medical experts, and that he was present during the court sessions and was identified by rising when his name was called by the deputy district attorney during the course of the trial. His name appears in the record in a number of places. Under the circumstances, we do not deem the statement to be reversible error, if it was error at all, although it would doubtless have been better practice to have made no such reference. That it was not considered serious misconduct by counsel for defendant is clear, for no motion was made to strike it out, and no request was made that the jury be instructed to disregard it. If it did constitute misconduct, the error could have been cured by such instruction.

[7] Considerable stress is laid also upon remarks of the deputy district attorney alleged to be derogatory to counsel for defendant. Of these, one example is sufficient: "* * * Who else in fact would be able to go out and find even a Hollywood actor doctor to come in and say, because a man had a little twitching of the eyes, he had four kinds of insanity. Those are the acts of the great D'Orr! No wonder he was able to tell you in advance of his prowess, victories and success in swaying juries, and of his success in persuading men against all evidence." Statements of this type can hardly be said to deserve the importance given them in the brief of appellant. It seems to us that, apart from the tribute, possibly a genuine one, made to defendant's counsel, the statement was nothing more than argument on the evidence, which is clearly within the proper scope of the closing address of the prosecutor.

We find none of the other assignments of misconduct worthy of mention, and we feel bound to say that, considering the length of the trial, the conduct of it was remarkably free from irregularities of any kind, and that the defendant was ably represented and his rights were safeguarded throughout the proceedings.

[8] A final point which requires disposition is the refusal of the trial court to grant the motion of counsel for defendant, made after the jury brought in its verdict, requesting that the defendant be tried as to his present sanity, under section 1368 of the Penal Code. The court's denial of this motion is assigned as error. We are satisfied, however, that the trial judge exercised a reasonable discretion in this instance. He had the opportunity to observe the defendant throughout the course of a protracted trial, and he concluded that the defendant's conduct at the trial was that of a sane man. Viewing this conclusion in the light of the evidence and verdict finding defendant to have been sane at the time of the commission of the act, the record discloses no ground upon which we might interfere.

It necessarily follows that the judgment and order of the trial court must be, and they are hereby, affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; PRESTON, J.; CURTIS, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; SHENK, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Albert C. Gunther, as administrator of the estate of Lawrence J. Gunther, deceased, against Ernest E. Thompson and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for appellant.

McCoy & Wetter and Fred C. Pugh, all of Red Bluff, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

[1] This appeal is taken by plaintiff, as administrator, from a judgment rendered in favor of defendants in an action praying for the cancellation and rescission of a written contract entered into by said intestate and defendant for the exchange of real and personal properties owned, respectively, by plaintiff's intestate, Lawrence J. Gunther, and defendant Dr. Ernest E. Thompson. The properties involved in the exchange owned by Lawrence J. Gunther in his lifetime consisted of farm lands situate near the city of Red Bluff, county of Tehama, a timber claim situate in the county of Humboldt, and two promissory notes, aggregating in value $8,500. The property owned by Dr. Ernest E. Thompson, which passed in the exchange, was the entire capital stock, to wit: 50,000 shares of the Quality Shop, Incorporated, the same being a gents' furnishing store of sixty-four years of business existence, located at 705 Main street, city of Red Bluff, county of Tehama. Said Lawrence J. Gunther, appellant's intestate, at the time the exchange was made was of the age of thirty-two years, and was born and reared on a farm within ten miles of Red Bluff, and was a customer of said Quality Shop in his lifetime and was personally acquainted with the employees of said Quality Shop. Some five days after the transaction and after said Lawrence J. Gunther had taken possession of the shop and its business both personally and with the assistance of a former manager and employee of said shop, he committed suicide. The exchange had been solicited by said deceased and was consummated through the agency of defendant Bruch, a real estate agent, who was found by the trial court to have been the agent of Gunther and not of respondent Thompson. Bruch, at the request of said Gunther, had attempted to negotiate exchanges of his real property on several prior occasions, but each attempt failed, generally because the properties proposed did not appear to said decedent to be good investment propositions. Bruch, on preparing the exchange agreement, used a printed form of contract for the sale of real estate without eliminating much of its inappropriate phraseology. Neither party, it would seem, had the aid of legal assistance. Bruch, who did not know that said Quality Shop was incorporated, merely described the property that was to pass to decedent as "that certain stock of merchandise and fixtures located at 705 Main street." Two supplemental escrow agreements were executed by the parties, which show their understanding as to what was actually exchanged and the property that decedent was to receive. Appellant does not press the several other grounds of fraud set forth in the complaint and which were found adversely to his contention by the trial court for the reason that the finding of a trial court as to a matter of fact, in a case where a conflict of evidence exists, will not be disturbed by an appellate court.

After the death of Lawrence J. Gunther, his personal representatives gave notice of rescission and tendered back the store and its contents. Respondents refused the offer.

[2, 3] The 50,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation were owned by said Thompson. One share of the stock had been issued to his son and one share to his nurse. Those two shares were assigned to respondent and he held them in his possession, making him the sole owner and holder of the entire issue. Appellant's grounds for the avoidance of the exchange is bottomed on the ground that the transaction was not one as between individuals, but a corporation transaction on the part of the corporation and inasmuch as there was no meeting of the directors authorizing the sale, or any formal action taken in compliance with section 361a, Civil Code, which provides that: "No sale, lease, assignment, transfer or conveyance of the business * * * or any corporation now existing * * * shall be valid without the consent of stockholders thereof, holding of record at least two-thirds of the issued capital stock of such corporation; * * *" the transaction amounted to a nullity. The provisions of section 361a are for the protection of stockholders and creditors of the corporation, and the stockholders and creditors alone have the right to object to such a transfer. Lost Burros Gold Mining Co. v. Inyo County Bank, 83 Cal. App. 679, 257 P. 209; South Pasadena v. Pasadena L. & W. Co., 152 Cal. 579, 93 P. 490. It would be a startling proposition to announce as a principle of law or equity jurisprudence that one, with knowledge that he is dealing with a corporation in the purchase of its stock, as in the instant case, may elect to take as assignment of all the capital stock of a corporation, together with every corporate privilege and right that its ownership conveyed, enter into possession of the business and property and thereafter be heard at will to repudiate the transaction on the ground of nonconformity by the corporation with the provisions of said section 361a. The decedent himself could not have repudiated the transaction, and it follows that his personal representative may not have greater rights.

The court found that the stock transfer was signed in blank by respondent and delivered to a bank to be held as security for decedent's indebtedness to respondent upon a deferred payment in the sum of $6,500 arising out of the transaction.

[4] There is no merit in the contention that decedent did not know that the Quality Shop was a corporation. Respondent testified that he discussed the subject with him, and it is incredible that he was not made acquainted with the fact by the papers and books which he examined in his investigation of the business done by the shop. The decedent became the owner of the stock the day he took possession, May 11, 1928, and he had the right from thence forward, if he desired to continue the corporate existence of the business, to elect directors and officers of his own choice and do every act which the franchise granted. It is also in evidence that the value of the property which the decedent received in the exchange was some $2,000 or $3,000 greater than the value of the property he parted with. This evidence was given by persons who were experienced and familiar with the Quality Shop and its business, and apparently disinterested in the result of the case. The trial court accepted their appraisement of values as against others who testified on the subject. The findings are quite lengthy. Every finding made by the court, with special emphasis on the one that the decedent knew at all times he was buying 50,000 shares of stock of the corporation, its entire issue, owned solely by respondent, finds ample support in the evidence.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

CHRIST v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

S. F. 13955.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 25, 1931.

1. Mandamus 🔑4(1).

Appeal is not always speedy or adequate remedy barring mandamus (Code Civ. Proc. § 1086).

2. Mandamus 🔑14(1).

Demand for new subpœna after quashing of original held not condition precedent to mandamus for commission to take testimony, where respondent court refused to compel witness' attendance.

3. Depositions 🔑39.

Commission to take testimony may issue on foreign letters rogatory showing pendency of either action or special proceeding to perpetuate testimony (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2021, 2035, 2036a, 2083 et seq., 2084).

> Code Civ. Proc. § 2021, provides that testimony of witness in state may be taken by deposition in action at any time after service of summons and in special proceeding after question of fact has arisen; section 2035 provides that any party to action or special proceeding in sister state may obtain testimony of witness residing in California for use in such action or proceeding; section 2036a provides that witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify in proceedings pending in foreign jurisdiction by same process as in proceedings pending in state; sections 2083 et seq. provide complete method for taking and perpetuating testimony of witness when no other action is pending; and section 2084 authorizes superior court to issue commission for such purpose on petition showing that applicant expects to be party to action in state court.

4. Evidence ⚷81.

Courts must presume, in absence of contrary showing, that law of foreign country is same as that of California.

5. Evidence ⚷81.

Court must presume, on mandamus for commission to take testimony on foreign letters rogatory, that proceedings to perpetuate testimony, like those authorized by state law, are pending in foreign country.

6. Mandamus ⚷40.

Petitioner held entitled to mandamus for commission to take deposition on letters rogatory in Spanish language, where English translation was filed before commencement of proceeding (Const. art. 4, § 24; Code Civ. Proc. § 2036a, and § 2083 et seq.).

> Const. art. 4, § 24, provides that judicial proceedings shall be in English language only.

7. Mandamus ⚷174.

Generally, facts existing when application for mandamus was made determine petitioner's right and respondent's duty.

8. Depositions ⚷40.

Foreign letters rogatory, to which were attached affidavit, verified before American consul general and transmitted with letters by foreign consul general, pursuant to foreign minister's instructions, held properly authenticated.

9. Depositions ⚷57.

Petition for subpœna, pursuant to order to take deposition, held sufficient, in view of attached affidavit as to facts expected to be proved (Code Civ. Proc. § 2084, subd. 3).

10. Depositions ⚷57.

Where right to subpœna, pursuant to order to take deposition, is statutory, motive of petitioner is immaterial, and court cannot deny it.

In Bank.

Original proceeding in mandamus by Rodolfo Christ against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and James G. Conlan, as Presiding Judge thereof.

Peremptory writ granted.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal in 287 P. 560.

George G. Olshausen and John B. Ehlen, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Orrick, Palmer & Dahlquist, Garret W. McEnerney, and Andrew F. Burke, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

A hearing was granted in this cause after decision by the District Court of Appeal. 287 P. 560, 561. After further consideration of all of the issues involved we adopt the following portions of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, of which Mr. Presiding Justice Nourse was the author, as the opinion pro tanto of this court:

"This is an original proceeding in mandamus to require the superior court to issue a commission for the taking of testimony of two witnesses upon letters rogatory issued out of a court of record of Guatemala.

"The letters rogatory were presented to respondent court showing that the petitioner represented to the Guatemala court that he was about to commence an action against Adolfo Stahl and the American Finance & Commerce Company, for which it was necessary that the depositions of J. Beaumont and Frank L. Jackson, residing in the city and county of San Francisco, be taken. In the proceeding before the Guatemalan court the general nature of the questions to be asked these witnesses was stated, accompanied by a showing of the materiality of their testimony. This showing having been made to the respondent court, an order that the deposition of Frank L. Jackson be taken was made and a subpoena was issued pursuant to said order. Thereafter a motion was made on behalf of said witness to quash said subpoena upon the grounds that the respondent court had no jurisdiction to make the order. This motion was granted, and respondent has since refused to take any other steps to compel attendance of said witness for the taking of his deposition in response to the letters issued by the Guatemalan court.

[1] "Preliminarily respondents argue that this is not a proper case for mandamus because the petitioner has another remedy by appeal from the order to quash the subpœna. The remedy by appeal, conceding that there is such, is not always an answer to a petition for mandamus. This writ must be issued when 'there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, in the ordinary course of law' (section 1086, Code Civ. Proc.); that the right of appeal is not always a speedy or adequate remedy is well settled. S. F. Gas & Electric Co. v. Superior Court, 155 Cal. 30, 39, 99 P. 359, 17 Ann. Cas. 933.

[2] "It is also argued that the petition is insufficient because it fails to allege a specific demand upon the respondent court to issue a new subpoena. Such a demand is excused when it appears that demand, if made, would have been futile. Here the petition alleges that the respondent refuses to take any steps whatever to compel the witness to attend the taking of his deposition and the answer admits this to be true. It thus appears that a formal demand for the relief prayed for would have been futile because the respondent court conceived that it was without jurisdiction to grant this relief. Such a demand was, therefore, unnecessary. 16 Cal. Jur., pp. 771, 772. * * *

[3] "Upon the merits of the case it is argued that the superior court is without jurisdiction to recognize the letters rogatory or to issue a subpœna for the taking of the deposition because it appears on the face of the petition that there is no action pending in the Guatemalan court. The authority to issue the commission upon letters issued out of a foreign jurisdiction is found in section 2036a, Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides that witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify in the same manner and by the same process as may be employed for taking testimony for proceedings pending in this state. Section 2021 of the same Code provides that the testimony of a witness in this state may be taken by deposition in an action any time after the service of summons and in a special proceeding after a question of fact has arisen therein. If this were the only provision for the taking of a deposition of a witness in proceedings pending in this state, the argument of respondent would be sound, but sections 2083 et seq. of the same Code provide a complete method for the taking and perpetuation of the testimony of a witness when no other action is pending. Section 2084 permits the superior court to issue a commission for that purpose upon a petition showing 'that the applicant expects to be a party to an action in a court in this state, and, in such case, the names of the persons whom he expects will be adverse parties; or * * * and, the name of the witness to be examined, his place of residence, and a general outline of the facts expected to be proved.'

"Respondent relies upon section 2035, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that 'any party to an action or special proceeding in a court or before a judge of a sister state, may obtain the testimony of a witness residing in this state, to be used in such action or proceeding.' It is argued that section 2036a must be read in connection with 2035 so that a commission shall not issue upon letters coming from a foreign jurisdiction to a better advantage than upon letters coming from a sister state of the United States, and that under the provisions of section 2035 such a commission cannot issue in any case, except where an action or special proceeding is pending in the sister state. If it were conceded that such should be the proper interpretation of section 2036a, this would not aid the respondent. Under the provisions of section 2035, relating to depositions upon letters coming from a sister state, and under section 2021, relating to proceedings pending in this state, the commission to take a deposition of a witness is authorized whenever an action or a special proceeding is pending. It is true that under section 2021 a commission may not issue in a special proceeding until after a question of fact has arisen, but the term 'special proceeding' as used in that section must be interpreted as including all special proceedings other than those to perpetuate testimony which are specially covered by sections 2083 et seq. of the same Code. Thus, when proceedings to perpetuate testimony are instituted under the provisions of the later sections, the deposition is to be issued in the manner therein prescribed, but there is no reason for holding that the term 'special proceeding' as used in section 2035 in reference to matters pending in a sister state does not apply to both characters of special proceedings—those referred to in section 2021 and those referred to in sections 2083 et seq. of the Code.

"Therefore, if we are to read section 2036a with section 2035, the construction of the latter section must be that a commission to take testimony may issue upon letters from a foreign jurisdiction showing the pendency of either an action or special proceeding as the latter term is used in our Code.

[4, 5] "On the record before us we must presume, in the absence of a contrary showing, that the law of Guatemala is the same as that of California. Wickersham v. Johnston, 104 Cal. 407, 38 P. 89, 43 Am. St. Rep. 118; 5 Cal. Jur. 431. We must, therefore, presume that the proceedings instituted in Guatemala are like the proceedings authorized by sections 2083 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that it is pending until such testimony is completed and the deposition duly filed with the court out of which the commission issued.

"We do not deem it necessary to discuss the authorities cited from federal and other jurisdictions, for they are all based upon statutes in nowise similar to the Code sections above noted. The question presented here is simply one of interpretation of these Code sections in which we are not aided by the citation of any California authorities."

Other points seemed to be worthy of consideration when the petition for hearing was granted.

It appears from the petition that on the 24th day of October, 1929, letters rogatory were secured by the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco from the office of the consul general of Guatemala at San Francisco, by a letter of transmission, addressed to said clerk. Attached to the letters rogatory was an affidavit of the petitioner herein purporting to have been subscribed and sworn to on July 15, 1929, before G. K. Donald, the American consul general at Guatemala. This affidavit set forth that the affiant is a stockholder of the Ocos Railroad Company, which is now dissolved; that affiant intends to file a suit in the courts of Guatemala against Adolfo Stahl and the American Finance Commerce Company alleging that the contemplated defendants and Schwartz Brothers, the predecessors in interest of the contemplated corporation defendant, fraudulently and illegally acquired control and possession and retained the profits arising from the operation of the Ocos Railroad Company from 1900 to 1910, and have not, according to affiant's knowledge, accounted to the stockholders of said railroad company; that on October 15, 1910, the contemplated defendants, in the name of Schwartz Brothers, sold said railroad to the Guatemala Central Railroad Company; that for the purpose of the contemplated suit it is necessary to ascertain what price was received by said Schwartz Brothers for said railroad; that the Pacific Improvement Company had a controlling interest in the Guatemala Central Railroad Company; that the books of the Pacific Improvement Company indicate what price was paid for the Ocos Railroad and that affiant has no other means of ascertaining the price so paid except by inspection of said books; and that said Frank L. Jackson is an officer of the Pacific Improvement Company residing in San Francisco.

When the letters rogatory and accompanying affidavits were presented to the respondent judge, an order was made directing that a subpoena issue commanding said Jackson to appear before a designated notary public on November 17, 1929, at 10 o'clock a. m., then and there to give his deposition in accordance with said letters rogatory. Thereafter a motion was made on behalf of the witness to set aside the order and to quash said subpoena on the ground that the respondent court had no jurisdiction to make the order, and that if the court had jurisdiction it should, in its discretion, deny it. In support of the motion an affidavit of Jean Wohlwind was filed wherein it was averred that neither of the contemplated defendants resided, was doing business, or had property in the republic of Guatemala; that there is pending in the District Court of the United States, in and for the Northern District of California, a suit by and on behalf of the stockholders of the Ocos Railroad Company for the identical purpose for which the contemplated suit in Guatemala is intended to be prosecuted; and that the purpose of the proposed deposition is in aid of the prosecution of the action in the United States court. A counter affidavit of Ricardo Kiobge was filed in which it was averred, on the information and belief of the affiant, that Stahl owned real and personal property in Guatemala and that the American Finance and Commerce Company has been and is now doing business in that republic. There is also an averment in the counteraffidavit that there is pending in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco an action on behalf of the stockholders of the Ocos Railroad Company against Stahl arising out of his relationship as a receiver of the Ocos Railroad Company and his handling of the funds of that corporation. The motion to quash was presented to the court, argued, and finally submitted for decision on November 20, 1929. At all times prior to December 2, 1929, the document designated as letters rogatory was entirely in the Spanish language with no accompanying English translation. All other documents were in English. On December 2d the petitioner filed with the clerk of said court an English translation of the letters rogatory. On December 31, 1929, the court granted the motion to quash the subpoena, and the present proceeding was commenced on January 24, 1930.

[6] Assuming, as respondents contend, that section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution, providing that judicial proceedings shall be in no other than the English language, is applicable to a proceeding to take a deposition under sections 2036a and 2083 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, nevertheless the position of the respondents is not advantaged thereby, because of the state of the record, which discloses that at the time of the commencement of this proceeding and of the issuance and service of the alternative writ herein and for some twenty days or more prior thereto there had been on file with the respondentt court an English translation of the Spanish letters rogatory and the English translation is attached to the petition herein.

[7] It is the general rule that the facts as they exist at the time the application for the writ of mandamus is made determine the right of the petitioner and the duty of the respondent. U. S. ex rel. International Contracting Co. v. Lamont, 155 U. S. 303, 308, 15 S. Ct. 97, 39 L. Ed. 160; Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36, 17 Am. Rep. 405; 38 C. J., p. 602.

[8] It is insisted that the letters rogatory were not properly authenticated. It appears that the affidavit of the petitioner attached to the letters was verified before the consul general of the United States at Guatemala and these documents were transmitted to the respondent court by the consul general of Guatemala located at San Francisco by a communication which recited that they were so transmitted pursuant to instructions of the Guatemalan minister at Washington, D. C. The letters rogatory, the accompanying affidavit, and the letters of transmittal were original documents and their genuineness was not denied in the answer to the petition herein. In addition there is much force in the contention of the petitioner that the original documents prove themselves. See Wickersham v. Johnston, 104 Cal. 407, 413, 38 P. 89, 43 Am. St. Rep. 118.

[9] It is also contended that the petition for the issuance of the subpoena does not state "a general outline of the facts expected to be proved," as required by subdivision 3 of section 2084 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We think the affidavit of the petitioner, the substance of which has been hereinbefore related, is a complete answer to this contention.

[10] The pendency of the actions in the state and federal courts in California involving the same issues, the adjudication of which is contemplated in the Guatemalan courts, lends strong support to the contention of counsel for the respondents that the proffered deposition of Jackson is but a "fishing expedition," and that the respondent court would be justified in refusing the subpoena if any discretion is reposed in the court so to do. However, we feel impelled to adhere to the rule that where, as here, the right to the subpœna is a statutory right, the motive of the party is immaterial and the court was without discretion to deny the same. Hobbs v. Tom Reed Gold Min. Co., 164 Cal. 497, 502, 129 P. 781, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1112; S. F. Gas & Electric Co. v. Superior Court, 155 Cal. 30, 39, 99 P. 359, 17 Ann. Cas. 933; Johnson v. Langdon, 135 Cal. 624, 626, 67 P. 1050, 87 Am. St. Rep. 156; Poor v. Yarnell, 28 Cal. App. 714, 153 P. 976.

No other points require discussion.

Let the peremptory writ issue as prayed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Action by Angele Bazet, formerly Angele Beaudry, against Nugget Bar Placers, Inc., and others. From the judgment rendered, defendant named appeals.

Reversed.

H. R. Given, of Weaverville, and Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for appellant.

Dozier & Kimball, F. J. Solinsky, and Edw. R. Solinsky, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J.

This appeal involves a controversy between respondent and appellant as to the first and superior right of said parties herein to the use of the waters of the East fork of Stuart's fork of the Trinity river and Strope creek, respectively, which are of first importance to conducting and carrying on hydraulic mining operations. Strope creek is a tributary of the East fork of Stuart's fork of the Trinity river. The East fork of Stuart's fork of Trinity river, which is the main stream, will, for the sake of brevity, hereafter be referred to as the East fork. The mining claims belonging to or in the lawful possession of said parties, both as to patented and unpatented claims, are within adjacent areas, situate in Minersville mining district, county of Trinity. No question as to title or the possessory rights of either party is involved in the appeal.

Beginning with some time prior to the month of December, 1898, Fred Beaudry, the former husband of respondent, patented eight and located twenty-one other mining claims in said district, which he began operating and continued to operate intermittently until his death, which occurred in 1912, by the use of such waters as were appendant or appurtenant to said mining claims, or which were acquired by prescription or user, together with the diversion of large quantities of waters from said East fork, a stream of considerable volume, and Strope creek. Respondent, as the widow of said Fred Beaudry, succeeded to his entire interests. After his death, six additional mining claims were located in 1914 and 1915, which also form a part of the mining properties of respondent.

It was claimed at the trial and found as a fact by the court that for more than ten years immediately preceding June 14, 1913, to wit, June 14, 1903, respondent's said predecessor in interest became, and she as his successor in interest now is, the owner of the first right to divert and use all the waters of said streams to the extent of 6,000 miners' inches of the first flow of East fork and 2,000 miners' inches of the first flow of Strope creek, measured under a six-inch pressure, and is entitled to divert the entire flows of said streams at such times as either or both of said streams should from natural causes become diminished below the amounts awarded by the judgment to respondent. In the month of September, 1922, appellant entered into the possession of a group of mining claims situate at a point below the confluence of Strope creek with said East fork, and began to operate them. All of appellant's claims are riparian to said East fork, while none of respondent's claims is riparian to said East fork. Said Fred Beaudry, respondent's former husband, during the early period mentioned, in preparing to engage in hydraulic mining operations, intercepted the waters of North fork by constructing a wooden dam across said stream at a point several miles northerly from the situs of his own mining activities and approximately an equal distance from the situs of appellant's present mining claims and conducted the waters of said stream into a system of ditches and waterways which he constructed. The water first enters North fork ditch, a portion of which feeds the Greenhorn ditch and its branches, and the remaining portion continues southerly, intercepting and transporting in its course the waters of Strope creek. From that point it takes the name of Diener ditch. In its lower reaches it ramifies into branches known as the Ridgeville ditch, Upper ditch, and Lower ditch. Respondent's diversion works and conduit system consists of dams and headgates, ditches, old creek channels, flumes, and ravines. The system is quite primitive in construction, and there is, no doubt, some wastage of water in the course of transportation. An ancient ditch or water course called Unity ditch parallels the East fork in its southerly course, which water was diverted by appellant by means of a dam constructed across said stream. It seems that it had fallen into disuse until appellant recently restored it. This dam is located a number of miles southeasterly from respondent's dam and several miles northerly and upstream from appellant's operative grounds. Said Unity ditch in its course southerly crosses Strope creek at a point near its confluence with East fork.

On June 14, 1923, and again on July 3, 1923, appellant obstructed the flow of water of East fork into respondent's intake and diversion works, which obstructions, and threatened obstructions, resulted in the commencement of this action, in which it was adjudged that respondent had a legal right and claim to take and divert, and that she owned, 6,000 miners' inches, measured under a six-inch pressure, of the first flow and was entitled to the first right to divert and use said quantity of the waters of the East fork, and also 2,000 miners' inches of the waters of Strope creek, similarly measured, and for similar purposes, during all seasons of the year from January 1st to December 1st, inclusive, for operation and development work in and about said mines, including 10 miners' inches thereof, for irrigation and domestic purposes. Respondent's title was quieted to the extent of said quantities of water against any and all claims of appellant, and appellant was perpetually enjoined from maintaining any dam or obstruction in the channel of said East fork or Strope creek, or in any way interfering with the flow of the waters of either or both of said streams into respondent's diversion works, or to or upon her mining properties, to the full amounts awarded by said judgment. The judgment further decreed that appellant is entitled to divert and use 2,500 miners' inches of the waters of said East fork, measured under a six-inch pressure, during all seasons of each year for mining purposes upon appellant's mining properties over and above and subject and subordinate to the 6,000 miners' inches of the first flow of said stream which was awarded to respondent. This award was doubtless made to accord with the permit issued to appellant by the State Department of Public Works, Division of Water Rights, on February 6, 1923, granting to appellant, subject to prior vested rights, the right to divert by means of the Unity dam and ditch 2,500 miners' inches of water from East fork and Strope creek, and was not intended to limit appellant in the exercise of its riparian rights, but only as an appropriator. The state by its permit designated the amount of water that appellant might take at the point of diversion, and the court made it plain that it did not in any wise modify the water commission's order. As a matter of fact, the appellant was awarded the full quantity of water asked for in its answer by means of Unity ditch, subject, however, to the first right of respondent to receive the quantity which the decree awarded her. The only impediment placed in appellant's way as far as receiving the quantity asked for, is said first right of respondent.

[1] From the decree as above outlined, the appeal was taken by Nugget Bar Placers, Inc., a corporation, assigning a number of grounds as constituting reversible error. Appellant concedes respondent's claim to the ten miners' inches of water awarded to her for irrigation and domestic purposes, and makes no complaint as to that portion of the decree. Respondent concedes that error was committed inadvertently in the judgment which provides for the measurement of said awarded quantities of water to be made under a six-inch pressure rather than a four-inch pressure, and consents that the judgment be modified to the extent of basing the award upon a four-inch pressure to conform with the proofs, and, as so modified, asks that the judgment be affirmed. Complaint is also made to the order of the court reopening the case for the reception of further evidence after both sides had announced that neither had any further evidence to offer, wherefore the court made a written announcement of its decision to the effect that respondent was entitled to judgment awarding her the first flow of the waters of the East fork and Strope creek in the same quantities and measured by the same pressure as set forth in the signed decree herein, but limited the period of use from May 1st to November 1st of each year, and awarded to appellant the first flow of all the waters of said streams during the months from November 1st to May 1st of each year, and also to all the waters flowing in said streams without limitation as to quantity in excess of the amounts awarded to respondent during the period from May 1st to November 1st of each year. No findings or decree had been signed binding the court to its informal decision, and some time thereafter and before findings and conclusions of law or judgment had been prepared or signed, the court made an order setting aside said decision and reopened the case for the single purpose of receiving evidence as to whether during the months of November, December, January, February, and March of each year, beginning with November 1, 1913, to and including April 1, 1923, there had been sufficient water flowing in said streams to conduct and operate the mining properties of respondent as a hydraulic mine as the same had been operated for many years prior to November 1, 1913. The reason given for reopening the case was that the evidence was silent as to an important matter. We see no abuse of discretion on the part of the court in reopening the case for the reception of additional evidence on an important branch of the case, and it does not appear that the appellant was surprised or was in any manner prejudiced by the court's action. The cause was still within the control of the court. Whether the evidence introduced upon the reopening of the case supplied the deficiencies pointed out by the court could not affect the question of the reasonable exercise of judicial discretion. This brings us to the consideration of the more substantial assignments of error.

Appellant insists that a proper regard for the fundamental rights of a riparian landowner to the use of at least a portion of the waters of a stream which flows over its lands as against a nonriparian owner who asserts the right to use all the waters of such a stream, founded upon user, appropriation, or prescription, imposes upon such a claimant the onus of establishing her claim by evidence more convincing in effect and more definite in character than the evidence which has been adduced by respondent in support of her claim. Especially it is contended that the evidence impels, at least, a reasonable partition of said waters, regulated by hours of use or a limitation as to quantity. Appellant further contends that whatever rights respondent may have acquired from 1903 to 1913, were lost by nonuse and abandonment during the period from 1913 to the commencement of this action, which was filed in 1923, and that the evidence does not sustain the finding that respondent or her predecessor used the waters of either of said streams in the operation of hydraulic or placer mines continuously or consecutively for the statutory five years' prescriptive period at any time during her ownership or the ownership of her predecessor either as to the quantity or for beneficial or useful purposes as found by the court, or that said waters were used for mining or other beneficial purposes during any month from November to May of the succeeding year during the entire term of occupancy and ownership of respondent and her predecessor. It is also earnestly contended that said mines were at no time operated as such for a consecutive period of five years from November to May of each succeeding year. This contention has not been satisfactorily met. It cannot be successfully contended that respondent's mines were operated as such from May to November of any year beginning with 1903 and ending at the time suit was filed, to wit, August 3, 1923. But very little work of any kind was done in or about said mining claims during any month or season after the death of Fred Beaudry, the original owner, which occurred in 1912. No claim is made that any work was done upon the properties for more than a year after his death. The only work done during the ten years succeeding his death was occasional ground sluicing, piping, and such annual assessment work as was necessary to protect respondent's rights. The Diener flume, which had a carrying capacity of approximately one-half of the waters of the two streams combined, went out in the winter of 1914–15 and was never restored. A portion of the flume of the Lower ditch went out in 1912, and was restored in 1922 to a carrying capacity of about 500 inches. Appellant complains, not entirely without reason, that no actual measurements were ever made, and no data or other information is to be found in the record by which any estimate may be made as to the quantity of water Strope creek carried at any season. It is admitted that East fork ditch, under a four-inch pressure, has a carrying capacity of the amount of water respondent claims to have diverted, but it is disputed that the balance of the equipment had such capacity or that said amount of water was applied to a useful or beneficial purpose, the burden of so doing being upon plaintiff respondent. On the other hand, respondent contends that she and her predecessor used the full maximum quantity of waters, to wit, 6,000 miners' inches, which debouched from the East fork into the intake of the East fork ditch, and 2,000 additional inches at a point lower down, necessary in the reasonable operation and developing of her mining claims, from 1903 until she was prevented from continuing operations by reason of an extended period of insufficient fall of rain and snow in the mountain regions which reduced the flow of said streams to a point where it was impossible to operate her mines by the hydraulic process, or from doing any kind of work other than occasional ground sluicing. This period of marked decrease in the water supply, it is contended, began with the year 1913 and continued for a period of approximately ten years, with the possible exception of one or two years when storm conditions were somewhat normal. There is testimony to the effect that in some years the snow packs dropped from the normal depth of four feet to twelve or sixteen inches. Respondent sought to excuse the shutting down and practical suppression of operations during said period to changed weather conditions rather than to any fault chargeable to her. One or two witnesses produced by her testified that the flow of water in said streams at certain seasons of certain years was as low as 300, 500, and 1,000 miners' inches. Testimony was also adduced on her part that it was necessary to close the headgate of North fork ditch during the winter and early spring months in order to protect the flumes and lower ditches from damage which would result from the débris and detritus which the torrential storms would have brought with them. The country in which the mines are located is mountainous and rugged. The area of the watershed which feeds the streams is some ten or twelve square miles. The extent of the mining operations carried on by respondent or her predecessor were at no time extensive, and at no time does it appear from the evidence that the number of workmen employed exceeded six or eight men, and the inference is that at times there was not more than one employee, if any. The development work was begun by Fred Beaudry in 1903. Some of the claims were worked by tenants for periods of one, two, and three seasons. It appears that Beaudry did some hydraulic mining at intervals and in a limited fashion through the years of his occupancy, and that three giant monitors were brought to the property at different periods. Appellant contends that said giants could not have handled anything like 8,000 miners' inches of water. It appears that some tunneling was done upon the original Beaudry claims and a sawmill of unknown capacity was early constructed upon said premises, which it is claimed cut 115,000 square feet of timber for flume repairing and other purposes in 1915. No evidence has been pointed out in the briefs showing that said mines ever produced precious metals in paying quantities or at all. The results of ground sluicing, which was practically the only method claimed to have been used from 1913 to 1923 as a mining process, were kept out of evidence upon the objection of respondent. In an effort to rebut the claim that any ground sluicing had been done in good faith (1913–1923) and that, if any water not under pressure was used to flood the surface of any of the claims as indicating ground sluicing, it was done as a mere pretense, as no "clean-ups" of sluice boxes were ever made, and consequently no accounting could have been made as to any gold or other precious metals obtained from such a process.

nephew of respondent. He was frequently upon the premises during the lifetime of Mr. Beaudry, and after his death he became the manager or agent for respondent. His testimony shows beyond question that the headgate of the East fork ditch was closed from November 1st of each year until approximately May 1st of the succeeding year during the ownership of both Fred Beaudry and respondent; further, that the mining season, under the weather conditions which there existed, began with May and concluded before the close of the year. The greatest shortage of water was suffered during the fall and winter months, and the high flows were during the freshet seasons of the spring and the summer months, June, July, and a part of August, before the snows had melted completely under the heat of the spring and summer months.

[3, 4] It is very apparent, as the record now stands, that neither Fred Beaudry nor respondent acquired either title to or a right to use all of the waters of East fork, or did use said waters during a considerable portion of the year measured from November 1st to April or May 1st. Appellant's counsel during the progress of the trial conceded that the evidence showed that the mining season began usually in May, some years in April. This question on the state of the record before us is not open to controversy. Respondent never acquired a prescriptive right to the use of waters during a period in which she did not use said waters, at least as to the quantity for which she here contends. This question has been settled by many decisions of this state, and there is no difference where waters are sought for irrigation purposes or for any one of the many industrial affairs of the state. The value of water is too great to permit it to be withheld from use. The principle, reduced to what may be termed its minutest terms, is clearly set forth in Northern California Power Co. v. Flood, 186 Cal. 301, 199 P. 315, 317, where it is said: "The evidence leaves the question of the use of the water during the nighttime uncertain, not showing clearly whether the continuous use spoken of was during the day only or both day and night for the entire irrigating season. The value of water for irrigation is too great in this state to allow a landowner to gain a right thereto for the entire 24 hours of each day by using the same for only a half or any other portion of the time less than the whole. If he has used it continuously for a certain period each day long enough to gain a prescriptive right to such use, he would have the right only for that period, and he could not lawfully object to the use by others of the flow during the intervening time of each day."

[5] We find it rather difficult upon the evidence to convince ourselves that respondent or her predecessor ever used the entire volume of 8,000 miners' inches of water for useful purposes on the Beaudry premises. There is a very serious question as to whether the ditches and flumes had a capacity to carry more than 6,800 to 7,000 miners' inches. Next it is not pointed out what beneficial uses this vast quantity of water could have been applied to. That some water was devoted to beneficial uses and that such uses have grown into a legal right there is no doubt, but there is grave doubt as to the need of respondent for the quantity of water which she would have awarded to her. Counsel on both sides have elaborately briefed the law as to the means and methods by which the appropriative and prescriptive uses and rights of a nonriparian appropriator of the waters of a stream may be lost to a riparian owner. It is respondent's contention that the right to the use of water once acquired by prescription becomes a vested absolute right which cannot be lost or divested by nonuser, howsoever long said use be discontinued. We do not deem that question controlling in the instant case, for the reason that the first question here for determination is whether the appropriative rights of respondent ever ripened into a prescriptive right. In short, does the evidence show, first, that she or her predecessor ever used all of said waters during the months above pointed out; and, second, did said parties devote the full quantities taken to a useful or beneficial purpose? Those are the main points upon which the reversal is urged.

[6] We cannot agree with the proposition that one whose appropriation right has developed in a prescriptive right may permit water thus appropriated to run to waste for an indeterminate period as against riparian owners upon the stream who can use it and have undertaken to put said waters to a beneficial use. This contention is contrary to the spirit and purpose of section 20a of the State Water Commission Act (Stat. 1917, pp. 746, 748) and is not in harmony with a long list of decisions of the courts of this state. The rule applicable to this case is well stated as follows in Lindblom v. Round Valley Water Co., 178 Cal. 450, 173 P. 994, 996: "The theory underlying section 1411 * * * is thus explained in the decision on the first appeal in Smith v. Hawkins: 'Considering the necessity of water in the industrial affairs of this state, it would be a most mischievous perpetuity which would allow one who has made an appropriation of a stream to retain indefinitely, as against other appropriators, a right to the water therein, while failing to apply the same to some useful or beneficial purpose.' 110 Cal. 127, 42 P. 454. The reasoning is as applicable to the situation of the parties in this case as it was to that of the opposing claimants in Smith v. Hawkins.

There, as here, a valid appropriation had been made while the land below the point of diversion was still a part of the public domain. There, as here, a part of that land, bordering on the stream, had passed into the ownership of one claiming a superior right in the flow as against the prior appropriator who, it was asserted, had failed to apply the water to a beneficial use. The defendant's position is not strengthened by resting its right on the basis of prescription. All it could acquire, by diverting or impounding the water, was a usufructuary right (Wiel on Water Rights [3d Ed.] § 18), not an ownership in the corpus of the water, except, perhaps, so much thereof as it has actually reduced to possession in its reservoir. The matter here in dispute is, not the ownership of any particular quantity now impounded but the right to dam and control the water as it runs into and through Round Valley. Storage of water in a reservoir is not in itself a beneficial use. It is a mere means to the end of applying the water to such use. Kinney on Irrigation (2d Ed.) p. 1480. The defendant's prescriptive rights do not extend to the impounding of the water for the mere purpose of holding it in storage. If, then, the defendant has ceased for a period of more than five years to apply to a beneficial use any part of the water so retained and impounded by it, the considerations of public policy pointed out in Smith v. Hawkins, supra, demand that it shall not be permitted to continue the diversion and storage of the excess over its legitimate needs, and thus prevent the application of such excess to the needs of others who, if there had been no impounding by the defendant, would have been entitled to use it. The evidence in this case fairly shows that for a period of more than five years before the commencement of the action the defendant had not applied to beneficial uses all of the water so impounded by its dam and reservoir. While there is some suggestion in the evidence that the defendant supplied water for irrigation, as well as for mining purposes, the record indicates very clearly that the service of water for irrigation was too trifling to be worth considering." Doubtless there is considerable seepage of water through the East fork dam built to prevent the flow of water down the main channel to appellant's mining properties, as its construction is of boulders and earth material, but the greater volume of the stream's flow is held back by the obstruction.

[7] The mining section involved is within the country known and designated as the "Weaverville Quadrant." Appellant, in rebuttal of testimony offered by respondent as to the depletion of the water flow from 1913 to 1923 called a witness who was, and for many years had been, generally familiar with the weather, water, and mining conditions of said area, and proceeded to examine him as to the rain and snowfall in other portions of said area, to which objection was sustained. The mountain areas being generally similar in climatic conditions, we are of the view that said evidence should have been received.

We fully appreciate the difficult problems which the judge of the trial court was called upon to decide, but, after a considerable time spent in the examination of the questions presented, we are of the opinion that a better adjustment of the conflicting claims of the litigants could be made upon a retrial.

For the reasons above assigned, the judgment is reversed.

Habeas corpus ⚷3.

Whether petitioner was Indian and exempt from vagrancy law held not determinable by habeas corpus, being determinable in prosecution (Pen. Code, § 647).

Application by Richard Latourell for writ of habeas corpus to secure release from custody under a municipal court charge for vagrancy.

Application denied.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM.

An application for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner is charged by a complaint filed in the municipal court of the city and county of San Francisco with a misdemeanor, to wit, vagrancy. The form of the complaint is not questioned, but section 647 of the Penal Code defining vagrancy, by its terms, is not operative, however, against a "California Indian," and it is alleged in the petition for this writ that petitioner "is an Indian of the Yakima Tribe, of Yakima, Washington." He contends, therefore, that the municipal court is without jurisdiction to try him for the offense of vagrancy. Admittedly, however, the municipal court has jurisdiction in vagrancy cases, and therefore the question of whether or not petitioner is of the race which exempts him from the operation of the vagrancy law manifestly is one of fact which must be determined upon trial of the action. It is not a proper subject of inquiry before this court in a proceeding on habeas corpus. The application is therefore denied.

Petition by Robert L. Dallas for writ of prohibition to be directed to Lincoln S. Church, Judge of the Superior Court for Alameda County.

Petition denied.

H. H. McPike, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM.

Petition for writ of prohibition.

[1, 2] It appears therefrom that Mary Hickman died on March 3, 1930. Thereafter an instrument in writing, purporting to be her last will and testament, was filed by A. B. Costigan, one of the executors thereof. Costigan subsequently applied to be appointed special administrator of said estate. One Robert L. Dallas filed his answer to said petition and prayed that the petition be denied, and that special letters upon said estate be issued to him. In his answer Dallas alleged that he was an heir at law of the deceased. Further answering, he alleged that the instrument filed by Costigan as the last will and testament was not her last will, as the testatrix by an instrument in writing other than a will, but executed with all the formalities thereof, which instrument was entirely written, dated, and signed in the handwriting of Mary Hickman, revoked all wills made by her. This revocation was executed subsequent to the making of the will in question. It is alleged in the petition that the court, after a hearing, has expressed the opinion that the petition of the executor to be appointed special administrator should be granted. The filing of the instant petition followed. It is manifest that upon the execution of the revocation all former wills made by the deceased ceased to exist. Proceedings for the administration of estates of deceased persons are purely statutory.

[3-5] In making the appointment of a special administrator the court must give preference to the person entitled to letters testamentary, or of administration, but no appeal may be taken from such order. Costigan is only entitled to appointment by reason of the fact that he is named as one of the executors of the will which has been revoked. Beyond this he has no standing. Conceding the allegations of the petition to be true, the court would commit gross error in appointing him special administrator. Dalgren v. Superior Court, 8 Cal. App. 622, 97 P. 681. However, this question cannot be raised under the present proceeding. The appointment of a stranger as a special administrator of the estate of a deceased person in preference to an heir, devisee, or legatee constitutes an error in the exercise of jurisdiction which, however gross, cannot be questioned upon prohibition. Here the court has jurisdiction to hear and determine the application and decide it correctly or incorrectly. Dalgren v. Superior Court, supra.

For the reasons given the petition is denied.

1. Judgment ⚷586(2).

Judgment in action upon open account, wherein issue tried was that of rental of farm machinery, held res judicata of subsequent action for rental of farm machinery; causes of action being identical.

Stenographic report of testimony taken at prior action was properly admitted in determining plea of res judicata.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Bruce Goodman against F. H. Dam. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Fred M. Harter, of Marysville, for appellant.

F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant had judgment in the trial court, and from this judgment the plaintiff appeals. The judgment went in favor of the defendant by reason of his plea of res adjudicata.

The complaint in this action seeks judgment against the defendant for and on account of an assigned claim from L. A. Dunning to the plaintiff, wherein and whereby it is claimed that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $481.25, in consideration of certain work and labor performed, and money expended by said L. A. Dunning, in and about the repair and upkeep of certain tractors, discs, harrows, and other equipment rented by the said L. A. Dunning to the said F. H. Dam. The defendant in this action pleaded a prior judgment involving the same cause of action. The complaint in the prior cause of action is in the following words: "Defendant heretofore became indebted to Lew Dunning (assignor of plaintiff) upon an open account, for labor and materials sold and delivered, at the defendant's special instance and request, in the sum of $427.50." In the instant action the complaint alleges a payment in the sum of $53.75, which leaves the amount sued for in both actions exactly the same.

[1] While several questions have been presented as to the sufficiency of the pleadings in this action, only one question really possesses sufficient merit to call for an expression of opinion herein, to wit: Whether the two causes of action are identical; that is, whether the basis of the two causes of action is the same, even though the complaints are couched in different allegations.

In the present action the complaint, without any ambiguity or concealment of the true cause of action, alleges that the amount claimed from the defendant is due for and on account of the rental of certain farming machinery. In the prior cause of action the complaint is so worded as not to express the real substance of the action, as it only sets forth that the account constituting the indebtedness is for labor and materials sold and delivered by Dunning to the defendant. In the present action, the answer of the defendant pleads the previous action as a bar, and sets forth that the same questions were therein determined as are involved in the present action. Upon the trial of the instant action, there being no question as to the claim of the indebtedness being based upon an alleged rental of certain farming machinery, the only question tried by the court was as to what was really involved in the prior action. To determine this issue, the court admitted the judgment roll, and also the reporter's transcript of the testimony taken in the first action. From this testimony it appears without any conflict that, while the complaint in the first action was worded as we have herein stated, the rental of the farm machinery was involved and was the basis of the suit. To show this, we have only to quote a short excerpt from the testimony, to wit (testimony of Dunning, the assignor of the plaintiff in both actions):

"By Mr. Harter: Q. Now, state whether or not at any time you rented a tractor or farming machinery to F. H. Dam? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What kind of machinery was that, Mr. Dunning? A. 75 Best and disc.

"Q. How many 75's? A. Two 75's.

"Q. And any other equipment besides? A. some discs, disc-harrows, they called them.

"Q. You say you never spoke to Mr. Dam about this bill? A. No, sir.

"Q. You never sent Mr. Dam a bill for any work at all, did you? A. No, sir.

"Q. How many times were you present when it was working? A. I would say not less than five or six times.

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

"Q. And how long were you there on each of those five or six times? A. Not very long.

"Q. A few minutes? A. Yes, sir."

We might quote additional testimony to the same effect, but it is sufficient to say that all of the testimony in the first case related to the alleged rental of the farming machinery mentioned in the complaint in this action. The findings were waived in the first action, but a review of the testimony shows that there was a failure of proof to establish the fact of the rental of the farming machinery to the defendant in that action, who is the defendant in this action.

[2] At the trial of this action, objection was made to the introduction of the judgment roll, and also as to the introduction of the stenographic report of the testimony adduced at the prior action. The ruling of the court admitting such testimony is assigned as error.

In 34 C. J. 1074, we find the following: "In making good the plea of res adjudicata the evidence must necessarily vary with the nature of the issues presented in the first trial. The usual and appropriate manner of making this proof is to offer the judgment roll and other parts of the record. But the inquiry is not limited to the mere formal judgment. It extends to the pleadings and other documents prepared and filed in the case, agreements of counsel on file, stenographic reports or minutes of the testimony taken, the evidence submitted, the respective contentions of the parties, the testimony of the judge and jurors who tried the case, the rulings and findings of the court, the court's charge or instructions to the jury, the verdict, the bill of exceptions or case prepared for appeal, the evidence that the parties alleged to have been estopped sought to amend their pleading so as to have the question determined, but that the amendment was disallowed," etc. It is further held in the same volume, page 1076, that parol evidence is admissible to identify the points or issues adjudicated in the former action, when the record thereof is silent or ambiguous on this point. In the present case, the court did not allow an amendment of the pleadings in the first trial, but, as it appears that the testimony was admitted showing the actual facts of the case and the merits of the controversy to be the same in both instances, no prejudice resulted by reason of the pleadings being allowed to remain, as they were in the first action so ambiguous as not to disclose the real merits of the contention.

In Rauer v. Rynd, 27 Cal. App. 556, 150 P. 780, 782, this court quoted with approval the following from 23 Cyc. 1300, to wit: "The true test is identity of issues. If a particular point or question is in issue in the second action, and the judgment will depend upon its determination, a former judgment between the same parties will be final and conclusive in the second, if that same point or question was in issue and adjudicated in the first suit; otherwise not." In the same action this court further said: "But the rule is equally well settled that: 'If it does not appear from the record that the cause of action in the former suit was identical with that in the action in which it is pleaded in bar, this fact may be proved by evidence aliunde' "—citing 23 Cyc. 1535. "In Gray v. Dougherty, 25 Cal. 266, it is stated as follows: 'The issues passed on in a former suit may be ascertained by an inspection of the judgment roll; and, if that fails to disclose all the facts necessary to a complete determination of the question, a resort may be had to extrinsic evidence.' " To the same effect is the case of Horton v. Goodenough, 184 Cal. 451, 194 P. 34. On page 461 of 184 Cal., 194 P. 34, 38, the authorities which we have cited relative to the rule of admitting extrinsic evidence will be found. Other cases might be cited, but they all uphold the rule followed by the trial court in this cause in admitting the stenographic report of the evidence introduced at the prior action.

From this testimony only one conclusion can be reached: That the cause of action in both cases is identical, and that the plea of res adjudicata is good.

The judgment is affirmed.

MONTES et ux. v. PECK et ux.

Civ. 351.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

March 4, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 27, 1931.

1. Release ⚷57(1).

Evidence showed that release of vendor from effect of misrepresentations regarding rentals applied to all leases.

2. Release ⚷17(1).

Release of vendor from effect of misrepresentations was subject to be set aside for fraud.

3. Release ⚷57(2).

Evidence showed release of vendor from effect of misrepresentations regarding income of property was induced by fraud.

4. Release ⚷17(1).

Purchaser's release of vendor from effect of misrepresentations regarding income of property, in consideration of price reduction, held part of entire agreement, and fraud inducing release tainted entire transaction.

> It appeared that, when purchaser discovered misrepresentations as to some leases, he insisted on reduction in purchase price as condition of consummating sale, and agreement was executed wherein purchaser released vendor from effect of such representations in consideration of reduction in purchase price. It afterwards transpired that vendor had made misrepresentations regarding main lease in building and had effectually prevented discovery of such misrepresentations until some time after consummation of purchase. Hence such further fraud tainted, not only release, but entire transaction of which release was part.

5. Fraud ⚷31.

Defrauded purchaser may rescind or affirm and sue for damages.

6. Release ⚷24(2).

Where release of vendor from effect of misrepresentations was induced by fraud and part of entire transaction tainted by same fraud, purchaser was not required to rescind release and restore consideration before suing for damages.

> Purchaser received nothing in consideration of release except reduction in purchase price. He had right to retain property which he purchased and sue for such damages as were suffered through fraud of vendor.

7. Release ⚷24(2).

Where release of vendor from misrepresentations was itself induced by fraud tainting entire transaction, it was not inequitable to permit purchaser to retain purchase price reduction forming consideration for release and recover damages, where reduction plus judgment was less than loss.

Action by Rodolfo Montes and wife against C. L. Peck and wife. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs against named defendant, the latter appeals.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an action for damages for fraud and misrepresentation in the sale of certain real property. The defendant, C. L. Peck, owned a building in Los Angeles, various portions of which had been leased to different persons for shops, stores, offices, and a public garage. In October, 1926, Peck gave to a real estate agent named Canon a written "exclusive option to buy or sell" the property, and furnished him with a list of the various leases, with the time they were to run and the amounts of rental provided for. Two such statements of leases and rentals, one of which was signed by Peck, were shown by Canon to the plaintiff Rodolfo Montes, who agreed to purchase the property at a certain price. Peck and Canon then went into an escrow for the sale of the property, and on December 24, 1926, Canon substituted Montes for himself, as a party to that escrow. In the original list referred to, it was stated that the lease on the public garage ran for ten years, the first five years at $550 a month and the second five years at $600 a month. How or when it got there does not appear, but there later appeared in this escrow a letter from Peck to Canon, dated December 24, 1926, showing that four or five of the tenants were paying a lesser amount of rent than the rentals listed, but still listing the garage as then paying $550 a month. Montes, being unable to speak the English language very well, sent one of his employees to interview the various tenants, giving her a list of the rentals they were supposed to be paying, as shown by the statements furnished him. She found four or five cases in which the tenants were paying a smaller rental than that represented. However, the tenant in the garage assured her that he was making money; that the lease was exactly as represented; that he was paying $550 a month for the first five years and $600 for the remaining five years; that his rent was paid up to date; and that he was well satisfied with his lease. Upon receiving this information, Montes called Canon's attention to the discrepancies found, and Canon referred him to Peck. On January 6, 1927, Montes and Peck, with their respective attorneys, met to discuss the matter. Montes asked for a reduction of $5,000 in the purchase price because of the discrepancy discovered in the amounts of rent paid. Peck expressed surprise that Canon had not advised Montes of these discrepancies in rent, and took him to the escrow office and showed him his letter to Canon of December 24, 1926, wherein he set forth that he was receiving a lesser amount of rent in the instances in which Montes had discovered a discrepancy, but in which he again asserted that he was receiving $550 per month for the garage. Peck then offered to reduce the purchase price in the amount of $2,000, which offer was accepted, and Montes agreed to go ahead with the deal. This agreement was arrived at on January 7, 1927, at which time Montes signed a paper prepared by Peck's attorney, reading as follows:

"Los Angeles, California, January — 1927

"Mr. C. L. Peck, Los Angeles, California.

"Dear Sir: Please be referred to Escrow No. 959342 of Title Insurance and Trust Company, through which said escrow I expect to acquire title to certain property therein particularly described. Some question has heretofore arisen with reference to the income which the owner of said property is entitled to receive by reason of the existing leases. In consideration of the payment to me by you through said escrow of the sum of two thousand dollars ($2,000.00), I hereby agree that, upon the consummation of such sale through escrow, I will have no claim against you should it develop that the income from said property is less than the income as represented to me; provided, however, that this shall not release you from the effect of your representations in connection with the rental and lease deposit adjustment made through said escrow, and provided, further, that this release is upon the express condition that no new leases shall be made covering any portion of said property and no changes shall be made in any existing leases covering any portion of said property pending the close of said escrow.

"Yours truly, R. Montes."

Later, the deal was closed, the consideration paid, and a deed and assignments of the various leases were delivered to Montes. The evidence shows that, for a long period of time prior to the closing of this deal, Peck had been receiving, as rental for the garage mentioned, a sum very much less than $550 a month, and further that Peck had told the tenant of the garage that he desired to sell the property and had asked him to tell any one who inquired that he was paying $550 a month. Even after Montes took possession of the property, Peck handed to the tenant of the garage $150 in currency each month for two or three months, in order that he might pay to Montes the rent called for by the lease. Subsequently, this tenant became insane, and in a few weeks died. Then for the first time Montes discovered the misrepresentations which had been made in regard to the rentals from the garage, and this action followed. The complaint is in the usual form, and asks damages only for the fraud and misrepresentations as to the rental value of the garage. The court found in favor of the plaintiffs, and gave judgment for the difference between the rental value of the garage as shown by the evidence and the amount called for by that lease. From this judgment the defendant Peck has appealed.

Appellant relies for a reversal of the judgment upon two propositions, to wit: (1) That the release agreement referred to was executed in consideration of $2,000 which was taken off of the purchase price of the property, and which amount was therefore paid by the appellant, and that this completely bars this action until and unless the same should be rescinded by the respondents; (2) that this release agreement could not be rescinded by the respondents until, as required by section 1691 of the Civil Code, the $2,000 paid by the appellant was returned, or offered to be returned, by the respondents, and that no such restoration, or offer to restore, was made.

It is respondents' theory that the release agreement mentioned applied only to those leases in which discrepancies in the rentals had been discovered; that it was not the intention of the parties that this release agreement should cover all of the leases in question; and that, under the law, they were not required to restore, or offer to restore, anything to appellant, before maintaining this action.

[1-3] We are unable to agree with the respondents that the release agreement mentioned was not intended by the parties to cover the matter of the garage lease. Just prior to its execution, the parties had been discussing the four or five leases in which discrepancies in the rent paid had already been discovered. Mr. Irving Walker, who was then acting as attorney for respondents, testified that, in the presence of all of the parties, he asked Montes whether or not there was any question with reference to any of the other leases. Mr. Montes replied that the others were all right, and the attorney then said that he would draw this release in general terms. At another time this attorney testified that he asked Montes whether or not there was any question in regard to the leases other than those which had been under discussion, and that Montes replied that there was not, that he or his representative had talked with all of the other tenants, and the other tenants were paying the rentals called for by the leases, and there was no question as to those. Montes himself testified: "Mr. Walker said he could not advise me on the commercial part of it, that if I was sure that outside of those four leases, four or five, I cannot remember, the rest were all right, it was up to me to decide whether I should take less than the $5000 reduction."

Under such circumstances, we think that the intention of the parties at the time was, that the release agreement should apply to all of the leases in the building. However, it appears that the appellant had made, and continued to make, gross misrepresentations as to the rental being received from the garage. While admitting the discrepanices in the other leases that had already been discovered, he continued to represent that the garage lease, which is the most important one in the building, was then paying $550 a month. He disarmed suspicion by taking Montes to the title company to see written evidence of his fairness in the form of the letter calling attention to the lower rentals in the cases that had been discovered. But in this letter thus shown for the purpose of inducing Montes to sign the release and go on with the deal he again listed the garage as then paying $550 a month. Even in the adjustment of the current month's rents, which was made between the parties based upon the date the respondents took possession, the appellant represented he had collected the full amount of rent for the garage for that month, and paid to respondents a sum which purported to offset the amount he had already collected for the remainder of that month, at $550 a month. He not only maintained this representation throughout, but, for two or three months after the deal was closed, handed that particular tenant $150 in cash each month, to enable him to keep up the deception. Moreover, he had rendered any investigation which the respondents undertook, or which they might undertake, valueless, by inducing that tenant to misinform them as to the true state of facts. Under these circumstances, although the release agreement was intended by the parties to cover the garage lease, it was subject to be set aside for fraud and misrepresentation, under the rules of law applicable thereto. Upon sufficient evidence, the court found that this release agreement would not have been entered into by respondents, except for the fraud and misrepresentation of the appellant, and the judgment awarded was for damages found upon sufficient evidence to have been caused by this fraud. While certain other facts were found by the court which cannot be sustained, these are immaterial and harmless.

This appeal then turns upon the question whether or not it was necessary for the respondents, before maintaining this action, to return, or to offer to return, to appellant, $2,000 which appellant claims to have paid for the release in question, through a reduction in the purchase price of the property sold. Appellant argues that this release agreement, which is being attacked for fraud in its procurement, was voidable only, and therefore it must be rescinded and restoration made or offered, before a recovery could be had. He relies upon Garcia v. California Truck Co., 183 Cal. 767, 192 P. 708; O'Meara v. Haiden, 204 Cal. 354, 268 P. 334, 60 A. L. R. 1381; and section 1691 of the Civil Code. It has been held in the cases referred to, and others, that, where it is sought to set aside a release agreement where the parties understood what was involved, but where it is claimed that the making of the release contract was induced by fraud, the contract is voidable and not void; and that, where the amount claimed by the plaintiff is an unliquidated amount, or, in other words, where the plaintiff is not in any event entitled to keep the amount paid, the consideration paid for the release must be restored, or an offer to restore must be made. In all of the cases laying down this rule to which our attention has been called, the action was one for damages for personal injuries, and the plaintiff sought to avoid a release agreement in order to go back to an original cause of action for tort; the action itself having no connection with the contract, except that the contract purported to bar such an action.

[4] In the instant case we have a different situation. The thing here purported to be released, while a form of tort, is one based upon fraud growing out of a prior executory contract; and the consideration given, which was a reduction in the purchase price of certain property, was really given to induce the other party to go on and complete a contract already agreed upon, but endangered by the discovery of a part of the fraud. The release agreement was contemporaneous with, and an actual part of, a new agreement which merely continued the previous contract, in all respects the same, except for the one change in the amount of the purchase price. The original fraud, only a part of which had been discovered by the other party, was about to disrupt the deal, and the main, but undiscovered, part of this fraud was continued and recommitted for the purpose of inducing, and it actually did induce, the other party not only to sign the release agreement, but to continue with the entire contract for the purchase of the real property, although at a slightly different purchase price. We think such a release agreement may not be taken alone, and considered as a new contract, separate and distinct and independent from the entire agreement, and that the issue as to fraud in the execution thereof may not be here treated independently of the original controversy and original fraud, in the manner in which a release agreement, in such cases as those referred to, is treated independently of the original cause of action. On the other hand, we think this entire matter is one transaction, all contractual to begin with, but all tainted by the fraud which is here complained of, which continued throughout and touched all phases thereof. The entire deal is one contract for the sale of real property, and the release, with the fraud used to secure its execution, is but a part of the same fraud that induced the plaintiff to buy the property.

[5, 6] In cases like those above cited, if the plaintiff desires to go back to his original cause of action for tort, it is essential that he effect a rescission of the contract which purports to bar his cause of action. In other words, if he wants to sue on the original tort, he can neither stand on the release agreement nor act in violation thereof, but must move to set it aside. But in such a case as this, involving fraud in the sale of real property, it is well settled that a plaintiff may either rescind or stand on his contract and sue for damages. Paolini v. Sulprizio, 201 Cal. 683, 258 P. 380. The respondents here have elected to stand on their contract. Having chosen this remedy to which they are entitled, we think the purported release, which was a part of the entire contract, may not be segregated from the rest of the agreement, nor may the respondents be required to rescind as to that portion of the agreement, while permitted to sue for damages on the other part. The respondents have set up one cause of action based upon the main fraud in the entire deal, through which they were induced to purchase the real property. While a part of this fraud was discovered, and was partially rectified, this was done in such a manner as to inspire confidence in the respondents as to the good faith of the appellant, and to further throw them off their guard. The main and larger element of fraud which had existed from the beginning, in reference to the lease on the garage, was at the same time continued and used to induce the plaintiffs both to sign this release agreement and to go on with the entire transaction. The same fraud was then continued for an additional two or three months, apparently to prevent discovery. Because a part of this contract was put in the form of a separate letter, and because it purports to be a release of certain things, does not make it a separate contract, disassociated from the entire agreement. We think this case falls within the general rules governing real estate contracts which have been entered into because of fraud practiced upon the purchaser, and that it does not fall within the rules governing such contracts as must be rescinded before the form of action brought can be maintained. The plaintiffs having elected not to rescind but to sue for damages, neither a restoration nor offer thereof was necessary.

The inapplicability of the rule contended for by appellant is further seen in the fact that the respondents have received nothing as a consideration for this purported release, except the property which was being purchased in the deal, and the appellant paid the respondents nothing for this release, except in the way of reducing the purchase price of that property. To require respondents to rescind one part of the contract, and, as a part thereof, to restore, or offer to restore, $2,000 in cash which they never received, while under the established rule of law they cannot be required to rescind the whole contract, or restore the entire property, which they actually did receive, would be a most unusual situation. They received nothing except the property they were buying, and they had the right to retain that property and sue for such damages as were suffered through the fraud of the other party.

[7] While the so-called release is not such a separate agreement as must be separately rescinded, as one of its effects, it did make a settlement of all claim for damages on account of the fraud already discovered. Its validity and effect for this purpose has not been, and is not here, attacked by either party thereto; this action involving only the fraud in respect to the garage lease which was then undiscovered. Incidentally, however, appellant argues that it would be inequitable to let this judgment stand, since respondents would then receive all they lost through the fraud, and $2,000 additional. No such situation exists. It appears that, as to that part of the transaction, respondents received a reduction of $2,000 in the purchase price as an offset to a difference of $7,800 in rentals under specific leases, aside from the garage lease, between said leases as represented and the same leases as actually existing. While the point as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the amount of the judgment has not been raised on this appeal, it is apparent from the record that the amount of the judgment, plus the amount of the reduction in the purchase price of the property, is less than the amount shown by the evidence to have been lost by the respondents through the misrepresentations made.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARNARD, P. J.

The defendants were in the business of purchasing fresh grapes in the San Joaquin Valley and shipping the same to, and selling them in, various Eastern markets. It is an admitted fact that shippers of such grapes frequently suffered loss and damage by reason of decay and mold of the grapes, when shipped in ordinary refrigerator cars. In September, 1927, the defendants entered into two contracts with the plaintiff, each of which contracts recited that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the exclusive use in California of a certain device or apparatus known as an esofumer, being a device for the diffusion of sulphur dioxide gas. Under these contracts, the plaintiff leased to defendants, and the defendants hired from the plaintiff, two of these machines, with the right to use the same for a period of three months, the defendants paying a deposit of $100 on each machine, which deposit was to be returned when the machines were redelivered. The defendants further agreed to pay to the plaintiff $10 for each car of grapes treated by the use of said esofumer; the plaintiff agreeing to furnish the necessary gas. It is conceded that these machines were to be used to diffuse gas through cars of grapes after they were loaded, and that the purpose of such gassing process was to prevent mold and decay of the grapes while in transit. The only contest here is as to the degree of perfection required of the process. During the fall of 1927, defendants shipped 307 cars of grapes, of which 174 cars were treated with this process and 133 were not. This action was brought to collect the stipulated price for the cars treated, at $10 per car. In their answer, the defendants set up the defense that many of the cars arrived in Eastern markets with the grapes in a moldy and decayed condition. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants have appealed.

[1] The various points made by appellants may be summarized as a contention that the evidence is not sufficient to support various findings of the trial court to the effect that the plaintiff had fully performed his contracts, for the reason that the trial court overlooked and ignored the warranty implied by law, which was to the effect that the grapes would arrive at market free from decay and mold; and that, since the evidence shows that some of the grapes arrived in a moldy condition, the contracts were not complied with by the plaintiff. Appellants contend that section 1770 of the Civil Code applies to these contracts, and that there was therefore an implied warranty that the use of this apparatus and process would result in accomplishing the particular purpose for which it was used. Under the statute referred to, such an implied warranty would only be that it was reasonably fit for such purpose. Appellants, however, take the position that the purpose to be here accomplished was a total prevention of all decay and mold of the grapes. They rely upon the following testimony of Edna Rusconi, one of the appellants: "Mr. Rusconi asked Mr. Babcock, and I may have asked questions too but I don't remember, to tell him what the Esofumer would do and the gassing process and it was—there was considerable general talk about the condition of grapes and Mr. Babcock told Mr. Rusconi that persons using this process should get their grapes to the eastern markets in better condition than persons not using it; that it would prevent, particularly as I remember it, mold from coming onto the grapes and rot while they stayed on track before they were sold, and Mr. Rusconi agreed with him that it was a very good thing provided it would do that and Mr. Babcock assured him that it would do that and on the strength of that Mr. Rusconi told him he would take it, and left me to complete details as he had an appointment and had to leave."

Appellants do not claim that this was an express warranty, as evidence of the same would have been inadmissible under the circumstances, but they argue that, properly interpreted, her testimony was that appellants were told that this process would prevent rot and mold, and that, where it was used, grapes would arrive at market free from such mold or decay. And it is argued that this evidence discloses the nature and terms of the warranty that is implied by law. Without considering such questions as the admissibility of this evidence, or the fact that, if interpreted as contended for by appellants, it would amount to an express contract, the court was not compelled to draw the inference contended for, but could properly interpret the language used as a representation that a person using this process would get his grapes to market in better condition than a person not using it, which, at most, would merely corroborate any warranty that could be implied by law; namely, that the process was reasonably fit for the purpose intended.

It is doubtful whether any such warranty may be implied by law in this case, there being no evidence to show that either the device or the gas was manufactured by the plaintiff, the contract being a lease and not a sale, and the contract providing that the defendants acknowledge receipt of the machine in good order, and "accepts the same as such without any express or implied warranty of any kind or nature whatsoever." However, we feel it is not necessary to decide that question.

[2-4] Assuming an implied warranty, as contended for, it would be to the effect that the device was reasonably fit for the purpose intended. The court found that the contracts were fully complied with by the respondent, and, even if an implied warranty be assumed, we think this finding is supported by the evidence. Such a warranty would not call for 100 per cent. efficiency upon the part of the machine and process, but only for such results as would be reasonable under the circumstances. While certain machinery for certain purposes may closely approximate perfection in its operation, many kinds of machinery and processes are extremely valuable, and constitute a great improvement over prior methods of doing certain things, although, from the very nature of the case, perfect results are impossible. In such cases, reasonable fitness for the purpose intended is to be judged by a comparative standard rather than by an arbitrary one. This is particularly true with reference to a method of handling fresh grapes, and attempting to get them to market in good condition. Such fruit is perishable at best; it is of varying degrees of ripeness when picked; it varies in size, soundness, condition, and quality; it must be handled several times; it may be much or little injured by less or greater care in handling; it is extremely sensitive to such conditions as temperature and moisture; and many other things, particularly time, play a most important part in affecting its condition at its destination. In reference to an appliance and process designed to attempt to get such a product, in good condition, to a market several thousand miles away, no warranty that all fruit shipped will arrive in a perfect or practically perfect condition can be implied by law. If any warranty can here be implied, it was only that this process was reasonably fit for the purpose intended, and whether or not it was so fit was a question of fact for the trial court.

[5] Accepting appellants' own evidence, it appears that five out of every seven cars that were treated with this process arrived in New York entirely free from mold, while only one out of every two of the cars not so treated arrived free from mold. It further appears that some of the cars that did show mold only showed it slightly. Appellants take the position that any mold at all is a violation of the implied warranty. Their agent, who received the grapes in New York, testified that he did not examine an entire car, but, if mold showed up at all he did not pay any attention to the other boxes. As was said by the court in Nye & Nisson v. Weed Lumber Co., 92 Cal. App. 598, 268 P. 659, 663, "It cannot reasonably be said that there is a breach of warranty as to the quality of processed eggs, merely because a case may contain a defective egg or two." The evidence further shows that at least eight of the cars were delayed in starting for three days because of car shortage, and that mold is much more apt to occur after a delay of twenty-four hours. While the condition of the grapes when packed is most important, the evidence upon that point is not too satisfactory. Louis Rusconi, one of the appellants, testified that he did not see any mold before they were shipped. When asked if he had made an examination of them, he replied, "I am watching them pretty close." Since the grapes were being shipped from two separate points, the court may well have considered the answer somewhat evasive. While apparently stressing the fact of his careful handling of the grapes, he testified that most of them were hauled on wagons equipped with springs. The inference is that those not so handled may not have been in as good condition. All of the circumstances considered, and bearing in mind the only warranty which could be implied by law, even if an implied warranty be assumed, the findings of the court that the contracts were complied with by the respondent are fully sustained by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County, Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Action by E. A. Klein and wife and the Continental Insurance Company, against C. Fred Baker, also known as C. F. Baker, doing business under the name and style of Baker's Transfer & Storage Company. Judgment for plaintiff last named, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Borton & Petrini, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Miller & Thornton, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MARKS, J.

Respondents brought this action in the court below to recover from appellant the value of household furniture, family stores and provisions, and personal effects which were destroyed by fire while being transported in trucks by appellant from the city of Bakersfield to the city of Hollywood, Cal. The complaint contains three separate causes of action. The first is based upon an express contract between E. A. Klein and Ethel Klein, his wife, and appellant to transport the goods and deliver them to the Kleins in Hollywood. The second cause of action is based upon the statutory liability of appellant as a common carrier of goods for hire. No point is raised by either party under the third cause of action and it need not be considered here.

The evidence discloses that the Kleins were the owners of household furniture, wearing apparel, and personal effects which they desired to have appellant transport for them. It is alleged that this property was of the reasonable value of $10,500. The respondent Continental Insurance Company had issued and delivered its policies of fire insurance upon this property in the amount of $3,500, which amount it paid to the Kleins. By its contract it was subrogated to the rights of the insured to this amount. Judgment was rendered in its favor for $3,500. The Kleins recovered nothing.

Appellant earnestly urges that the judgment must be reversed because the trial court failed to find upon the issue presented by the pleadings of whether or not appellant was a common carrier. He maintains that if he was a common carrier the measure of damages suffered by respondents would be governed by the provisions of section 2200 of the Civil Code which would reduce the amount of the recovery of respondents to a sum much less than that awarded in the judgment.

[1] We have examined the evidence in this case and have concluded that, had the trial court found that appellant was a common carrier, such finding would not be supported by the evidence. In December, 1925, appellant filed an application with the railroad commission whereby he sought permission to operate as a common carrier under the jurisdiction of the commission. From this application it appears that he was engaged in conducting the business of hauling household goods and personal effects by motortrucks "anywhere for hire." His motor vehicles did not travel upon regular routes nor between established termini. From his petition it does not appear that his business was anything more than the hauling of household goods and personal effects upon private contracts with the owners as and when the opportunity presented itself. His application was denied by the railroad commission. There is no other evidence in the record of the nature of his business except the transportation of the goods in question which appears to have been undertaken upon a special contract and not as part of regular freighting business over a fixed route or upon any schedule between Bakersfield and Hollywood.

In the case of Associated Pipe Line Co. v. Railroad Commission, 176 Cal. 518, 169 P. 62, 63, L. R. A. 1918C, 849, a common carrier was defined as follows: "In his work on Carriers, Mr. Moore, at page 20, vol. 1, defines a common carrier as one who 'holds himself out as such to the world; that he undertakes generally and for all persons indifferently to carry goods and deliver them for hire; and that his public profession of his employment be such that, if he refuse, without some just ground, to carry goods for any one, in the course of his employment and for a reasonable and customary price, he will be liable to an action.' It is one who offers to carry goods for any person between certain termini and who is bound to carry for all who tender their goods and the price of carriage."

In the case of Forsyth v. San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation, 208 Cal. 397, 281 P. 620, 623, the Supreme Court drew the following distinction between a common carrier and a private carrier: "Section 2168 of the Civil Code defines a common carrier as follows: 'Every one who offers to the public to carry persons, property, or messages, excepting only telegraphic messages, is a common carrier, of whatever he thus offers to carry.' 'Private carriers are such as carry for hire and do not come within the definition of common carrier. Certain common characteristics mark the difference between these two classes. To impress upon one the character of common carrier it must be shown that he "undertakes generally and for all persons indifferently to carry goods and deliver them for hire; and that his public profession of his employment be such that if he refuses, without some just ground, to carry goods for anyone, in the course of his employment and for a reasonable and customary price, he will be liable to an action." On the other hand, private carriers are not bound to carry for any person unless they enter into a special agreement so to do.' 4 Cal. Juris., 815."

To the same effect are the cases of Frost v. Railroad Commission, 271 U. S. 583, 46 S. Ct. 605, 70 L. Ed. 1101, 47 A. L. R. 457; Alexson v. Steward, 55 Cal. App. 251, 203 P. 423; and Gornstein v. Priver, 64 Cal. App. 249, 221 P. 396.

We conclude that from the evidence before us appellant was not shown to be a common carrier and must be held to have been a private carrier in his undertaking to transport the Klein property.

[2] If the court had made any finding at all upon the question of whether or not appellant was a common carrier, it must have found that he was not, but was a private carrier. With this finding the limit of recovery of respondents would not have been governed by section 2200 of the Civil Code. Therefore, the failure of the trial court to find upon this issue, which would not have changed the results it reached, cannot be held to be prejudicial error or ground for reversal. Comer v. Los Angeles Railway Corporation, 95 Cal. App. 545, 272 P. 1100.

[3] The remaining question to be determined on this appeal is the duty resting upon appellant in transporting the Klein goods as a private carrier, and his liability for their destruction by fire in the absence of any showing of negligence upon his part. Under ordinary circumstances the private carrier is only required to use ordinary care in the transportation of personal property and is not liable for its injury or destruction in the absence of a showing of negligence on his part. Gornstein v. Priver, supra. In this case no negligence on the part of the carrier was either alleged or proved.

[4] As we have observed, respondents alleged a special contract on the part of appellant to deliver the goods to the Kleins in Hollywood. The trial court found that such a special contract was entered into. E. A. Klein testified to it, and while this is the only evidence in the record indicating it, this evidence is sufficient to support the finding of the trial court on this appeal, it having apparently believed the testimony.

[5] At common law one of the recognized purposes of a bailment was the transportation of personal property for hire. The earliest declaration of this rule was given by Lord Holt in the case of Coggs v. Bernard, Ld. Raym 909, 5 Eng. R. C. 247. In this case it was held that one of the kinds of bailments was the hiring of the carrying of goods when they are bailed either to a public or private carrier for the purpose of being transported from place to place. Fish v. Chapman, 2 Ga. 349, 46 Am. Dec. 393.

[6] It has been universally held that a bailee's general liability may be increased by a special contract and that if his contract so provides he may become an insurer of redelivery of the property bailed. "While the rights and duties of a bailee must be determined from the contract and from the statutes and principles of law governing such contracts, a bailee may enlarge, and to a certain extent limit, his legal responsibilities. He may make his obligation to redeliver the bailed property absolute, putting himself in somewhat the same position as an insurer. Thus, a contract under which the bailee undertakes to redeliver the property 'damage by the elements excepted' creates an absolute liability to return it unless prevented by act of God. Under such circumstances it is not required to be shown that the bailee was negligent, absence of negligence on his part being no defense because of the absolute nature of the liability incurred. So, if the bailee contracts to deliver goods at a certain time or to deliver them to a certain person at a certain time, without any reservation whatever for contingencies, his liability is absolute, and he can be held accountable for their value if they are accidentally destroyed. In such a case the failure of the bailee to do as he contracted must be considered the proximate cause of the damage." 4 Cal. Jur. 16.

To the same effect are the cases of Barrere v. Somps, 113 Cal. 97, 45 P. 177, 572, and Beall v. Bekins Van & Storage Co., 33 Cal. App. 652, 166 P. 370. In the Beall Case the court indicated that its decision would have been the same had the Bekins Van & Storage Company been acting either as a warehouse keeper or as a carrier of goods.

[7] The business of a private carrier of goods is obtained by, and is dependent upon, his contract with the shipper. We can see no reason why his contract may not impose upon him a greater duty than the ordinary care which the law imposes on him. His compensation is also fixed by contract, and if he imposes upon himself the contractual obligation of delivering the goods to their point of destination we see no reason why he should not be held to it. We can assume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that in his charges he included compensation for the added liability which he imposed upon himself. If he elects to become an insurer of the delivery of the goods at their destination he should be bound by his contract and his responsibility should be measured by its terms.

Appellant maintains that the amount of the judgment is not supported by the evidence. It is alleged in the complaint that the total value of the goods shipped was $10,500. The answer denies that this value was in excess of $3,500. The evidence shows that a small part of the property was not destroyed by fire but was delivered to the Kleins by appellant in Hollywood. Appellant fixed the value of the property delivered at $500. Klein testified that its value was $250. As the court did not find the value of the goods so delivered, appellant maintains that the judgment should be reversed or at least reduced by $500. An examination of the evidence discloses that there is testimony in the record which would support the conclusion that the value of the goods destroyed by fire was equal to or in excess of the amount of the judgment. Therefore the trial court did not have to rely upon the admission in the pleadings as the sole measure of their value. The evidence supports the judgment as to the amount of the loss.

Judgment affirmed.

review an alleged judgment of the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles, in favor of William J. Garner, as administrator of the estate of George W. Garner, deceased, against petitioner, as surety on the bond, in an action of claim and delivery, and a summary judgment against petitioner on its undertaking in said cause for the purpose of staying execution pending appeal.

Writ of review discharged in so far as it relates to the alleged judgment on the bond given for the return of the personal property. Judgment on the undertaking to stay execution affirmed.

Arthur T. Stollmack, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Charles D. Swanner, of Santa Ana, and W. W. Wallace, of Los Angeles, for respondent William J. Garner.

WORKS, P. J.

Respondent William J. Garner, administrator, commenced an action in respondent court against Mary Tipton, A. V. Tipton, and others, petitioner not being a party thereto. The action was for claim and delivery and involved a certain automobile. Upon due demand respondent Traeger, who is a sheriff, took the car into his possession pursuant to the terms of section 511 of the Code of Civil Procedure, whereupon petitioner, acting under the provisions of section 514 of that Code, executed an undertaking for the redelivery of the car to defendants Tipton, and it was returned to them. A trial of the action was had and findings and judgment went for plaintiff, respondent Garner, administrator. The judgment ran against defendants Tipton, and, while petitioner is not named either in the title of the cause at the head of the judgment or in the body thereof, the document orders, adjudges, and decrees, as shown by the return to the writ of review heretofore issued by this court, that plaintiff do have and recover from defendants Tipton and from "the sureties on the" undertaking the possession of the automobile, certain sums of money, and costs.

[1, 2] It is alleged in the petition for the writ of review that respondent court rendered judgment against petitioner, and the title of the cause appearing at the head of the judgment made part of the petition shows merely, as defendants, "Mary Tipton, et al." The allegation of the petition that respondent court rendered judgment against petitioner is, in legal effect, untrue. There is no such thing as a binding judgment against a nameless person, and it is of the very essence of things that he is nameless unless he be called by some appellation or cognomen on the face of the judgment itself. Whether authority upon this question may be found we do not know. A search for such authority is plainly unnecessary.

Strange to say, the state of the record in respondent court is first made known to us by the briefs in the present proceeding. The copy of the judgment set forth in the return to the writ is no better than the copy attached to the petition for the writ. In the former, also, the defendants are shown to be "Mary Tipton et al."

[3, 4] The petition before us has a double purpose. Having disposed of the first branch of it we now take up a consideration of the second. The defendants Tipton appealed from the judgment rendered against them by respondent court. Petitioner executed an undertaking for the purpose of staying execution pending the appeal. The appeal was dismissed, and, after the going down of the remittitur, respondent court rendered summary judgment against petitioner, by name, for a certain sum of money. It is sought by the present proceeding to have this judgment annulled.

This point turns on the question whether the undertaking was given pursuant to section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the stay of executions on money judgments, or under section 943 of the same Code, relating to such stay on judgments requiring the delivery of personal property, or perhaps under some other section relating to stays of execution. This question is not easy of solution and we find it unnecessary to decide it. If the bond was given under section 942 the summary judgment rendered upon it was entirely proper. If it was given under any other section, petitioner had a right of appeal from the judgment. In neither event can the writ of review properly issue.

The writ of review is discharged in so far as it relates to the alleged judgment on the bond given for the return of the personal property. The judgment on the undertaking to stay execution is affirmed.

Landlord's notice to tenant and subtenant to vacate, containing language exposing tenant to contempt and ridicule, as well as having tendency to injure him in occupation, held libelous per se (Civ. Code, § 45).

> The landlord's notice to vacate contained a statement that the lease was terminated for the reason that the tenant had persistently and repeatedly refused and failed to pay rent, although the landlord had begged him, run after him many times, written to him, and had urged his attorney to endeavor to induce tenant to comply with his lease, and that the response had been mostly promises which were never kept, excuses and subterfuges.

3. Libel and slander 🔑80.

Complaint in tenant's action against landlord for libel contained in notice to vacate premises which exposed tenant to contempt and ridicule held to state cause of action good against general demurrer (Civ. Code, §§ 45, 47).

> The complaint alleged that the defendant as landlord, in notice to plaintiff as tenant to vacate and in the complaint in unlawful detainer action, used certain stated words which were false, libelous, and defamatory, and that defendant maliciously published them to injure plaintiff in his business and occupation, and with intent to expose him to hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy of his friends and business associates, and that such was the result of the publication, to plaintiff's damage.

In action for libel, plea of privilege is ordinarily defense.

7. Libel and slander 🔑97.

In action for libel, plea of privilege may be raised by demurrer when it appears on face of complaint that publication comes within statute (Civ. Code, § 47, subds. 1, 2).

8. Libel and slander 🔑38(1).

Libelous matters published in judicial proceedings must be relevant and pertinent to inquiry to be privileged (Civ. Code, § 47).

9. Libel and slander 🔑38(1).

Libelous language used in landlord's notice to vacate, exposing tenant to contempt and ridicule, held not material to notice; hence not privileged as in judicial proceeding (Code Civ. Proc. § 1160, subd. 2; Civ. Code, § 47).

> This was true, since the scope of such notice is limited to requiring the payment of the amount claimed to be due under the lease or possession of the premises.

*Superseded by opinion of Supreme Court 3 P.2d 550.

10. Libel and slander 🔑38(3).

Language used in landlord's complaint in unlawful detainer held material to inquiry, and hence privileged even though defamatory (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 735, and 1160, subd. 2; Civ. Code, §§ 47, 3345).

The statements in the complaint that the tenant was undesirable as tenant of premises for reason that the landlord was informed that tenant was dishonest, tricky, impecunious, also involved in litigation, that dealing with him had involved the premises in legal controversy, and that the tenant was temperamentally unfit for managing the premises, were material to question whether the alleged unlawful detention was willful and as to whether or not, because of the matter in question, the trial court in such unlawful detainer action would treble the damages for detention under Code Civ. Proc. § 735, or the rents under Civ. Code, § 3345.

11. Pleading 🔑225(1).

Where complaint alleged two publications of alleged defamatory matter, though not separately stated, one of which was good as against general demurrer, general demurrer held improperly sustained without leave to amend.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Action by Alexander Haddad against Afue McDowell and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Henry M. Lee, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Afue McDowell, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal on the judgment roll from a judgment rendered after a demurrer to the amended complaint for libel was sustained without leave to amend.

The amended complaint alleges that on or about March 8, 1928, plaintiff and defendant California Escrow & Finance Corporation entered into a lease whereby plaintiff leased from said defendant a certain drive-in or open-air market in the city of Los Angeles; that about the 1st of August, 1928, said lessor and its codefendant, Afue McDowell, the legal counsel for lessor, wrote and caused to be published and delivered to plaintiff and various other persons, particularly the subtenants of said market, a three-day notice to vacate and surrender possession of said market, a copy of which said notice is attached to the complaint and made a part of it by reference, and which notice required the payment of certain sums alleged to be due, within three days after the service of the notice, or the surrender of possession of the premises as required by subdivision 2 of section 1160, Code of Civil Procedure, and which notice also contained the following: "The above mentioned lease is terminated and cancelled and ended, for all purposes, for the reason that said Alexander Haddad has persistently and repeatedly refused and failed to pay said sums, although we have begged him, run after him many times, written to him, and urged his attorney to endeavor to induce him, to comply with his lease. The response has been mostly promises which were never kept, excuses and subterfuges. The rental value is too high for such tactics. Even if by any means you be allowed to remain on the property, a strict compliance with whatever lease is then in effect must be observed by you." The amended complaint further alleges that on the 13th of August, 1928, the defendants caused to be filed with the county clerk of Los Angeles county, and served upon the plaintiff and various other persons generally, and particularly the various subtenants of said market, a complaint in unlawful detainer, which said complaint is attached to and made a part of said amended complaint, and which has among the allegations usual in such a complaint the following: "XV Defendant Haddad is undesirable as a tenant of said premises for the reason that plaintiff fears and is informed and believes and therefore alleges, that he is a dishonest, tricky, impecunious, so involved in litigation, that dealing with him has involved, and will continue to involve, said premises and the conduct and management thereof, in legal controversy between himself and wife; and that he is temperamentally unfit for managing such a market or operating under said lease; for the reasons that he is too nervous to converse coherently long enough peaceably to settle any controversy; he is prone to dodge and evade representatives of plaintiff, and others seeking to adjust the matters of the lease with him; he quarrels quickly and becomes greatly excited and agitated in discussing such matters; and he is so ignorant of business ethics and business generally that he usually postpones decisions on matters relating to business until he can confer with, and get the opinion of, other persons, most of whom are usually as incompetent as he is; and he is inclined to violate and disavow his promises and obligations, regardless to the effect on others." The complaint also alleges that the language quoted was "neither pertinent, material or relevant" to the three-day notice, or to a complaint in unlawful detainer, "and constitutes no part of a judicial proceeding." These last allegations would seem to be merely conclusions of law. Gosewisch

v. Doran, 161 Cal. 511, 119 P. 656, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 442.

The demurrer to the amended complaint was on the grounds (1) of misjoinder; (2) two causes of action not separately stated; (3) insufficient facts stated to constitute a cause of action; and (4) uncertainty in several particulars mentioned. Defendants also filed notice of motions to strike from the files a second undertaking which the court permitted to be filed as well as the amended complaint, and certain parts thereof, and to dismiss the action; the latter motions being principally based on the ground that the complaint showed that the language used was not libelous and was privileged. All of such motions were denied by the court, and the demurrer was sustained without leave to amend.

Appellant contends that the court erred in sustaining said demurrer, for the reason that the privilege attaching to the publication of libelous matters in judicial proceedings is subject to the qualifications that the matters must be relevant and pertinent to the subject of inquiry and that the demurrer on the other grounds is not well taken. Respondents contend that section 47, Civil Code, does not make any such qualification, and, as the complaint shows that the language used occurred in a notice and complaint filed in the judicial proceeding, it is privileged, that the matter is material and relevant, and that the demurrer was properly sustained on the other grounds.

[1-5] If the complaint is good as against the general demurrer, it would be error to have sustained the demurrer on the special grounds without leave to amend, even though the complaint was an amendment of the original filed (Schaake v. Eagle Automatic Can Co., 135 Cal. 472, 63 P. 1025, 67 P. 759), and in our opinion the language used being of a nature that would expose the party it referred to to contempt, ridicule, and obloquy, as well as having a tendency to injure him in his occupation, it is libelous per se (section 45, Civ. Code) and actionable unless it is privileged under section 47, Civil Code. The complaint alleges that the words used were false, libelous, and defamatory, and that defendants maliciously published them to injure plaintiff in his business and occupation, and with intent to expose him to hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy of his friends and business associates and the public generally, and that such was the result of the publication, to plaintiff's humiliation, embarrassment, and damage, and in our opinion it states a cause of action good as against the general demurrer, unless respondent's contention is sound, and, as we cannot assume that the trial court erred, which could be the case if it sustained the special demurrer without leave to amend, we must conclude that it sustained the demurrer on the general ground, holding that on the face of the complaint the language was either privileged because used in a judicial proceeding, or, if the privilege was not absolute, that it showed on the face of the complaint that it was material and pertinent.

[6, 7] While the plea of privilege is ordinarily a defense, it may be raised by demurrer when it appears on the face of the complaint that the publication comes within subdivisions 1 or 2 of section 47 of the Civil Code. Stevens v. Snow, 191 Cal. 58, 64, 214 P. 968.

[8-11] As we read the later decisions of the Supreme Court, we must conclude that the rule laid down in the case of Munster v. Lamb, 11 Q. B. Div. 588, that the privilege of an advocate, in the course of a judicial inquiry, extends to words used by the solicitor maliciously, and without any justification or excuse, and even though irrelevant to every issue before the court, has been superseded in this state by the general American doctrine requiring that they be relevant and pertinent to the inquiry. The leading case in this state is that of Carpenter v. Ashley, 148 Cal. 422, 83 P. 444, 7 Ann. Cas. 601, in which the facts showed that, in a prosecution for larceny, the district attorney had charged opposing counsel with having committed perjury and subornation of perjury, which the complaint in the Carpenter Case charged as slander. On the question of instructions given by the trial court, the court says on page 424 of 148 Cal., 83 P. 444: "The following instruction asked by plaintiff was refused: 'The jury are instructed that the question of whether the plaintiff had committed perjury or subornation of perjury was not under consideration in the case of People v. Arthur Ennis, wherein the slanderous words are alleged to have been spoken by the defendant herein, and therefore anything that the defendant in this case may have said at that trial, in the presence of others in relation to whether the plaintiff had committed perjury or subornation of perjury would not be privileged.' The court also instructed the jury, at the request of defendant, as follows: 'No action will lie against a public officer for any words spoken or published by him in the proper discharge of his official duty. No action will lie against a district attorney for any words spoken or published by him during the proper discharge of his official duties as district attorney and in the course of a judicial proceeding in which he in his official capacity is engaged.' There were other instructions and refusals to instruct on the same lines as the above; but the foregoing references are sufficient to show that the court left to the jury the whole question whether or not the alleged defamatory words were privileged." The case was reversed because the trial court refused to determine whether or not the publication was privileged, but, in speaking of the language used, the court says (page 425 of 148 Cal., 83 P. 444, 445): "And it is quite clear that in the case at bar the defamatory words alleged to have been spoken by the defendant of plaintiff, who was simply an opposing attorney in the case at hand, had no pertinency, relevancy, or reference, to the charge of larceny in the pending action of People v. Ennis, which was the subject-matter of inquiry in that action; he had no more privilege to use the defamatory words alleged than he would had had to charge plaintiff with robbery, rape, or murder."

Having decided that the contention of appellant is supported by the decisions of the Supreme Court, we are faced with two questions: Was the publication of the words complained of in the three-day notice a part of a judicial proceeding, and, if so, was the matter published therein and in the complaint in unlawful detainer material to the inquiry? Both counsel assume that the notice is a part of the judicial proceeding, and without so deciding we will make the same assumption. The complaint in the case at bar alleges the service of the notice as a publication of the defamatory matter contained in it, and it does not allege that any republication was used in the complaint in unlawful detainer by making it a part thereof. The scope of such a notice is limited to requiring the payment of the amount claimed to be due under the lease, or possession of the premises, and by no stretch of the imagination could any such language as was inserted in the notice in the case at bar be material to such a notice, or the purpose for which it is used; so we are forced to hold that it is not pertinent or material, even in the very broad sense that our Supreme Court has approved by denying a hearing in that court of the case of Irwin v. Newby, 102 Cal. App. 110, 114, 282 P. 810, 812, 283 P. 370, which opinion says: "The mere fact that the alleged defamatory matter is irrelevant as a matter of law or that it is insufficient as a defense does not bring it within the exception contended for by appellant. It must go further. As stated in Carpenter v. Ashley, supra, it must have no reasonable pertinency to the matter involved in the subject-matter of the pending action and have no relation or reference to the cause in hand." As to the kind of relevancy meant by the rule laid down, the same court quotes the following from the case of Taylor v. Iowa Park G. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 199 S. W. 853, at page 855: "The matter to which the privilege does not extend must be so palpably wanting in relation to the subject-matter of the controversy that no reasonable man can doubt its irrelevancy and impropriety. In order that matter alleged in a pleading may be privileged, it need not be in every case material to the issues presented by the pleadings. It must, however, be legitimately related thereto, or so pertinent to the subject of the controversy that it may become the subject of inquiry in the course of the trial." Even though weighed on that liberal scale, we fail to see how the language used in the three-day notice could be material. So far as the language used in the complaint in unlawful detainer is concerned (while we deplore the form in which it is introduced into the complaint) when weighed by the same rule, the words used, though undoubtedly subject to a motion to strike, as was the case of the language in the Taylor Case, still we cannot say that they do not have some "legitimate relation" to the question of whether or not the alleged unlawful detention was willful and as to whether or not because of the matter in question the trial court in such unlawful detainer action would or would not treble the damages for detention under section 735, Code of Civil Procedure, or the rents under section 3345, Civil Code, and, as the language used seems to be even more material to such inquiry than the words complained of in the Taylor Case were to the proceeding in which they were used, we feel compelled to hold that they were and are material within the rule laid down. There being two publications of alleged defamatory matter set up in the complaint, though not separately stated, one of which seems to be good as against the general demurrer, the demurrer should not have been sustained without leave to amend.

Judgment reversed.

TYLER, P. J.

Action to recover damages for fraud in the exchange of certain parcels of real property.

Plaintiff and appellant alleged that she was the owner of certain flats located on Leavenworth street in San Francisco which she agreed to exchange for an apartment house located on Sacramento street in the same city upon the following terms: Said flats to go in at a valuation of $16,000, subject to a mortgage of $2,000, the net value being $14,000; the apartment house, valued at $22,500, was subject to a mortgage of $11,000, the net value being $11,500; defendant Veghte to pay to plaintiff $2,500 in cash, and plaintiff to pay the broker who negotiated the exchange the sum of $650 for his services. Plaintiff charged that she was induced to enter into the agreement of exchange by fraudulent misrepresentations as to the value of the apartment house, its income, the amount of taxes to which it was subject, and the character of the mortgage with which it was impressed. She prayed for damages in the sum of $7,500.

The lower court found in favor of defendants upon all the issues, and rendered judgment in their favor. Plaintiff relies for reversal of the judgment on the ground that there is no substantial evidence to support the findings, and that such findings are contrary thereto. There is absolutely no merit in the appeal. While there was a conflict in the evidence as to the value of the apartments, the preponderance of such evidence shows that the property was worth the full amount that defendants claimed it to be worth. The same is true as to the other alleged misrepresentations. Moreover, the record shows that plaintiff acted freely and of her own volition in entering into the agreement of exchange and concluding the same; that she made a full and independent investigation of all the matters in connection with, and in consummation of, the transaction, and acted upon her own judgment. The appeal is entirely lacking in merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

JENNINGS, J.

Appellant was convicted of the crime of failing, without lawful excuse, to furnish necessary support for his minor child and was sentenced to be punished therefor by imprisonment in the county jail for a term of two years and to pay a fine of $1,000. He appeals from the judgment.

During the course of the trial it was admitted by the appellant that he had not, during the time stated in the information, furnished support for the child of whom he was alleged to be the father. The sole question at issue therefore was whether the appellant was the father of the child.

[1] In support of his appeal appellant makes two contentions: First, that the evidence presented during the trial of the action was insufficient to justify the verdict of conviction; and, second, that the trial court erred in allowing certain evidence, alleged to be highly prejudicial to the appellant, to be introduced. As to the first of these contentions it is apparent that the evidence which was presented on behalf of the appellant was in some important respects in direct conflict with that which was introduced by the respondent. It was, of course, entirely within the province of the jury to determine whether the testimony introduced by the respondent should be accepted or whether the testimony presented by the appellant should be believed. The jury having chosen to accept respondent's testimony which is sufficient to support the verdict, appellant's contention in this regard may not be maintained. People v. Russell, 73 Cal. App. 492, 238 P. 1051.

[2] It is, however, strenuously contended by the appellant that the trial court erred in permitting the respondent to introduce evidence of acts of sexual intercourse between appellant and the complaining witness prior to the time when the conception may have taken place. It is said that the only effect of testimony of this character was to degrade the appellant in the eyes of the jury and that the reception of such testimony was therefore highly prejudicial to the appellant. With this contention we are compelled to disagree. In bastardy proceedings it is quite generally held that acts of intercourse and undue familiarity before the alleged act resulting in conception are admissible as bearing on the probability of the intercourse alleged to have taken place between the parties. 7 Cor. Jur. 992; State v. Hammond, 46 Utah, 249, 148 P. 420; Wise v. State, 19 Ala. App. 245, 96 So. 724; People v. Dupounce, 133 Mich. 1, 94 N. W. 388, 103 Am. St. Rep. 435, 2 Ann. Cas. 246.

In Estate of Gird, 157 Cal. 534, 108 P. 499, 137 Am. St. Rep. 131, it was held that evidence was admissible to show that a witness discovered an act of sexual intercourse between the mother and alleged father of the children, whether it took place before or after the birth of a daughter, as tending to show the extent of the intimacy between them and to corroborate the testimony of the mother as to the paternity of the children and the nature of the relations existing between the mother and the alleged father. In its decision the Supreme Court refers to the case of People v. Jamieson, 124 Mich. 164, 82 N. W. 835, a bastardy case, where it was held that acts of intercourse and undue familiarity, both before and after the alleged act resulting in conception, are admissible as bearing upon the probability of the intercourse at the time stated in the complaint. The court also refers to 5 Cyc. 662, wherein it is stated that evidence of the intimate relations existing between the mother and alleged father is admissible and that evidence of previous or subsequent intercourse is competent to show the probability of the particular act having occurred. In People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 621, 76 P. 500, 502, it was held that in a prosecution for the crime of incest, evidence of incestuous acts that occurred both prior and subsequent to the particular act selected as the basis of prosecution, were admissible for the purpose of showing a disposition on the part of the defendant to commit such offenses and as corroborative of testimony introduced to prove the specific act charged. In its decision the Supreme Court quotes from the case of People v. Castro, 133 Cal. 12, 65 P. 13, as follows: "'The doctrine appears to be fairly well settled that in actions of adultery, seduction, etc., evidence of sexual intercourse between the parties, both before and after the particular act charged, may be introduced in evidence, as tending to sustain the main allegation.'" And thereupon makes the following pertinent comment: "We think this is a correct statement of the prevailing rule, and in principle applies not only in prosecutions for adultery, but in prosecutions for all cognate offenses involving sexual intercourse by consent, including incest."

We are of the opinion that no error was committed by the trial court in permitting the reception of the evidence complained of by appellant.

JENNINGS, J.

This is an action in unlawful detainer to recover possession of certain real property leased by plaintiff to defendants for a term of years. The written instrument of lease contained covenants by the lessees that they would not commit any waste on the premises and that they would not, without the written consent of the lessor, sublet the leased premises or any part thereof. At the conclusion of the trial the court ordered that the lease be forfeited and canceled and that the plaintiff, respondent herein, be restored to possession of the premises. From this judgment defendants have appealed.

Appellants object to certain findings of the trial court wherein the court found that appellants had violated certain covenants contained in the lease agreement, particularly the covenant not to sublet the leased premises without the written consent of respondent.

During the trial of the action a certain instrument executed by appellant S. K. Bogosian and F. B. Cotton on December 27, 1928, was admitted in evidence. It is the contention of appellants that this instrument amounted to no more than what is generally denominated a cropping contract, under the provisions of which F. B. Cotton agreed to farm the premises for a share of the crop to be grown thereon. Respondent, on the other hand, contends that the instrument is an agreement for the leasing of the premises and that its execution was in violation of the covenant on the part of appellants not to sublet the premises, which warranted the forfeiture and termination of the lease agreement between respondent and appellants. There is, then, here involved the construction of this instrument. The instrument is in the following form:

"This Lease made the 27th day of December, 1928, between S. K. Bogosian of Tulare, Cal., party of the first part and F. B. Cotton, of said place, party of the second part,

"Witnesseth: that the said party of the first part hereby leases to the party of the second part for the term of one year, the real property situate in the County of Tulare, State of California, and described as follows, to-wit:

"The N. W. ¼ of S. W. ¼ of Section 27, Township 20 South, Range 24 E. M. D. B. & M., to be farmed to cotton during the season of 1929 on share rental of one-half of all cotton and cotton seed produced, delivered at Gin agreed upon.

"The party of the first part is to furnish horses, feed for same, tools now on the land, and pay all power bills for power used in irrigating said land.

"The party of the second part agrees to properly prepare the land for planting to cotton and properly care for the crop while growing and when ready for harvest, to harvest the same and deliver the whole of said crop at Gin, all at his own expense; to properly care for the pumping plant on said premises, and all tools and improvements on said land, and keep the farming implements in good order and repair at his own costs.

"The party of the second part also agrees to advance one-half the cost for electric power for said land, the same to be repaid to him by the party of the first part when the crop is harvested.

"Upon the failure of the party of the second part to do and perform all the things and matters herein agreed to be done and performed, in good and proper season, it shall be optional with the party of the first part to do such things and charge the expense therefor to the party of the second part.

"The party of the second part further agrees to deposit with G. W. Zartman, the sum of three hundred dollars as security for the carrying out of this agreement on the part of the party of the second part.

"The party of the second part agrees to furnish the cotton seed to be sown on said land, but he shall be repaid in seed from the cotton seed harvested from said land, and the balance of the seed at the Gin shall belong one-half to each of said parties.

"Witness the hands of said parties the day and year first above written.

"S. K. Bogosian.
"F. B. Cotton."

In support of the contention that this agreement entered into between appellant S. K. Bogosian and F. B. Cotton was a mere cropping contract, whose execution did not violate the covenant not to sublet, appellants have cited a number of decisions of the Supreme Court of California. The earliest of these cases is the case of Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 541, 79 Am. Dec. 147, where it was held that an oral agreement, by whose terms one party was to have the land for three years to farm it and give the owner for its use one-third of the grain raised after it was sacked, the owner to furnish the farming implements, wagon, horses, and his share of sacks for the grain, was not a lease, although the parties termed it a lease, but that it was a contract for the working of the farm upon shares and that the parties were tenants in common of the undivided grain. In Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 59, the Supreme Court held that an agreement, wherein the party who is given possession of the premises for 22 months under an agreement to cultivate the land at his own cost and to deliver to the other party to the contract on the premises one-sixth of all crops harvested, was a lease. In its decision, the court points out that the question before the court in Bernal v. Hovious, supra, was merely who was entitled to the possession of the crop, not whether the owner or occupant was in possession of the land, and not whether the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties, although, as the court pointed out, that question was incidentally discussed. It is, however, strenuously contended by appellants that the Supreme Court of California has unequivocally announced the rule for the construction of agreements of the sort we have before us for consideration in the recent case of In re Okahara, 191 Cal. 353, 216 P. 614. This decision, therefore, merits our careful analysis. The question before the court in the Okahara Case was the construction of a certain instrument executed by the petitioner Okahara, designated as the contractor, and an individual who was termed the employer. Under the provisions of the agreement, the contractor, who was stated to be an independent contractor, agreed to clear all of the land and make it ready for plowing and planting within a period of two years from the date of the execution of the agreement, one-half of the land to be cleared during the first year of the agreement and the remaining half during the second year, for the performance of which work the contractor was to receive the compensation of $50 per acre. The contractor was to plant the whole of the land to orchard within two years from the date of the agreement, all trees to be furnished by the employer. The contractor also agreed to plant certain designated intercrops. The contractor further agreed to gather and pack all fruits, berries, and vegetables at seasonable times and to make delivery thereof at any fruit house designated by the employer. The contractor also agreed to furnish all labor and all machinery and equipment necessary for the performance of the contract. Tools and implements which were upon the premises were to be used by the contractor and returned at the expiration of the term of the agreement in good condition. The products from the land were to be sold by the employer upon such terms as he should deem best, and the contractor was to receive, as further compensation in addition to the allowance of $50 per acre for clearing the land, one-half of the net proceeds derived from the sale of the products, which share was to be paid to him in cash by the employer. It was further provided that the contractor should have access to the land at all convenient times for the purpose of doing the work, that all crops to be grown on the land should be the property of the employer, in which the contractor should have no interest, and that the employer should have no control over the contractor, his employees and equipment, but the contractor agreed that he, and all persons employed by him, should be diligent in the prosecution of the work, which was to be done in good workmanlike manner. It was further agreed that, if at any time the employer should be dissatisfied with the work done by the contractor or the progress of the work, he might immediately terminate the contract on paying to the contractor compensation in the form of the usual wages paid for similar work in the same neighborhood, up to the time of the termination of the contract. It was held by the Supreme Court that the instrument could not be characterized as a lease or transfer of any interest in real property, but that it had all the characteristics of an agreement of hiring, and could not, under any rule of construction, be held to be any more than a cropping contract. In arriving at this conclusion, the court analyzed the instrument and pointed out the following pertinent facts: First, that but few of the formal phrases ordinarily found in leasehold instruments appear in the agreement; second, that there was no surrender of possession of the premises to the so-called contractor; third, that a division of the net proceeds of the crops to be grown on the premises did not work a transfer of any interest in the soil; fourth, that the contractor was expressly limited to the planting of certain specified fruit trees, berries, and vegetables; fifth, that all products grown on the premises were to be the property of the employer and that the contractor should have no interest in them.

[1] A comparison of the instrument which the Supreme Court had under consideration in the Okahara Case and that which we have presented for our analysis in the instant case discloses that the two instruments differ in many material and important respects. In the first place we find in the agreement in the instant case certain phraseology generally appearing in agreements of lease. The instrument is denominated a lease. There is a statement that the party of the first part leases the premises for the definite term of one year. The compensation to be paid for the land is denominated a share rental. It is, to be sure, not of controlling importance that the instrument characterizes itself as a lease. Nevertheless, this fact is some evidence that the parties intended that it should so operate. Harrelson v. Miller & Lux, Inc., 182 Cal. 408, 188 P. 800; Morris v. Iden, 23 Cal. App. 388, 138 P. 120. It is also significant that the delivery by the occupant to appellant S. K. Bogosian of his share of the cotton crop was to be made off the premises. In Harrelson v. Miller & Lux, Inc., supra, it was said that such a fact is strong evidence that the instrument constitutes a lease. It is also significant that, so far as appears from the instrument, there was a transfer of possession of the premises to the occupant, who agreed to take proper care of the pumping plant on the premises and all tools and improvements on the land and to keep the farming implements in good order and repair at his own expense.

[2] It is our opinion that the agreement entered into between appellant S. K. Bogosian and F. B. Cotton, by whose provisions possession of the premises therein described was transferred for the definite term of one year on a share rental of one-half of the cotton crop produced on the premises, constituted a lease agreement and that the finding of the trial court that appellants had violated the covenant not to sublet the premises is supported by evidence of the execution of the instrument hereinabove considered.

Since we are of the opinion that the court's finding with respect to the violation of the covenant not to sublet is justified, it is not necessary to consider the propriety of other findings of the trial court with respect to the commission of waste by appellants and the failure of appellants to furnish alfalfa seed.

In arriving at the conclusion hereinabove stated, we have assumed that the record of certain evidence which was introduced at the trial is properly before us. The appeal was taken under the alternative method. Included in the Clerk's Transcript on Appeal is a copy of a document denominated "Stipulation as to Statements of the Case." This instrument obviously purports to set out in narrative form the substantial testimony of certain witnesses. It also contains a copy of the agreement whose construction presents the main problem in the action. The instrument purports to be signed by counsel for both parties, and bears the following indorsement: "The foregoing statement is allowed. J. A. Allen, Judge." It appears that no phonographic reporter was present during the trial and that the reporter's transcript contemplated by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure could not for this reason be prepared. It is at least open to serious doubt whether the so-called statement of the case is properly before this court. Pierce v. Works, 171 Cal. 684, 154 P. 852; Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 239 P. 1054; Koeberle v. Coit, 46 Cal. App. 641, 189 P. 727. However, as we have decided for the reasons herein stated, that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, the determination of whether this court has properly before it anything other than the judgment roll need not be made.

The judgment is affirmed.

It is here claimed that no testimony was taken as to the ability of petitioner to comply with the order. There is no merit in the contention. Action to recover the sum of $478.25 as commissions for the sale of certain personal property.

[1] The answer denied the indebtedness and alleged a set-off and counterclaim of $390. The court found for plaintiff and against the counterclaim and entered judgment for plaintiff in the full amount prayed for. Motion for new trial was made and denied, but the judgment was modified by changing the amount from $478.25 to $404.50. The appeal is from the original judgment, from the order denying a new trial and modification of judgment. The main point relied upon for a reversal is that the trial court improperly interpreted the commission agreement. So much of the instrument as is necessary for a discussion of the case reads as follows: "Your commission will be 10 per cent for all articles except for rayon where your commission will be 6 per cent., on the prices contained in my price-list. If you attain higher prices than those given to you you are entitled to 50 per cent of the difference. In this connection I wish to inform you, that I am getting here locally for 450 & 3/3 twist from the milliners and dressmakers, in some cases, as high as $3.50 per lb. and never less than $3.00. I think that this is the trade in which we both are mostly interested. In case of real large orders, for which, a considerable reduction will be necessary to get the business, your commission will have to be specially determined." The articles sold by plaintiff and upon which his claim for commissions was based consisted of merchandise other than rayon or silk. It was contended at the trial, by counsel for defendants, that the provision for the special determination of commissions in case of real large orders with reduction in price, applied to all such orders irrespective of the particular class of merchandise sold and therefore applied to the articles sold by plaintiff. Aside from the contract itself, a letter written by defendants was introduced in evidence which recited that the particular portion of the contract relating to the special determination of commissions referred solely to silk orders.

[2] The trial court found, and we think correctly, that plaintiff was entitled under the contract to the 10 per cent. commission for the character of merchandise he had sold. Complaint is also made that the findings are indefinite in certain particulars. We have examined the same and we find no merit in this objection. Appellants further complain that the trial court erred in reducing the judgment from $478.25 to $404.50. Respondent insists that as appellants are benefited by the action of the court, they have no cause for complaint. The reduction in the amount of the judgment was the result of a stipulation filed by the attorney for plaintiff consenting to such modification. It will be presumed in support of the judgment that a new trial was denied on condition that plaintiff file a stipulation consenting to the said modification. 2 Cal. Jur. p. 860.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

QUALLS v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO.

Civ. 4242.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 16, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 18, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 16, 1931.

1. Master and servant 🔑278(6, 18).

Evidence sustained finding of railroad's negligence in supplying freight car with defective brake, and causing collision during switching operations, justifying brakeman's recovery (Federal Safety Appliance Act § 2 [45 USCA § 11]; Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51–59]).

Evidence disclosed that freight cars were allowed to reach their places on various sidetracks under their own momentum; that plaintiff's duties as brakeman were to ascend moving cars and set brakes; that certain cars, which had already been stopped, started to move downgrade due to improper brakes when struck by other cars; that plaintiff, after giving signal to stop train and prevent other cars from being switched, ascended moving cars in question; that notwithstanding his signal, other cars were sent forward in such manner as to cause collision; and that plaintiff, believing cars were about to turn over, jumped to ground and was injured.

2. Master and servant 🔑111(1).

Interstate railroad has absolute duty to maintain efficient brakes to hold cars securely under ordinary circumstances (Federal Safety Appliance Act § 2 [45 USCA § 11]; Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51–59]).

3. Master and servant 🔑285(7).

Whether railroad's negligence in supplying freight car with defective brake, and causing collision when switching cars, proximately caused injuries to brakeman who jumped, believing car would overturn, held for jury (Federal Safety Appliance Act § 2 [45 USCA § 11]; Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51–59]).

4. Master and servant 🔑289(38).

Whether brakemen, believing car would overturn, was contributorily negligent in jumping when cars collided during switching operations, held for jury (Federal Safety Appliance Act § 2 [45 USCA § 11]; Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51–59]).

5. Master and servant 🔑246(1).

If reasonably prudent person would believe freight car might overturn, and would have jumped when cars collided during switching operations, brakeman was not contributorily negligent in so doing (Federal Safety Appliance Act § 2 [45 USCA § 11]; Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51–59]).

6. Master and servant 🔑228(2).

Railroad's violating statute by supplying freight car with defective brake precluded defense of contributory negligence, unless brakeman's negligence was sole cause of injuries (Federal Safety Appliance Act § 2 [45 USCA § 11]; Federal Employers' Liability Act § 3 [45 USCA § 53]).

7. Master and servant 🔑289(39).

Whether alleged negligence of brakeman who, believing car would overturn, jumped when cars collided during switching operations, was sole cause of injury, held for jury (Federal Safety Appliance Act § 2 [45 USCA § 11]; Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51–59]).

8. Master and servant 🔑204(1).

Brakeman did not assume risk of railroad's negligence in causing collision by switching cars on to side track when other cars were visibly moving out from adjacent tracks (Federal Safety Appliance Act § 2 [45 USCA § 11]; Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51–59]).

9. Master and servant 🔑204(2).

Employee does not assume risk of collision resulting from defective brake on freight car in violation of statute (Federal Safety Appliance Act, § 2 [45 USCA § 11]; Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51–59]).

10. Master and servant 🔑88(1).

Injured brakeman's misrepresentation that, preceding his employment, he worked on brother's farm three years instead of one, held an immaterial matter, not precluding recovery (Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51–59]).

> Brakeman testified that he made misrepresentation in question because, if it were known that an applicant for employment had gone out on a strike when previously employed by another railroad, he might not be hired, but there was no evidence that brakeman had in fact gone out on a strike, or that defendant railroad had any rule against employing persons who had done so.

11. Master and servant 🔑264(1).

Railroad, relying on injured brakeman's alleged misrepresentation and fraud in procuring employment, must plead and prove facts.

12. Trial 🔑260(1).

Refusing part of correct requested instruction held harmless, where principle therein was contained in part of charge given.

13. Trial 🔑260(1).

Refusing correct charge reiterating principle fully included in charge given was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Harry H. Qualls against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Robert Brennan, M. W. Reed, E. T. Lucey, Leo E. Sievert, and H. K. Lockwood, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul Blackwood, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff rendered upon the verdict of a jury for damages for personal injuries sustained in the course of his employment as a brakeman. The action was maintained under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (45 USCA §§ 51–59).

The defendant owns and operates an interstate railroad system extending into California. Among its properties is a freight depot and yard consisting of side tracks for the distribution of cars in the city of Los Angeles. The main track leading to the freight yard passes under an overhead bridge, past the depot, thence in a semicircle northerly to a switch communicating with side tracks Nos. 6 and 7. These tracks extend in a parallel course, and are separated just a sufficient distance to permit boxcars to pass. Northerly from this switch these side tracks ascend a slight grade. The making up of trains and the distribution of cars in this freight yard was in charge of a crew employed for that particular purpose. J. D. Lodgson was foreman of this crew. W. H. Mooney had charge of the switch. It was his duty to see that cars which had been run upon a side track were stationary before he gave the signal to kick other cars on to the siding. D. J. Gallagher was the front brakeman, whose duties required him to attend the switch engine and relay all signals for the operation of the engine when the engineer was not in sight of the switch. The plaintiff, Qualls, was an able-bodied man, thirty-eight years of age. He had experienced twelve years' service as a switchman. Three and a half or four years of this period were spent in that capacity with the defendant railroad company at Los Angeles.

[1] The accident which resulted in the injuries sustained by the plaintiff occurred June 17, 1926, about 5 o'clock in the afternoon. The atmosphere was clear. It was then perfectly light. The engine was coupled to the southerly end of a string of some twenty box cars which the yard crew were then engaged in distributing upon the side tracks. The switch was located at the sharpest point in the curve of the track, about 1,000 feet from the overhead bridge. The plaintiff was out in the yard four or five hundred feet northerly from this switch, in the neighborhood of tracks Nos. 6 and 7. It was his duty to catch the box cars as they were uncoupled from the train and run onto the various side tracks, ride them down the siding to the desired location and set their brakes.

He had performed this service with respect to one car which had been run on to siding No. 6 and for two cars which were run on to the adjoining side track No. 7. During this operation the switch engine with its train of cars was running back and forth beyond the switch to give the cars the necessary momentum to carry them to their desired location on the side tracks. A string of three other cars was run on to siding No. 7 while the plaintiff was engaged in riding a single car up track No. 6. These three cars struck the two cars already stationed on track No. 7, upon the nearest one of which the brake had been previously set. The cars were automatically coupled by means of the contact. The brake which had been previously firmly set by the plaintiff on one of these cars was evidently defective and failed to hold the five cars. This string of five cars began to slowly roll down the slight grade toward the switch. When the head car of this string reached a point about three hundred feet from the switch, the plaintiff observed the train to which the engine was attached, stationary, several car lengths south of the switch. Out of precaution he motioned the switchman, Mooney, to hold the train. The plaintiff was not then in sight of the engine, which was around the curve, but he saw Gallagher, the front brakeman, relay the proper signal to the engineer. Assuming that the brake which he had set on the second car of this runaway string was defective, because it failed to hold the cars, he mounted the second car from the head toward the switch, for the purpose of setting the brake on that car. By the time he reached the running board on top of the car, the head car had nearly reached the junction of the two side tracks. In spite of his former signals, he observed other cars from the freight train about to be switched on to side track No. 6. It appeared to the plaintiff that a collision was inevitable. As the cars rolled by on to siding No. 6, the head car of the string upon which the plaintiff was riding struck or "sideswiped" them. The plaintiff said in this regard:

> "I got on the north end of the car. Just as I got on top of the car I saw the car ahead of the car I was on rear up as though it was going to turn over, and I thought the cars were going to turn over and I jumped off.
> "Q. What made the cars rear up? A. The cars coming in on (number) 6 side-swiped it. * * * I thought all the cars were going to turn over."

The anticipated danger of the cars toppling over as a result of the collision was corroborated by other witnesses. Mr. Mooney, the switchman, testified: "Mr. Lodgson (the foreman) hollered to me and told me to look out, the car was turning over. * * * The first thing I knew, Lodgson said, look out, it is turning over. The car was leaning a little bit towards me." In the emergency, believing that the string of cars which he was riding would overturn, the plaintiff jumped to the ground. The bones of both heels were crushed. The tarsal and metatarsal bones of both feet were fractured, and his spine was seriously injured. There is evidence that the injuries to his feet will result in permanent ankylosis; that he may never be able to walk without crutches, and that certainly he cannot do so without great pain; that he will never be able to do heavy work requiring him to stand upon his feet. The spine, also, is permanently injured. There is a separation of the sacroiliac joint, which will cause great pain and inconvenience and which is likely to be incurable. Dr. Edwards testified: "I think he will remain totally disabled."

The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $20,000, for which sum a judgment was rendered. From this judgment the defendant has appealed.

It is contended the evidence will not support a finding of negligence on the part of the railroad company; that the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries was not the negligence of the defendant; that plaintiff's injuries were due to his own contributory negligence; that he assumed the risk of his employment; that the court erred in refusing certain instructions which were offered by the defendant; that the plaintiff is barred from recovering damages because his employment with the railroad company was obtained by means of fraud, in violation of the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act (45 USCA §§ 51–59).

The evidence sustains the implied findings of negligence on the part of the defendant and its agents in supplying a freight car with a defective brake, and in carelessly running a string of cars from the main line upon track No. 6 so as to collide with the cars upon which the plaintiff rode which were rolling back down track No. 7. Both of these acts concurred to proximately cause the collision which resulted in the injuries sustained by the plaintiff. On account of the defective brake, the five cars which were run up along track seven, rolled back to the switch, in spite of plaintiff's efforts to board them and set another brake. The switchman, Mooney, operated in plain view of this string of cars on track No. 7. It was his duty to hold the train on the main track, and run no more cars upon these sidings until the last cars kicked up on No. 7 were stationary. Just before mounting these runaway cars, the plaintiff had signaled him to hold the train. This signal was relayed by the head brakeman to the engineer. Under such dangerous circumstances, the train was nevertheless backed up and other cars were shoved on to track No. 6 just in time to cause the collision. These two acts of negligence combined to proximately cause the accident resulting in the plaintiff's injuries.

Section 2 of the Federal Safety Appliance Act, title 45, U. S. Code Annotations (Railroads), page 59, § 11, provides in part: "It shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this chapter to haul, or permit to be hauled or used on its line any car * * * not equipped * * * with secure * * * and efficient hand brakes."

[2] It is the absolute duty of an interstate railroad company to equip and maintain efficient brakes so as to securely hold cars under ordinary circumstances. Chicago, B. & Q. Ry. Co. v. U. S., 220 U. S. 559, 570, 31 S. Ct. 612, 56 L. Ed. 582; Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. U. S., 177 F. 623, 101 C. C. A. 249; Didinger v. Penn. Ry. Co. (C. C. A.) 39 F.(2d) 798; Altman v. Atl. Coast Line Ry. Co. (C. C. A.) 18 F.(2d) 405.

The evidence in the present case shows that the brake on the second car which was run on to track 7 was securely set. The plaintiff testified in this regard: "I set the brake. I used my brake club to set it. I set it as tight as I could." Mr. Lodgson, the foreman, testified, "I saw him set that brake. The car was standing after he set the brake." Mr. Mooney, the switchman, said, "Qualls set the brake on that car and it stayed there." There was but a slight grade from the point where this car stood on track No. 7 southerly to the intersection with track No. 6 near the switch. There is substantial evidence to indicate that a good brake should have firmly held this string of five cars. The plaintiff testified in this regard: "I know it had defective brakes on it. * * * If it had not been a defective brake it would have held them. * * * It happened to be a defective brake and let them roll back." Mr. Lodgson, the foreman, testified in this regard: "I have been a brakeman, switchman, for about 25 years. I know how brakes operate on cars. * * * When I kicked two cars in * * * on (track number) 7, and they came to a joint with that car on 7, I expected that to stop that car; hold those cars back. * * * If that brake had been efficient, had not been a defective brake on that car, * * * (it) would have been sufficient to hold those five cars on that slight grade there." Mr. Mooney also testified, "It should have held the three cars."

[3] The question as to whether the acts of negligence complained of became the proximate cause of the injuries sustained is a problem for the determination of the jury. Milwaukee, etc., Ry. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 474; Erie Ry. Co. v. Schleenbaker (C. C. A.) 257 F. 667, 669.

Indeed, it is the established rule of the federal courts, that when the negligence consists of a failure to comply with the Safety Appliance Act, the question as to the proximate cause of injury is thereby eliminated, and no longer furnishes a defense. Spokane & I. E. Ry. Co. v. Campbell, 241 U. S. 497, 510, 36 S. Ct. 683, 689, 60 L. Ed. 1125; Philadelphia & R. Ry. Co. v. Auchenbach (C. C. A.) 16 F.(2d) 550, 551, certiorari denied 273 U. S. 761, 47 S. Ct. 476, 71 L. Ed. 878; Payne v. Connor (C. C. A.) 274 F. 497.

In the Spokane Case, above cited, it is said: "It is too plain for argument that under this legislation the violation of the safety appliance act [45 USCA § 1 et seq.] need not be the sole efficient cause, in order that an action may lie. The circuit court of appeals (133 C. C. A. 370, 217 F. 524) held that the element of proximate cause is eliminated where concurring acts of the employer and employee contribute to the injury or death of the employee. * * * Where, as in this case, plaintiff's contributory negligence and defendant's violation of a provision of the safety appliance act are concurring proximate causes, it is plain that the employers' liability act [45 USCA §§ 51–59] requires the former to be disregarded."

[4] Moreover, the question as to whether the plaintiff's act of jumping from the top of the moving freight car constituted contributory negligence on his part was also a problem for the jury to decide. Potter v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 42 Nev. 370, 177 P. 933.

[5] It was the duty of the plaintiff to board these cars which were rolling back toward the switch, and stop them, if possible, by setting the brakes. He was attempting to perform this very duty when the collision occurred. When he saw the head car strike the cars which were rolling in upon track No. 6, and observed the head car "rear up" and "tip slightly," he thought the entire string of cars upon which he rode, would overturn. This was not an unreasonable conclusion under the circumstances. In this emergency, anticipating a wreck, he jumped from the top of the freight car to the ground and was injured. The question as to whether this act constitutes contributory negligence was for the jury to determine. If a reasonably prudent person would have been warranted in concluding that it was wise to jump from a car under similar circumstances to save himself from imminent peril, then that act would not constitute contributory negligence. The jury was fully and correctly instructed regarding this issue.

[6] Moreover, since the implied finding of the jury is to the effect that a proximate cause of the accident was the maintenance of the defective brake, the defendant's violation of the Safety Appliance Act became a bar to the defense of contributory negligence, unless the negligence of the plaintiff was the sole cause of the injuries which he received.

The Federal Employers' Liability Act, chapter 149, section 3, 35 Stats., page 66, U. S. Code Ann., title 45, § 53, page 379, provides in part: "No such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee."

In the case of Potter v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 42 Nev. 370, 177 P. 933, it was held that a brakeman who was injured in jumping from a moving freight car in the process of switching, to escape imminent danger proximately caused from losing control of the train on account of a defective coupling device, was not barred from recovering damages, provided he was reasonably warranted in apprehending imminent danger.

When the injuries of the employee are sustained as a result of failure to equip the cars with efficient hand brakes, contributory negligence is not a bar to the recovery of damages unless the employee's negligence is the sole cause of his injuries. Marcone v. New York Central Ry. Co., 105 N. J. Law, 466, 144 A. 635, affirmed 281 U. S. 345, 50 S. Ct. 294, 74 L. Ed. 892.

[7] The question as to whether the plaintiff's negligence was the sole cause of the injuries which he sustained as a result of jumping from the car is for the jury to determine. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Jones (Tex. Com. App.) 24 S.W.(2d) 32; Lusk v. Osborn, 127 Ark. 170, 191 S. W. 944. This question was resolved against the defendant.

[8, 9] It may not reasonably be said the plaintiff assumed the risk of such unwarranted negligence as running a string of cars into a siding just in time to collide with other cars visibly rolling out upon the switch at that very time. Nor does an employee assume the risk of a collision which occurs as the result of violating an act requiring all cars to be supplied with efficient brakes.

The Federal Employers' Liability Act, chapter 149, section 4, 35 Stats., page 66, U. S. Code Ann., title 45, § 54, page 434, provides: "In any action brought against any common carrier * * * to recover damages for injuries * * * such employee shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee."

In the case of Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Huxoll, 245 U. S. 535, 38 S. Ct. 187, 62 L. Ed. 455, it is held that the doctrine of an employee's assumption of risk is not a defense to an action for damages resulting from a failure to keep a power brake in efficient working condition.

It is uniformly held by a multitude of authorities that a servant assumes all the normal risks incident to his employment which are known to him, or which, in the exercise of ordinary care on the part of a person of reasonable prudence and intelligence, should be ascertained. U. S. Code Ann., title 45, note 24, p. 448. The doctrine of the assumption of risk on the part of a brakeman does not apply when a switchman negligently runs a string of cars on to a siding so as to collide with another string of cars, which in the exercise of ordinary care, he should have seen rolling down toward the switch. The brakeman is not presumed to anticipate such reckless conduct. Reed v. Director Gen. of Railroads, 258 U. S. 92, 42 S. Ct. 191, 66 L. Ed. 480.

[10] The appellant contends that the plaintiff is barred from recovering damages in this action because he procured his employment by means of fraud and misrepresentation.

In applying for his position with the defendant, the plaintiff signed an application in which he made the statement that during three years prior thereto he had been working on his brother's farm. At the trial he admitted this was not true and that he was employed on his brother's farm only one year. When asked why he had made this misstatement of facts, he said that if it were known that an applicant for a position with a railroad company had been out on a strike, he might not get a job. The plaintiff had worked as a brakeman for other railroad companies for some twelve years. The inference is that he may have previously gone out on a strike with the employees of some other company. There is no evidence that this is true. But even though it were true, it would not impair his ability to work as a brakeman, or his loyalty to the company with which he was employed. It does not even appear that the defendant railroad company had a rule against employing railroad hands who had formerly participated in a strike, or that knowledge on its part of his having done so, would make any difference regarding his employment.

We are of the opinion the misrepresentation regarding his former employment was upon an immaterial matter, and that it therefore does not bar his right of recovery.

[11] Moreover, the defendant pleaded no bar to recovery in the present action on the ground of misrepresentation and fraud. The effect of obtaining employment by means of fraud would render a contract of employment void. It is a cardinal rule of law that one who relies upon fraud as an affirmative cause of action, or as a defense, must ordinarily allege and prove the facts constituting such fraud.

The appellant relies upon the case of Minneapolis, St. Paul & S. M. Ry. Co. v. Rock, 279 U. S. 410, 49 S. Ct. 363, 73 L. Ed. 766. In that case the plaintiff was physically disqualified from passing the necessary examination to entitle him to employment with the railroad company. He had been previously examined and rejected by the same company. He then sent another man, who impersonated Rock and represented himself to be the plaintiff in whose name he successfully passed the physical examination and was accepted as an employee. Armed with this card of employment, the plaintiff Rock presented himself and worked for the company for some time until he was injured in an accident. It was there properly held the plaintiff had never himself passed the physical examination required of applicants, and that he was not the individual who was actually employed. For this reason it was held his fraud barred him from recovering damages.

This case may be reasonably distinguished from the case at bar. In the Rock Case the plaintiff was never really employed by the company. In the present case the plaintiff was employed. At most he merely exaggerated the length of time he was actually employed on his brother's farm. There is no evidence in the record indicating that this misstatement was material, or that a rule existed which would have prevented his employment even if he had admitted that he had once participated in a railroad strike while he was employed with some other company. Moreover, the defendant waived its defense on the ground of fraudulent employment by failing to plead the facts.

[12] The appellant charges error in the refusal of the court to give a portion of its instruction No. 26. The portion which was given reads as follows: "You are instructed that you may not speculate as to whether the defendant was negligent with respect to any matters shown in connection with the alleged injury, but such negligence, if any, must be established by the plaintiff by a preponderance of the evidence." Following the preceding language there was a paragraph elaborating or applying the principle which is there declared to the facts of the present case, which was omitted in the court's charge. The refusal to give this explanatory clause is charged as error. It read: "And if the evidence leaves the real cause of the injury to the plaintiff, Harry H. Qualls, as a matter of conjecture or doubt, then your verdict must be for the defendant." The last-mentioned paragraph might properly have been given in the charge. The omission, however, does not constitute prejudicial error. The same principle is contained in both portions of the instruction. The first part informs the jury they may not base a verdict upon speculation as to existing facts, but the negligence of the defendant must be established by a preponderance of evidence. The omitted part merely reinforces the same idea by saying in the event the evidence leaves the question of negligence in doubt or furnishes a mere conjecture as to its solution, the verdict must be rendered in favor of the defendant. The jury had been previously clearly instructed the burden was on the plaintiff to establish the negligence of the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence. There was no error in omitting the last portion of the foregoing instruction.

[13] The same observations are equally applicable to defendant's instruction No. 6, which was rejected. This instruction also reiterated the principles formerly and fully given to the jury to the effect that the burden rested on the plaintiff to establish the charge of defendant's negligence by competent evidence and that the question of negligence could not be left to mere conjecture or doubt.

There was no prejudicial error in omitting this charge.

The judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Separate actions by F. W. Becker and by Lena Becker against the Highboy Coaster Trust and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Howard F. Shepherd, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Samuel J. Crawford, of Santa Monica, for respondent.

CRAIG, J.

Two actions were brought in the superior court of Los Angeles county, praying that the plaintiffs' title to certain shares in a common-law trust be quieted as against the trustees thereof; judgments were rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendants appealed.

A common-law trust, designating F. L. Stineman, Charles Paige, L. H. Hendricks, F. W. Kasl, and S. F. Woody, as trustees, was created for the purposes of financing, constructing, and operating an amusement enterprise, to be capitalized at $100,000, represented by certificates of shares of the value of $100 each. Said trustees Paige and Stineman were also named among the beneficiaries, and recorded in the declaration of trust as the owners of 150 shares and 250 shares, respectively, subject to conditions and covenants of the parties hereinafter mentioned. Stineman transferred to the trust a leasehold interest in the premises upon which the structure was to be erected, together with his interest in a contract with Paige wherein the later agreed to construct and deliver to Stineman "fully equipped and ready for operation, with all bills checked and approved, and free from all liens, incumbrances and liabilities, except as shown by said approved bills," the structure in question, and that for the performance of said contract Stineman would pay all bills for material and labor, and would transfer to Paige a 3/20 interest in the business trust heretofore mentioned. It was also agreed in the contract between these two parties that, if the cost of construction should exceed the sum of $40,000, the difference should be paid by Paige, said 3/20 interest was expressly pledged as security for any such excess, to "be sold if necessary and so much of the sale price as is necessary shall be applied to the performance of this agreement." By the terms of the declaration of trust it was provided that "the title to every several item of the property constituting the trust estate shall have no legal or equitable right, title or interest in or to any several item thereof. The right of the beneficiaries shall relate only to the distributable proceeds of the trust"; and, further, that "the interests represented by the certificates may be transferred on the books of the trustees by the person named therein or his legal representative, upon the surrender of the certificate, and a new certificate shall be issued to the transferee, who shall then become a beneficiary." Each such certificate was made "subject to provisions of the declaration of trust" deposited in escrow with a named bank, and "transferable only subject to the provisions of said declaration of trust, hereby referred to and made a part of this certificate." Pursuant to a recital in writing of the foregoing facts and a petition that a certain number of shares be issued to Stineman, Paige, and other trustees and beneficiaries, certificates were issued by permission of the corporation commissioner and by his direction were placed in escrow under instructions which expressly stated that the same were issued, and should be held, by the bank, as escrow holder, subject to the commissioner's order. It is conceded that certificates representing such issued shares are still in escrow, as well as in trust. It appears that, following the commencement of construction work, a dispute arose as to the right of either Stineman or Paige to their shares, on account of certain asserted irregularities; that thereafter, acting upon information that Becker, respondent herein, contemplated the purchase of the shares of these two directors, certain other trustees informed Becker of the facts and of their contention that the consideration therefor had failed, that the purported beneficial interests of Stineman and Paige were void, and that the trustees would contest any claim of either, or of their assignees, to such interests. Subsequently, however, Stineman and Paige each executed a "transfer of certificates on the declaration of trust," "subject to the terms and conditions of escrow * * * under which said certificates are held" to the Beckers, and the same were accepted by them "subject to all the terms and conditions of the said escrow." At a still later date the trustees declared these certificates to be voided and canceled, and passed a resolution to that effect, copies of which resolution were forwarded to the escrow holder, to the corporation commissioner, and to Stineman, Paige, and Becker. As grounds for such action it was recited that the two assignors had "not assisted in the promotion of the enterprise represented by this trust in the good faith with which they agreed to aid in this matter, but on the contrary wrongfully used and diverted in violation of their trust property to the value of many thousands of dollars; and * * * the consideration for the agreement to issue said stock and the issuance of the same was that the said Stineman and Paige would carry out certain agreements and would devote their best efforts to the welfare of this trust * * * all of which they have failed to do." From the foregoing it is apparent that the subject-matter of the attempted assignments, if any existed, was legally in possession of the trust estate, which in turn placed it in trust with an escrow holder, to be delivered to the purchasers under certain conditions specified by the commissioner of corporations, when earned, and which conditions the trustees contended had not been performed. It is insisted by respondents that the diverted moneys of the trust were refunded and that this constituted a sufficient compliance with all conditions precedent to the transfer and delivery of the disputed interests; and, by agreement in writing which was introduced in evidence, the trustees agreed to transfer to Stineman certificates of the value of $1,500 in consideration of such refund. However, appellants do not concede that all of the conditions were performed. In fact said agreement expressly states that its execution does not preclude the trustees from asserting any claim or claims that they may believe they have against Stineman and Paige, or either of them, and that in the event of such claims the latter shall receive proportionate credits for the amount so refunded.

[1, 2] Thus there is presented a grave doubt as to respondents' right to an equitable interest in said shares, the legal title to which is unquestionably in the trustees, under escrow conditions which may never be fulfilled. It is too elementary to require the citation of authority that an assignee can acquire no greater or better title than that of his assignor. It is equally certain that the record before us entitles neither Stineman nor Paige to assert the right to possession or ownership of the beneficial interests in question. Yet their assignees appearing in equity attempt not to remove a cloud upon or quiet their title thereto, but to contest the legal title upon a mere claim of equitable title which is disputed, and thereby to acquire possession. Harrigan v. Mowry, 84 Cal. 456, 22 P. 658, 660, 24 P. 48, presented a similar suit by one whose equitable title was unchallenged. It was there said of the plaintiff in the opinion of the court in bank:

> "Her object was not to declare the title as it really was, which is the effect of a successful action to quiet title; her purpose was to change the title, and vest in herself the legal title that was outstanding in her trustee. This could not be done by an action to quiet title. The proper action would have been one to close up the trust, or to show that it had been closed, and to compel a conveyance of the legal title. It can make no difference that the reasons of the defendant for withholding a conveyance were insufficient or even unreasonable, as claimed. The court below could not, nor can we, declare that she has no title because she should, in justice, have conveyed it to the plaintiff."

Observations of the Supreme Court in a previous department decision of the same case are here appropriate:

> "The finding that the plaintiff was owner of the lots is not justified by the evidence. Conceding that plaintiff was in possession, and that possession is prima facie evidence of ownership, yet such prima facie evidence was rebutted and entirely overcome by the trust-deed, and other evidence introduced by the plaintiff showing that defendant and Haskell held the legal title. * * *
> "For the same reasons the finding that the 'defendant has not any estate, right, title, or interest whatever in said land or premises, or any part thereof,' is unsupported by the evidence. Nor is there any evidence that the defendant claimed any interest in the land adverse to the title of plaintiff. It appears that the defendant rightfully claimed that she and Haskell held the legal title as trustees for the plaintiff; but their legal title, as such trustees, was not adverse to the title of the plaintiff as sole beneficiary,—the only title proved in her.
> "But conceding, without deciding, that the plaintiff was entitled to a conveyance of the legal title, and that defendant wrongfully refused to convey it, an action to quiet title under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not appropriate, nor even permissible."

[3] Assuming for present purposes only, and not deciding, that the respondents' assignors had fully complied with all precedent requirements to the issuance and delivery to them or to their assignees of certificates representing the shares which they claim, the instant proceeding would not entitle them to such relief. "In an action to quiet title, the relief sought in the case at bar could not be so obtained. This action, being to enforce a trust and compel a conveyance, proceeds on the theory that the legal title is in the defendant, whereas a suit to quiet title ordinarily proceeds upon a contrary theory, and cannot be maintained against the holder of the legal title." S. San Bernardino Co. v. San Bernardino Nat. Bank, 127 Cal. 245, 59 P. 699, 700.

Holding as above indicated, it is unnecessary to consider other questions presented.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

Appeal from a judgment against the surety on a bail bond. The bail bond was furnished in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles in a prosecution for a misdemeanor. The defendant failed to appear for trial and the bail bond was ordered forfeited.

[1] Appellant contends that under section 1043 of the Penal Code the trial for a misdemeanor may be had in the absence of the defendant and hence the forfeiture was unwarranted. Since the taking of this appeal, however, it has been settled that Penal Code, § 1043 applies only to trials in the superior court, and that under Penal Code, § 1434, the municipal court may order the bail forfeited where a defendant fails to appear therein for trial. Pacific Indemnity Co. v. Superior Court, 102 Cal. App. 566, 569, 283 P. 345; People v. Aymar, 98 Cal. App. 1, 276 P. 595.

[2] Appellant's other point that the bond is more onerous than the requirements of section 1278 of the Penal Code is not borne out by the language of the bond. That section requires an undertaking that the defendant "will appear and answer the charge above mentioned, in whatever court it may be prosecuted, and will at all times hold himself amenable to the orders and process of the court, and if convicted, will appear for judgment and render himself in execution thereof, or if he fails to perform either of these conditions, that we will pay," etc. The bond given followed the language of the section, except that it provided "or, if the said defendant fails to perform either of the conditions, orders or process of the court in said action, that we will pay," etc. The addition of the words "orders or process of the court" added nothing to the obligation of the bond, since among the enumerated conditions of the bond are those that defendant "will at all times hold himself amenable to the orders and process of the court."

In the matter of the application of Gladys Johannes for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Jacob Johannes prayed to be directed to the Warden of San Quentin State Prison to secure release of prisoner on ground of unlawful detention.

Writ granted.

Bodkin & Lucas, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner, the wife of Jacob I. Johannes, filed a petition in which she set forth very fully the facts. The warden of the state prison at San Quentin has filed a return in which he sets forth certified copies of the judgments under which he holds Jacob I. Johannes as prisoner. He has also filed a general demurrer to the petition. On the hearing it was stipulated that the petition stands as a traverse to the return.

Jacob I. Johannes was convicted on June 22, 1928, in Los Angeles on the charge of grand theft. The indictment pleaded several counts, and he was convicted on counts 1, 2, 3, and 5, and also on another count in another action. He made a motion for a new trial, the motion was denied, and on July 5, 1928, the trial court pronounced the judgments that are set forth in the return. On July 6, 1928, the prisoner served a notice of appeal. On July 13, 1928, the prisoner, his attorney, and the district attorney appeared in open court, and the prisoner personally waived and abandoned his right of appeal, and thereafter the trial court entered an order vacating and setting aside the judgments set forth in the return, and imposed certain amended judgments. Some of the judgments pronounced July 5, 1928, ran consecutively. Those pronounced July 13, 1928, ran concurrently. By inadvertence the clerk delivered to the sheriff, and the sheriff delivered to the prison, copies of the judgments dated July 5, 1928. On September 21, 1928, the trial court made an order that commitment based on the judgment rendered July 13, 1928, be delivered to the warden at San Quentin. Thereafter such papers were prepared and delivered, but the record does not show on what date. As to the judgments running consecutively, the board of state prison directors has fixed the term at seven years, and, as to those running concurrently, it has fixed the term at five years and one year on the concurrent judgments, and it has ordered that the prisoner be discharged on parol when he shall have served one-half of his term. No question of good conduct is presented by the pleadings or otherwise.

[1-3] As this is an application for a writ of habeas corpus, it is a collateral attack on the judgments rendered in the criminal action. 13 Cal. Jur. 240; 29 C. J. 51. If two judgments have been entered in a cause, and the record—the judgment roll—is silent with reference to the reason therefor, in a collateral attack the judgment last in point of time must be deemed the true and final judgment in the case. Galvin v. Palmer, 134 Cal. 426, 66 P. 572. In a criminal action the judgment roll is defined by section 1207 of the Penal Code. By the terms of that section the indictment, a copy of the minutes of the plea or demurrer, all rulings thereon, and a copy of the judgment constitute the judgment roll. On a collateral attack, no other evidence may be received. 15 Cal. Jur. 50. We will confine our attention to those documents which are part of the judgment roll. To the return of the warden are attached the first judgments which show some of the judgments to run consecutively. The warden's return is supplemented by a stipulated exhibit containing documents marked "amended commitments" which show all sentences to run concurrently. The commitments attached to the original return were certified by the county clerk on July 5, 1928, and those contained in the exhibit were certified by the county clerk on September 21, 1928. The prison therefore holds two sets of judgments, under which it holds the prisoner.

[4-6] Under the order of the board of prison directors, as to the judgments providing that some of them will run consecutively, the term has been fixed at seven years, and the prisoner will be entitled to be paroled when the term has been one-half served; that is, January 5, 1932. Under the amended judgments, if valid, the term has been fixed at five years, and the prisoner was entitled to be paroled January 5, 1931. These facts are not controverted by the respondent, but he contends that the amended judgments are not valid. In this connection he makes the point that, when on July 6, 1928, the prisoner filed a notice of appeal, the trial court lost jurisdiction and had no power to enter the amended judgments. He cites several authorities. We need not pause to discuss each one, because of what is said in Lauchere v. Lambert (Cal. Sup.) 291 P. 412. At page 414 the court said: "The rule in this regard was stated by this court in the case of Fay v. Stubenrauch, 141 Cal. 573, 75 P. 174, as follows: 'Nor is the right of the lower court to amend suspended or impeded by an appeal where an amendment does not affect any substantial rights of the appellant, and consists of the correction of a clerical mistake appearing upon the face of the record. It is true that the court by the appeal loses jurisdiction of the cause for the purpose of the appeal, but it does not lose jurisdiction of its records. * * * Black on Judgments, § 162; Freeman on Judgments, § 73; People v. Murback, 64 Cal. 372, 30 P. 608.' The exercise of this power on the part of the trial court has been frequently upheld by this and by the appellate tribunals ever since the decision of the early case of Wiggin v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 398, 9 P. 646, and down to the decision by this court of the case of Robson v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 588, 154 P. 8—citing cases. From what has been said above it is clear the amended judgment did not prejudice any right of the prisoner; therefore his case is squarely within the rule stated. Again, the point is made that the amended commitments are in fact new commitments and not amendments. The record does not show such to be the fact. When the fact does not so appear, in a collateral attack, we are bound to presume that the amendment was regular. Lauchere v. Lambert, supra. The burden of showing that the first judgments were not wrong rests on the respondents. Ex parte Williams, 89 Cal. 421, 425, 26 P. 887; Matter of Long, 30 Cal. App. 442, 447–448, 158 P. 1056.

[7] If the amended commitments are valid, the time has arrived when the prisoner is entitled to be released on parole, as ordered by the board of state prison directors. Therefore the writ is granted, and the prisoner is discharged on parole as so ordered by the said board.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

It seems proper to direct attention at the outset to the incorrectness of the title of this appeal in order that our opinion may not be misread and misapplied. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants named in the caption, alleging that the corporate defendant B. Nicoll & Co. had become indebted to her in the sum of $1,338.80 for general hauling, which sum it had not paid either in whole or in part, that the other defendants, without right, claimed some interest in the account, and prayed judgment accordingly. The defendant corporation, B. Nicoll & Co., answered, admitting that it became indebted to Western States Transport Company in the sum of $1,282.43, and alleging that a controversy had arisen concerning the one to whom payment of that amount should be made; that it was not interested in that question; and that all of the parties had stipulated that the fund might be deposited in court and the answering defendant dismissed from the action. The stipulation was filed and the money deposited pending the outcome of the action. The defendant Epperson answered denying that the defendant B. Nicoll & Co. had become indebted to plaintiff and alleging that said claimed sum was the property of the Western States Transport Company; that he had recovered a judgment against the Western States Transport Company in the sum of $1,379.76 including costs; and that prior to the rendition of the judgment all moneys in the hands of B. Nicoll & Co. and due the Western States Transport Company had been garnished by him. The defendant Epperson also filed a cross-complaint in which he set up the same claim to the fund arising by reason of the garnishment and judgment and also alleging that, if the account was assigned to plaintiff by the Western States Transport Company, it was without consideration and was made for the purpose of defrauding creditors and in particular of defeating cross-complainant's judgment lien. The defendant Guaranty Liquidation Company also filed an answer substantially the same as that of defendant Epperson and setting up a garnishment of the fund and a judgment in the sum of $689.77, and by way of an affirmative defense again set forth its claim to the money, alleging that the assignment to plaintiff, if one, was made, was an attempt to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, and asked that its judgment be satisfied out of the fund.

Prior to the introduction of any testimony, it was stipulated by all the parties that the cross-complainant had levied a garnishment upon B. Nicoll & Co. for all moneys due the Western States Transport Company on February 9, 1928, and that thereafter and on February 20, 1928, in the identical action, had recovered a judgment against Western States Transport Company in the sum of $1,379.76, no part of which had been paid. It was likewise stipulated that the Guaranty Liquidation Company had garnished all moneys due or owing from B. Nicoll & Co. to the Western States Transport Company on February 10, 1928, in an action which had subsequently gone to judgment in the sum of $689.77. The bill of exceptions shows that plaintiff attempted to introduce some evidence, the materiality of which the trial court could not see (nor can we), and then asked leave to amend her complaint alleging an assignment of a contract between the Western States Transport Company and B. Nicoll & Co. to the plaintiff on November 1, 1927, which request the court below denied. Thereupon the defendants moved for a nonsuit, which was granted, and also asked for judgment upon the cross-complaint of cross-complainant Epperson and the affirmative defense of defendant Guaranty Liquidation Company, which was also granted, the court apportioning the fund to these two upon their judgments. The appeal is from the judgment so rendered.

[1-4] It is the contention of appellant that the court was without right to enter a judgment in favor of cross-complainant Epperson and defendant Guaranty Liquidation Company after motion for nonsuit as to plaintiff's complaint was granted. She bases her assertion in this particular upon the authority of City and County of San Francisco v. Brown, 153 Cal. 644, 96 P. 281, 282. That case was one in ejectment, to the complaint in which the defendants responded by an answer alleging "the statute of limitations and adverse possession for the requisite statutory period." After plaintiff rested its case, the defendants moved for a nonsuit, which was granted. Some time thereafter, the clerk, without any instructions from the judge, entered a judgment, pursuant to the instruction of defendant's counsel, decreeing the defendant Brown to be the owner and entitled to possession of the property. The Supreme Court said: "* * * [I]t is apparent that the judgment which was entered was not the judgment rendered by the court. The judgment, as rendered, was one of nonsuit only, the effect of which was simply to declare that the plaintiff had failed to make proof of material allegations necessary to sustain his cause of action. It decided nothing on the merits of the controversy, and necessarily could not, as its effect was to virtually put the plaintiff out of court. It operated simply as a dismissal of the case. Wood v. Ramond, 42 Cal. 643." Here, however, we are confronted with an entirely different situation. Epperson had filed a cross-complaint in reply to which an answer had been filed by the plaintiff. Cross-complainant was clearly entitled to have the issues thus raised tried and determined. Warner v. Darrow, 91 Cal. 309, 27 P. 737. All of the parties had stipulated, on account of the allegations of the various pleadings concerning the claims of plaintiff and defendants to a particular fund, that the amount of $1,282.43 should be deposited with the clerk pending the outcome of the action. Claim was also made to the fund by the affirmative defense of the respondent Guaranty Liquidation Company. The stipulation also dismissed the defendant B. Nicoll & Co. from the action. After the filing of this stipulation, the action took on the complexion of one in interpleader. 14 Cal. Jur. 701. In actions of this character, the answer is "in the nature of a cross complaint, and should be served upon each defendant, who may answer the same." S. F. Savings Union v. Long, 123 Cal. 107, 55 P. 708, 709. See, also, interlocking Stone Co. v. Scribner, 19 Cal. App. 344, 126 P. 178. It should be borne in mind that plaintiff haled the respondents into court by an allegation that they claimed some interest in the account which claims she denied. She had no other reason for making them parties defendant. Under these circumstances the reasoning of the following language in S. F. Savings Union v. Long, supra, is pertinent: "But when, as here, all parties come in, and, without objection, make up their pleadings and litigate their claims, we feel warranted in holding that all consent to the remedy sought, and to the payment into court and consequent dismissal as to plaintiff." This further feature of the case should be noted. The court was, under the special circumstances of this case, bound to try and determine the issues tendered by the cross-complaint of the respondent Epperson and the affirmative answer, which was but a cross-complaint, of the respondent Guaranty Liquidation Company.

[5] The record comes to us by means of a bill of exceptions, and it is stipulated that it is not intended by the specifications of error to assign the insufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment, and therefore we need not concern ourselves with that question somewhat argued in appellant's brief. With one exception hereafter to be mentioned the assignments of error relate to the sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment. Under this heading, in addition to the problem we have already solved, we read this specification: "That no issue was raised by the complaint as to any right or interest of the Western States Transport Company in the $1,282.43; that the sole issue raised by the complaint was in the right of the plaintiff to said money or to defendants by reason of a dispute as to plaintiff's therefor as an original contractor, and that the court had no right under said pleadings to render any judgment out of the independent contract of the Western States Transport Co." In so far as plaintiff is concerned, regardless of whether the Western States Transport Company might complain (that is hardly conceivable, inasmuch as that company was the judgment debtor), it would seem that the stipulation into which all the parties entered providing for the money to be held by the court pending the outcome of the action, would conclude the argument. But, whether it does, it is patent that appellant's argument directed to her specification cannot be sustained. The quoted assignment is a subhead under the general one that the findings do not support the judgment. A portion of the findings responsive to the pleadings is to the effect that B. Nicoll & Co. became indebted to the Western Transport Company and that the respondents had obtained judgment liens thereon. Therefore the findings support the judgment.

[6, 7] The exception we said would be mentioned is that the court erred in refusing to permit plaintiff after the trial had commenced, to amend her complaint to allege, instead of a direct indebtedness to M. C. Knapp by the defendant B. Nicoll & Co., an assignment by the Western States Transport Company of its right and interest in a contract then existing between B. Nicoll & Co. to the plaintiff. The court denied her leave to amend. It appears from the record that there were two Western States Transport Companies, one tagged "of California" and the other "of Nevada." The further assertion is made that plaintiff was the wife of the attorney for plaintiff and that counsel was also an officer of and counsel for the Western States Transport Company. Whether these things were mentioned at the time leave was asked to amend does not appear in the record. Likewise the bill of exceptions is void of any excuse offered by plaintiff to explain her delay in asking such an amendment. The facts we have recited are set forth only as indicating what may possibly have been before the trial judge which caused him to exercise his judicial discretion in the manner he did. We cannot say, in the absence of a good reason why the application was not earlier made, that the court abused its discretion. This further fact, however, establishes beyond question that the court did not err. The proposed amendment sought to allege, not an assignment of an account, but an assignment to the plaintiff of a contract on November 1, 1927. Had an executory contract been assigned to her on that date, the indebtedness thereunder and accruing thereafter would have been to her, which was the ultimate fact alleged in her complaint in these words: "That the said defendant B. Nicoll & Co. since November 1st, 1927, and until February 13, 1928, has become indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,338.80, for general hauling." The proposed amendment added nothing to the complaint as originally drafted.

Judgment affirmed.

Under statute conferring discretion on prison directors, 10-year term for grand larceny held not unconstitutionally arbitrary or discriminatory (Pen. Code, § 1168; Const. U. S. Amend. 14; Const. Cal. art. 1, § 11).

Petition by James W. Gough for a writ of habeas corpus against the Warden of San Quentin State Prison.

Petition denied.

Thomas T. Califro, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM.

Petition for writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner claims that he is unlawfully detained of his liberty at San Quentin State Prison. It appears from the petition that petitioner is held by virtue of a commitment issued out of the superior court in and for the county of Alameda pursuant to a judgment rendered upon a plea of "guilty" to a charge of grand larceny. The board of prison directors determined that the term to be served by petitioner is ten years. It is claimed that the act of the board in fixing said sentence to ten years was arbitrary, discriminatory, and in abuse of the authority and discretion vested in it, for the reason that others convicted of a like offense have been determined to suffer imprisonment for a much less time than that imposed on petitioner, for which reason the act of said board contravenes the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution and likewise contravenes the provisions of article 1, section 11 of the Constitution of the state of California. There is no merit in the contention. Section 1168 of the Penal Code gives to the state board of prison directors a discretion in fixing the term of punishment of persons convicted of crimes, taking into consideration the character of the prisoner.

The application is denied.

4. Appeal and error ⚷1010(1).

Findings not being sustained by evidence, judgment must be reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by N. E. McClory against Jonathan S. Dodge, Hyman Harrison, James M. Welch, Harry H. Hunter, Frank S. Griffis, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendants appeal.

Reversed.

H. L. Carnahan, Harry Povey, Person & Rodgers, Edmund H. Hinshaw, Howard R. Hinshaw, and Raymond Tremaine, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Joseph S. Campbell, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

Respondent brought this action to recover the value of certain shares of stock which he claims had been secured from him by fraud. Judgment was rendered in his favor against all of the defendants and from this judgment Dodge, Harrison, Welch, Hunter, and Griffis have appealed.

All of the defendants, except Boyd, were stockholders and directors of a corporation known as the Federal Securities Corporation, Hool being its president. How much of the capital stock of this corporation had been issued and to whom it was issued is not shown, except that Welch was the owner of one share.

Commencing in June, 1923, and continuing from time to time until April, 1924, respondent had purchased through Boyd and other agents of the Federal Securities Corporation 13,000 shares of the preferred capital stock of the Union Mortgage Company of California, for which he had paid $13,000. About the 1st of May, 1924, under an appointment made by Hool, respondent met Boyd, who was then a salesman of the Federal Securities Corporation. At this meeting, according to respondent, Boyd made a proposition to him to give him a certain number of shares of the preferred and common stock of the Federal Securities Corporation, the number not being stated, for the 13,000 shares of the Union Mortgage Company owned by respondent, informing him that the stock of the Federal Securities Corporation would be delivered to him as soon as a permit for its issuance could be secured from the corporation commissioner, for which an application had been made, and that this permit would be issued in a short time.

Respondent claims that he was induced to accept Boyd's proposition and to deliver to him the 13,000 shares of stock of the Union Mortgage Company by reason of certain representations made to him by Boyd.

Appellants insist that the findings of the court are not sustained by the evidence.

We have examined the evidence and find that in many instances this is true.

[1] The finding of the court that at all times mentioned in the complaint the defendants were stockholders and directors of the Federal Securities Corporation is not only not supported by the evidence, but is contrary to it. The allegations of the complaint cover a period of time and of alleged transactions between respondent and the Federal Securities Corporation beginning in June, 1923, and continuing to October, 1924, whereas the undisputed evidence is that Welch became a stockholder and director of the Federal Securities Corporation about May 1, 1924, and Dodge and Harrison about May 9, 1924, there being no evidence as to the time Hunter became a director or stockholder.

The finding that during all the times mentioned in the complaint, each and all of the defendants, except Boyd, had agreed among themselves, had confederated and were in agreement together, and had formed and were carrying out the deliberate design and purpose of selling various persons, including respondent, the capital stock of the Federal Securities Corporation for their profit is not sustained by the evidence.

[2] The finding that defendants caused to be printed and published and delivered to the public, including respondent, a certain prospectus, called the Federal Investment Guide, by means of which defendants made to respondent fraudulent and misleading statements, namely, "that if he invested in the Federal Securities Corporation his principal would be safe with absolutely no chance of loss; that the directors of said corporation were noted for their ability and integrity; that the assets of said corporation were liquid and convertible into cash on short notice; that money could be borrowed on said assets in case of emergency; that the business was a profitable one; that the investment therein would earn more than ten per cent per year; that he would not be required to pay a fictitious price for his stock, and that the Federal Securities Corporation complied with each and every one of the foregoing statements," is not sustained by evidence.

It appears from the evidence that the Federal Securities Corporation was the fiscal agent of the Union Mortgage Company, engaged in negotiating the sale of and selling shares of the capital stock of that company; that prior to June, 1923, it had caused to be printed and circulated a pamphlet known as the Federal Investment Guide, among prospective purchasers of the stock of the Union

Mortgage Company. This pamphlet sets forth ten questions and answers to be considered by purchasers of stock. It was not represented therein that these questions and answers applied to the capital stock of the Federal Securities Corporation, but on the contrary, they were a generalization of those things which should be taken into consideration by a person contemplating an investment in stocks.

The findings that defendants represented to respondent that by investing in the capital stock of the Federal Securities Corporation he would be enabled to reap enormous profits, that said corporation owned assets of the value of several hundred thousand dollars, and that said stock had a value in excess of the par value of $10 per share, are not supported by evidence.

The finding of the court that defendants, at the time of the attempted sale of the Union Mortgage stock, represented to respondent that the 13,000 shares of that stock was of the full market value of $13,000 and that at the time of said sale, agreed that said stock was of the value of $13,000 is not sustained by the evidence.

[3] There is no evidence of the market value, or any value, of the 13,000 shares of preferred stock of the Union Mortgage Company, owned by respondent, at the time of its alleged sale and delivery on May 1, 1924. The burden was on the respondent to prove the value of said stock. Parke v. Frank, 75 Cal. 364, 17 P. 427; Peek v. Steinberg, 163 Cal. 127, 124 P. 834; Smith v. Calley, 103 Cal. App. 735, 284 P. 974; 8 Cal. Jur. 895.

Respondent alleged in his complaint that defendants represented to him, at the time he purchased the 13,000 shares of the Union Mortgage Company that these shares were of the full market value of $13,000; that about one year afterward he discovered that on or about the 1st of May, 1924, and also at the time of their purchase, they had an actual value of only $7,000. Each of the defendants, in their answers, denied this allegation of the complaint, except Boyd, who filed no answer, and no evidence was offered in its support.

Respondent calls attention in his brief and cites authorities in support thereof, to the effect that where the evidence shows that an individual is the owner of the corporate capital stock, or where several individuals own all of such stock and use the corporation merely as an instrumentality through which they transact business, the separate entities will be disregarded when necessary to prevent fraud and protect the rights of third parties. Clark v. Millsap, 197 Cal. 765, 242 P. 918.

However, in the case now under consideration, the initial step toward invoking this law is wanting. There was no evidence offered indicating who were the owners of the issued capital stock of the Federal Securities Corporation, except the one share of said stock which was issued to Welch.

[4] Where the findings are not sustained by the evidence, the judgment must be reversed. People's Lumber Co. v. McIntyre & Peters, 179 Cal. 780, 178 P. 954; Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Fresno Flume, etc., Co., 161 Cal. 466, 119 P. 646, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 322.

The judgment is reversed.

All concur.

Appeals from Superior Court of Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Actions by Joseph P. Benner and another against W. H. Hooper, and by the same plaintiffs against W. H. Hooper and Dorothy G. Hooper, his wife. From a judgment against him, W. H. Hooper appeals, and from a judgment in favor of Dorothy G. Hooper, and from the amount of the judgment rendered, plaintiffs appeal.

Judgment as to W. H. Hooper affirmed. Judgment as to Dorothy G. Hooper reversed, with directions.

Davis & Melby, of Oakland, for appellant W. H. Hooper.

H. C. Kelsey and Clare S. Johnston, both of Oakland, for respondents and appellants Joseph P. Benner and Freda H. Benner.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

Since the submission of this cause Freda H. Benner, one of the plaintiffs, has died, and Anson Bilger, as administrator of the estate of said Freda H. Benner, deceased, has been substituted as a party to this action.

W. H. Hooper, one of the defendants in this action, built a house for his wife, Dorothy G. Hooper, also a defendant in this action. The house was built on a lot purchased by Mrs. Hooper, and it was intended for her own use and occupation. The house was built on filled-in land over a creek bed. Mrs. Hooper told her husband to put up a sign and try to sell it. Mr. and Mrs. Benner, the plaintiffs, visited the place. Mr. Hooper was there and asked them if they were looking for a home and they told him yes; that the place looked nice and high and that they did not desire to buy a home over a creek. Mr. Hooper replied that he did not blame them, that he would not either. Mr. and Mrs. Benner bought the house and received a deed from Dorothy G. Hooper and W. H. Hooper. Mrs. Hooper received the purchase price. The purchase was made July 15, 1926. The house was damaged by settling and sinking.

This action was brought to recover damages sustained by reason of fraudulent misrepresentations made by defendants, which misrepresentations induced plaintiffs to purchase the property.

Judgment was for plaintiff against defendant W. H. Hooper in the sum of $2,000. The court found that Dorothy G. Hooper had not given W. H. Hooper any written authority to act as her agent and that she had no knowledge of the false representations and in accordance gave judgment that plaintiffs take nothing from defendant Dorothy G. Hooper.

Defendant W. H. Hooper appeals from the judgment against him, and plaintiffs Benner appeal from the judgment in favor of Dorothy G. Hooper and from the amount of the judgment rendered.

The findings of the court relative to fraud are as follows:

"That plaintiffs entered said property, and W. H. Hooper asked them if they were looking for a home, and plaintiff Freda H. Benner said she liked the Hooper place, and that it was on high ground and no creek there, and plaintiff, Joseph P. Benner said they did not want property over a creek like some they had looked at, to which W. H. Hooper replied that he did not blame them for not wanting to get on a creek, that he would not want to buy on a creek himself, and that he guaranteed his houses for five years; that contrary to his knowledge that said house was built on a creek bed, said W. H. Hooper intended to and did, by his aforesaid statements to plaintiffs, intend to and did represent to them that said house was not on a creek bed that had been filled in;

"That said plaintiffs, in purchasing said property, relied on said statement and representations of W. H. Hooper and were deceived by them, and believed therefrom that they were buying property that was not on a creek, and which property they would not have purchased if it had been correctly represented to them."

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

Appellant Hooper, while admitting that the evidence was substantially as given in the findings, contends that there was no representation made relative to a filled-in creek bed, and defendant Hooper did not intend to represent to plaintiff that the house was not on a creek bed that had been filled in, that defendant Hooper had no knowledge of a creek bed.

As to the knowledge of defendant W. H. Hooper the evidence shows that Mr. Hooper had been a builder of houses "intermittently about twenty-eight years—actively for three years before building the Benner house."

Defendant Hooper testified that he knew that the property was filled ground on a creek bed and further stated: "I knew it was filled ground. I didn't know where the creek went through there exactly. I knew it was filled though." He further testified that he never told the Benners that it was filled ground. He also testified that before starting to build the house he made tests in different places around where the house was built and back in the lot "we made a test pit here about three and one-half feet square and went down to the sewer and stood on the sewer proper. We went down a little over sixteen feet then we made eleven other six-inch borings at different places around this house and back in the lot." the evidence shows that the test pits were of varying depths; that Hooper knew of the large sewer pipe or culvert laid in the bed of the creek under the house, that he took the trouble to dig down to it before building.

[1] In their first conversation Mr. Hooper told the Benners that "he had built numerous houses around in that vicinity." We think the evidence amply supports the finding of the court that defendant Hooper knew that the land on which the house stood was filled-in land over a creek bed.

The evidence of other witnesses is clear and positive that such was the nature of the land and no attempt is made to dispute the fact.

"The correctness of the findings of fact is to be determined upon a consideration of the entire evidence in the case, together with such inferences of fact as the trial court might properly draw therefrom. * * *" Rose v. Doe, 4 Cal. App. 680, 684, 89 P. 135, 137.

As to the fact of misrepresentation and intent to misrepresent, Mr. Benner in his cross-examination said: "My statement was we did not want to buy over a creek bed, that apparently this was a high ground; that we had looked at other houses on Cavanaugh road and they were over a creek, too, and we did not want to buy over a creek bed." "Q. And you assumed that this was not over a creek bed? A. Certainly. And Mr. Hooper said he did not blame us for not wanting to buy a house over a creek, that he would not either." Mr. Benner testified that Cavanaugh road was in that vicinity, and that Mr. Hooper said that "he had built numerous houses around in that vicinity, right across the street." "He showed us the house next door, he told us he built the house on either side."

A careful reading of the whole evidence shows that the extreme fill, even though lower here than in other parts of the tract, gave the appearance of high ground and put the Benners off their guard. It is obvious that they had assumed it to be naturally high land and not over a filled-in creek bed—the one character of land they were guarding against.

Defendant Hooper, having knowledge that this was filled-in land over a creek bed, could not fail to understand by the remarks of the Benners that they had assumed otherwise, and that his answer that "he did not blame them for not wanting to buy a house over a creek, that he would not either," would tend to confirm them in their mistake and lead them away from inquiry. By the statement made and his further silence defendant Hooper misrepresented the fact.

[2] "A purchaser has a right to rely on the representations of the vendor as to facts not within the purchaser's knowledge, and the vendor cannot escape responsibility by showing that the purchaser might have ascertained upon inquiry that the representations were untrue." Sullivan v. Helbing, 66 Cal. App. 478, 483, 226 P. 803, 805; Zwart v. Landfield, 93 Cal. App. 328, 333, 269 P. 740; 26 Cor. Jur. 1066. "* * * But a representation need not to be a direct lie in order to constitute remediable fraud; the false representation may consist in a deceptive answer, or any other indirect but misleading language. No hard and fast rule can be laid down as to what constitutes a fraudulent representation in any given case, since this depends upon the peculiar circumstances and conditions involved." See, also, 12 R. C. L., § 71: "Even though one may be under no duty to speak as to a matter, if he undertakes to do so, either voluntarily or in response to inquiries, he is bound not only to state truly what he tells, but also not to suppress or conceal any facts within his knowledge which will materially qualify those stated. If he speaks at all he must make a full and fair disclosure." Hill v. Associated Almond Growers, 90 Cal. App. 291, 265 P. 873; Ferguson v. Koch, 204 Cal. 342, 268 P. 342, 58 A. L. R. 1176; 12 Cal. Jur. 740; Sullivan v. Helbing, 66 Cal. App. 478, 483, 226 P. 803. Sections 1709, 1710, Civ. Code. Section 1710, Civil Code, reads as follows: "A deceit, within the meaning of the last section, is either: 1. The suggestion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who does not believe it to be true." Andrew v. Bankers & Shippers Ins. Co., 101 Cal. App. 566, et seq., 281 P. 1091. All the necessary elements of fraud are established in this case by direct evidence and the inferences necessarily following therefrom.

The representation that this house was not built over a filled-in creek bed is shown by the evidence to have been false. Knowledge of the falsity of the representation is shown by direct evidence of defendant W. H. Hooper and the inferences following his evidence.

[3] The intent to deceive was necessarily involved in the conduct of defendant Hooper. Defendant knew that plaintiffs did not want to buy land over a filled-in creek bed, and that, if they knew the truth, they would not purchase. Therefore, this was a material fact.

[4] When the evidence shows a false representation, and that the person making such representation knew it was false, the law supplies the fraudulent intent. 12 Cal. Jur., p. 826, § 75.

The misrepresentation is clearly an inducement of sale, as plaintiff had made known that he did not want to purchase that character of land.

[5, 6] We think that the finding of the court, supra, contains the essential element of intent to deceive. Such finding is inherent and necessarily inferred from the express findings and conclusions of the trial court. The inference could be made from the findings of the court; therefore, such inference will be deemed to have been made.

"Whenever from facts found other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made." Hamberger-Polhemus Co. v. Lewin, 101 Cal. App. 704, 708, 282 P. 425, 427; Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 217 P. 750.

In this case it may be fairly inferred from the facts shown by the record that, had the finding been made more specifically, such finding would have been adverse to defendant, and, therefore, the failure to find specifically that defendant did intend to deceive is not a ground for reversal of the judgment.

The findings are supported by the evidence and are sufficient to support the judgment against W. H. Hooper. Hamberger-Polhemus Co. v. Lewin, 101 Cal. App. 704, 282 P. 425; Beeman v. Richardson, 185 Cal. 280, 196 P. 774; Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 217 P. 750; Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 P. 309. Appellant also cites the case of Hall v. Mitchell, 59 Cal. App. 743, 211 P. 853. In the case last cited both pleadings and findings were so indefinite that the appellate court was compelled to reverse the judgment and allow the pleadings to be amended. We think that a careful reading of this case supports our conclusions aforesaid.

Appellant Hooper contends that the court's finding of guaranty does not support the conclusions of law.

There is no allegation of guaranty in the complaint, and the action is not predicated upon a guaranty. The allegation of fraud is not sustained by proof of guaranty, but the evidence of fraudulent misrepresentation is strengthened by the statement: "You need not be alarmed, I guarantee my houses for five years," in answer to the plaintiff's statement: "I am a little scared of the plaster in the house." During the same conversation while they were looking over the house, plaintiff expressed fear of the plaster and defendant answered: "You need not be alarmed, I guarantee my houses for five years." This is not such a guaranty as alone could be sued upon. It is merely a statement of assurance that the house was properly built on a proper foundation on firm land. "The house must be properly built or I would not guarantee it," is the inference the court might reasonably put upon the evidence. This is not a finding of guaranty.

[7] Appellant Hooper further contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence the contract of sale of the property between the Lakeshore Highlands Company and the vendee William Hooper on the back of which contract occurs the clause: "Purchaser is also fully advised that a portion of said real property consists of filled ground and that adequate foundations should be provided for any building or buildings erected or placed on any portion of said real property."

In view of the fact that the defendant Hooper admitted and stipulated that the locus in quo was filled-in ground, and in view of defendant Hooper's testimony that he knew it was filled-in ground, and that he knew it was over a creek, the evidence of the contract was cumulative to show his knowledge.

It was not material as going to the question of defendants' good faith and the absence of cause or necessity apparent to him, or in any manner misrepresenting the situation. Since plaintiff had said that he would not buy over a creek, plaintiff had apprised the defendants of the thing necessary to be misrepresented.

It was this knowledge alone that needed suppression—the knowledge of the filled-in land over a creek bed.

There is sufficient evidence to sustain the findings and judgment as to fraud without the clause in the contract being put into evidence.

Therefore, conceding the evidence as improperly admitted, it was not prejudicial to defendant's case. It was merely cumulative proof as to his knowledge, and as such we think it was properly admitted in evidence.

[8] Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment in favor of Dorothy G. Hooper and contend that the following finding and conclusion is erroneous:

"That Dorothy G. Hooper had not given to W. H. Hooper any written authority to sell said property or to act as her agent in the sale thereof, and that she had no knowledge of any representations made by W. H. Hooper in said sale, and had not authorized the same."

"That plaintiffs take nothing from Dorothy G. Hooper."

[9] We think the evidence shows that W. H. Hooper was the agent of Dorothy G. Hooper. It is not disputed that the property was owned by Dorothy G. Hooper, and that she transferred the title to the plaintiff and received the consideration therefor. The evidence shows that she told W. H. Hooper to "Put up a sign and see if you can sell it." There is no evidence of written authority, but the fact that she told him to put up a sign and try to sell it, then ratified the sale that he made by signing the deed and receiving the money, does establish that W. H. Hooper was the agent in fact of Dorothy G. Hooper. We find no evidence that Dorothy G. Hooper knew of the false representations made by her husband, that the house was not built upon a filled-in creek bed. However, it is a well-established rule that (12 Cal. Jur. § 46, p. 775): "The principal is held liable to third parties for the frauds committed by his agent in the transaction of the business of the agency."

In Bogart v. Crosby & Van Haren, 80 Cal. 195, 22 P. 84, plaintiff brought an action to recover the sum of $300 alleged in the complaint to have been received by the defendants from the plaintiff "as the agent of said plaintiff * * *, to the use of the said plaintiff." It appears that the defendants were real estate agents and as such received from the plaintiff the sum of $300 as a payment on the purchase price of certain real estate belonging to a third party for whom they were acting as agents. The agents paid the said money to the third parties. Thereafter the plaintiff notified the owner that he did not want to complete the purchase and demanded the return of the $300; the owner, when notified, said he did not care whether plaintiff took the property or not and turned the $300 back to the defendants. The defendants refused to return the money to plaintiff, and hence the suit to recover the same. The court held that whatever cause of action existed was against the owners of the property and not their agents. Judgment was for the defendants. On appeal by plaintiff it was contended by him: "That as it appears from the evidence that the appellants were only authorized, verbally, to sell, they were not the agents of the owners of the property, and therefore he was bound to look to them individually." On this subject the court said: "But the evidence of the owners themselves shows that they verbally authorized the appellants to sell the property; that they ratified their acts by accepting the cash payment, and were willing to carry out their part of the contract. This being the case, they would be estopped to deny the agency, as against the respondent's claim for the return of the money paid by him, and actually received by them, if he was entitled to recover the same."

Comparing this case with the one at bar, it appears that Mrs. Hooper told her codefendant, W. H. Hooper, to "Put up a sign and see if you can sell it." Upon the sale being made in accordance with said authorization, the defendant Dorothy G. Hooper executed a deed to the plaintiffs and received the purchase price therefor. Other cases in point are Quarg v. Scher, 136 Cal. 406, 69 P. 96; Willey v. Clements, 146 Cal. 91, 79 P. 850; Hamilton v. French, 78 Cal. App. 289, 248 P. 281; Blair v. Guarantee Co. of Long Beach (Cal. App.) 284 P. 719; Bonnarjee v. Pike, 43 Cal. App. 502, 185 P. 479; Powell v. Oak Ridge Orchards Co., 84 Cal. App. 714, 258 P. 636; Shopbell v. Boyd, 9 Cal. App. 136, 98 P. 69.

We are of the opinion that the court was in error in finding that the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment against Dorothy G. Hooper.

[10] The next question involved is that of damage. It is not claimed that the correct rule was not followed when the witnesses were being examined. Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 P. 729. However, witnesses called and examined pursuant to the rule stated, and the case cited gave evidence as to the value of the property as represented and gave evidence as to its actual value. The evidence given by those witnesses was expert evidence. The trier of facts can adopt it or reject it. Linforth v. S. F. Gas & Elec. Co., 156 Cal. 58, 63, 103 P. 320, 19 Ann. Cas. 1230; Zimmer v. Kilborn, 165 Cal. 523, 525, 132 P. 1026, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 368. The record discloses nothing showing that the trial court abused its discretion as to the amount of damages awarded.

[11, 12] Upon the appeal of plaintiffs from the judgment in favor of Mrs. Hooper the evidence is undisputed that Mrs. Hooper owned the property, that she orally authorized and directed W. H. Hooper to sell it, that she ratified the sale, executed the deed to plaintiffs, accepted the purchase price from them, and retained the fruits of the sale. Under these circumstances the trial court's finding that Mrs. Hooper had no knowledge of misrepresentations and did not authorize them is insufficient to sustain the judgment in her favor. Upon both principle and authority an agent's knowledge is imputed to his principal (section 2332, Civ. Code; 1 Cal. Jur. 847), and the principal is charged with the fraud of his agent committed in the course of his employment and in the interest of the principal (12 Cal. Jur. 775; Powell v. Oak Ridge Co., 84 Cal. App. 714, 719, 258 P. 636). This rule is uniformly applied when the principal is shown to have accepted and retained the benefits of the agent's fraudulent act. Hamilton v. French, 78 Cal. App. 289, 291, 248 P. 281.

However, we are unable to say that, from our examination of the record, the defendant Mrs. Hooper could not on a retrial "make a substantial showing in support of her cause" (Tupman v. Haberkern, 208 Cal. 256, 270, 280 P. 970, 976), and hence the judgment as to her must be reversed, with directions to the trial court to retry the sole issue of the amount of Mrs. Hooper's liability for the damages to which the plaintiffs have been found to be entitled to recover.

Judgment as to W. H. Hooper affirmed.

Judgment as to Mrs. Dorothy Hooper reversed, with directions.

Rehearing Denied March 28, 1931. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 28, 1931.

1. Gas 🔑20(2).

Workman, burned by explosion while working in sewer, was required to introduce evidence, showing not only that defendant's gas was allowed to escape, but also that it entered and accumulated in sewer pipe (Code Civ. Proc. § 1960).

2. Gas 🔑20(2).

Inference that defendant gas company's gas was in sewer where explosion injuring workman occurred must be founded on fact legally proved and on such deduction from that fact as consideration of course of nature warrants (Code Civ. Proc. § 1960).

3. Gas 🔑20(2).

In suit against gas company for injuries from explosion, until it was shown that defendant's gas caused injury, res ipsa loquitur did not apply.

4. Gas 🔑20(2).

In action against gas company for injuries from explosion in sewer, evidence failed to show defendant was responsible for explosion.

> There was some evidence that there were leaks in the pipes of the gas company, but no evidence was introduced showing that any of those leaks led to the sewer in which employee was working when the explosion occurred, and there was uncontradicted evidence that escaping gas would rise and not fall, and that it could not fall below the water level down into the sewer which was lower than the top of the water.

5. Gas 🔑20(4).

In action for injuries received in sewer explosion, evidence of defendant's negligence held for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Action by Joe Hernandez against Southern California Gas Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Thos. J. Reynolds, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George L. Greer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

Action for personal injuries. The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff, and, from the judgment entered thereon, the defendant has appealed. For some months prior to the happening of the accident the Los Angeles county sanitation district had been engaged in laying a sewer along the west side of Atlantic boulevard in the city of Los Angeles. In the immediate neighborhood of where the work was being done the ground is marshy. The water level is within six or seven feet of the surface of the ground. The sewer trench was dug, and at the same time the water was pumped out and the pipe was so laid that the bottom of it was about ten feet below the surface of the ground. The pipe was about three feet in diameter and was made in joints of reinforced concrete. North of Tweedy boulevard the sewer had been laid. Manholes had been installed, and some of them had been covered, but the joints of the pipe had not been caulked. The dirt and rock had been thrown back into the trench and the ground had been leveled up. The evidence does not show that any apertures, channels, or pipes of any kind led to, or into, the sewer from any direction except as they may have been created by or arisen out of the conditions we have noted. On the afternoon of the 22d day of February, 1927, the plaintiff took a coal oil lantern, tools, and materials, and entered the sewer to caulk the joints. He had worked about two hours and was inside of the sewer at a point approximately one hundred and fifty feet from the manhole he entered when an explosion occurred and he was seriously burned. He commenced this action to recover damages for his injuries. In his complaint he alleged that the defendant maintained gas pipes in Atlantic boulevard near the intersection of the two streets named above; that the pipes were negligently and carelessly maintained, and that gas escaped therefrom in large quantities and exploded and injured him. In its answer the defendant denied specifically the allegations of the complaint. In presenting his case the plaintiff introduced evidence showing that he entered the sewer as above stated; that an explosion occurred; that he was injured; and the nature and extent of the injuries. He also introduced evidence to the effect that one or two days after the explosion the defendant sent its employees into the neighborhood of the explosion and there made excavations and examinations and alterations. Some of the witnesses saw certain leaks. No one of those leaks was described as being closer than one hundred feet from where the plaintiff was at the time of the explosion. After the explosion had occurred no gas pipe was shown to be so broken as to allow gas to escape in large quantities. When the explosion occurred some of the witnesses stated that the flame was blue. At least one of the witnesses testified that the explosion was of such force as to shake the buildings and windows. The defendant's gas pipes contain natural gas and extend along the east side of Atlantic boulevard, and, from the main pipes, service pipes are led at right angles to the west over the sewer, or to the east to the properties of the defendant's customers. The pipes were so laid that they were from two to three feet under the surface of the ground. At the end of the plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a nonsuit. The court denied the motion, and thereupon the defendant proceeded to introduce its case. It called to the stand the employees who did the work and the employees who directed the work of making the above-mentioned excavations, alterations, and examinations of the gas pipes. Each one of those witnesses was examined and cross-examined as to what leaks, if any, were located. One leak, located about one hundred feet from where the plaintiff was working, was on the east side of the defendant's pipes and in a service pipe serving one of the customers residing on the east side of Atlantic boulevard. The witness testified that, when he located it and applied the soapsuds test, there were small bubbles, and the extent of the leak would be one or two cubic feet in ten or twelve hours. It was twenty feet east of the sewer and one hundred feet south of the manhole. One witness testified that there were two other small leaks at a distance of a few hundred feet from the place where the explosion occurred. The defendant's witnesses testified that, applying their pressure tests, they found no major leaks in any of the pipes at any place. They further testified that gas will not sink through water at all; that it is only about seven-tenths as heavy as air, and that it will rise from, but not sink into, trenches or pits. Neither party introduced any evidence showing that defendant's escaping gas flowed to, or into, the sewer.

[1-4] At all times the defendant claimed that there was no evidence that the gas which exploded was defendant's gas. It also claimed that the explosion was caused by the explosion of the plaintiff's coal oil lantern. It also contended that the explosion might have occurred from gasoline which those who were constructing the sewer had spilled from time to time. Furthermore, they claimed that the explosion might have been marsh gas instead of the defendant's gas. It cites and relies on Union, etc., Co. v. S. F. Gas, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 58, 141 P. 807. In reply, the plaintiff quotes evidence showing the explosion lifted the lids on the manholes. He argues that the explosion could not have been merely the explosion of a single lantern. He then contends that the surface soil of the street may have been packed and hardened, and that the defendant's gas leaked out of the pipes, approached the surface of the street, and was forced to pass under the surface of the street and across to, down to, and into the sewer. The answer is not sufficient. The plaintiff was bound to introduce some evidence, direct or indirect, showing, not only that defendant's gas was allowed to escape, but also that it entered and accumulated in the sewer pipe. Of course it is not contended that there is any direct evidence in the record that defendant's gas was in the sewer. Furthermore, an inference to that effect must be founded on a fact legally proved and on such a deduction from that fact as is warranted by a consideration of the course of nature. Code Civ. Proc., § 1960. But the direct positive proof in this record is that from "a consideration of the course of nature" natural gas will rise and not sink, and that it will not pass down into water. The plaintiff also makes the contention that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied, and he cites Smith v. Southern Counties Gas Co., 89 Cal. App. 81, 264 P. 532. But in that case the injured person at the time of the injury was standing in a pit in which the gas company had its pipes located. Both the plaintiff and the defendant in the case at bar concede that Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 P. 1020, 1021, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146, states the rule correctly when the court quotes from Shearman and Redfield on Negligence as follows: "When a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care." The italicized words present the very question before us, to wit, What caused the injury, defendant's gas or some other explosive? Not until it is shown that the defendant's gas caused the injury can the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur be relied on. 19 Cal. Jur. 708, § 125. Assuming that the defendant was negligent in having some leaks in its pipes, no evidence was introduced showing that any of those leaks led to the sewer, and the uncontradicted evidence is that the escaping gas would rise and not fall, and that it could not fall below the water level down into the sewer which was lower than the top of the water. It thus appears that there was no evidence showing that "the thing which caused the injury" was under the management of the defendant or that it belonged to the defendant, or that the defendant was in any way responsible for injuries caused by it.

[5] The defendant claims that it was not negligent. Hereinabove we have shown to what extent there were any leaks. Evidence was introduced by the defendant showing that it had a large corps of inspectors and repairers who diligently examined. All of these facts were for the consideration of the jury. They were properly submitted, and this court may not say as a matter of law that no negligence was shown. However, it is clear that the defendant's negligence was not shown to have been the cause of the injury.

In view of what we have said above, we need not discuss other points made by the defendant.

The judgment is reversed.

MURRAY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

Civ. 6547.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Feb. 24, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 26, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 23, 1931.

1. Carriers 🔑228(3).

In action against carrier for injuries to cattle testimony respecting value based on value of dairy cattle held admissible.

> It was the contention of the railroad that use of the cows as dairy cows could be said to be a "special use" within the exception in the bill of lading that would make them "other than ordinary live stock" and subject to special provision as to rates, dependent on the valuation.

2. Carriers 🔑230(12).

In action against carrier for damage to live stock, instruction on measure of damages held not error.

> The court instructed the jury as follows: "Where goods intrusted to a common carrier for shipment are injured through causes for which the carrier alone is responsible, the owner of the goods is entitled to recover, as damages, the difference between the value of the goods at the time and place of delivery in an uninjured condition and their value in the depreciated condition in which they were delivered to the owner, if any."

3. Carriers 🔑229(2).

Measure of damages for carrier's injury to live stock, unless limited by contract, is depreciation of market value of animals at time and place of delivery.

4. Carriers 🔑229(1).

Value of animals at private sale at destination was erroneous basis for damages for carrier's injury to live stock.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1).

In action for carrier's injury to live stock, testimony respecting value of animals at private sale at destination, though erroneous, held harmless (Code Civ. Proc. § 475).

> While objection should have been sustained to the question, witness' answer was in harmony with the other witnesses testifying as to market value, and jury apparently did not adopt even the lowest figure given by him in arriving at their verdict, and the substantial rights of the defendant were not affected by the error.

6. Carriers 🔑228(2).

That limitation of value of live stock on bill of lading was in writing did not make presumption of consideration against showing on face of record that there was none.

> Since the rate was not being fixed on value, the carrier suffered no detriment, and apparently gave nothing, and certainly the shipper received nothing, by having such a provision in the contract.

7. Carriers 🔑218(5).

Shipper did not accept contract of carriage with knowledge of terms creating assent to limitation on value, in view of uncertainty of contract (Civ. Code, § 2176).

> Carrier contended that figures "50/100" appearing under heading "Shipper's declared value" fixed limit of $50.00 per head, as value of live stock. No evidence was introduced as to how the characters relied upon got into the contract or to explain their meaning. Civ. Code, § 2176, provides that consignor accepting contract for carriage with knowledge of its terms assents to rate of hire, time, place, and manner of delivery therein stated, and also to limitation stated therein to carrier's liability for loss or injury to live animals carried.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carl Stutsman, Judge.

Action by Rex B. Murray against Southern Pacific Company for damages to livestock. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Glensor, Clewe, Van Dine & Turcotte, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by certain live stock of his shipped over the lines of defendant from Gordon, Cal., to Hynes, Cal. The case was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,250, and, from the judgment entered thereon, the defendant appealed.

The complaint alleges and the amended answer admits that the plaintiff delivered to defendant as common carrier, and defendant so received at Gordon, Cal., "certain ordinary live stock known as stock cattle, more particularly described as thirty-five cows." The contract used for the shipment was the form provided by the Interstate Commerce Commission and adopted by carriers in official southern and western classification territories, March 15, 1922, and known as the "Uniform Live Stock Contract," and is used for the shipment of live stock and wild animals instead of the uniform bill of lading, and it provides in part that: "Whereas, the classification and tariffs under which the agreement is made require that for the purpose of applying the lawful rate of freight the shipper must declare the shipment to be 'ordinary live stock,' specifying the kind or kinds of animals, or if not 'ordinary live stock' he must declare the kind and value of each animal, space for such declaration being printed below." Then under the heading "Ordinary Live Stock" appears the following:

"Ordinary live stock means all cattle, swine, sheep, goats, horses, and mules, except such as are chiefly valuable for breeding, racing, show purposes, or other special uses. On shipments of ordinary live stock no declaration of value shall be made by the shipper, nor shall any values be entered on the bill of lading.

"I (we) declare the shipment covered on this bill of lading to be ordinary live stock. ——— Shipper."

Following the above is another heading, "Other than ordinary live stock," under which appears the following:

"On shipments of live stock chiefly valuable for breeding, racing, show purposes, or other special uses different rates of freight are in effect dependent on the valuation placed thereon by the shipper, which valuation may be the basic valuation as stated in the classification, at which the lowest freight rate applies, or it may be any higher valuation up to actual value, in which event the freight rate will be higher by the amount prescribed in the tariffs or classification. Such declared or agreed values shall be entered in the column provided therefor in this bill of lading, and in no event shall the carrier be liable for any amount in excess of such valuation.

"I (we) declare the shipment covered by this bill of lading to be other than ordinary live stock, and of the value herein declared, or agreed upon, and entered. ——— Shipper."

The plaintiff as shipper did not sign his name to either of such declarations in the contract involved here. There are other headings in the contract of interest here as follows: "Number and Description Animals." "Weight (Subject to correction)." "Shippers declared value (If on live stock for breeding racing show purposes or other special purposes)." "Rate of freight." "Per 100 lbs." "Per car."

In the contract before us the following insertions appear to have been made under the heading, number and description of animals, "35 head stock cattle feeders," and under weight, the figures "23600." Under the heading "shippers declared value" appears the following: "$^{50}/_{100}$," and there is no insertion in the blanks under the heading "rate of freight." Testimony was also introduced to the effect that the carload rate for transporting ordinary live stock in a standard 36-foot car (which is the kind used in the shipment here) between Gordon, Cal., and Los Angeles, where plaintiff took delivery and shipped them on to Hynes by truck, was $97. This standard rate is made applicable to all shipments of "ordinary live stock," and is the amount the plaintiff testified that he paid. The plaintiff also testified that he paid $55 per head for the cows shipped, or a total of $1,925. He also testified on cross-examination that he sold the cattle in their damaged condition for $2,188.85, although the total itemized sales as shown by evidence only makes $2,098.50. It was also brought out on cross-examination that his total expense on the trip, some of which was apparently made necessary by reason of the alleged physical condition of the animals, was $723.50.

[1, 2] While appellant has urged several contentions they all revolve around the questions: (1) Did the court apply the proper rule for measuring damages in its admission of evidence and instructions to the jury, and (2) does the contract fix the limit to the damages provable of $50 per head? As we have said, the complaint alleges and the answer admits that the stock shipped in the instant case consisted of "ordinary live stock, known as stock cattle, more particularly described as thirty-five cows." With regard to the market value of the cows at Hynes, the point of destination, Mr. Rule, a witness for the plaintiff, testified, over the objection of defendant, that the market value of cattle of the same kind and character as the cattle here "at date of arrival was $125 to $130 per head." He also testified that one cow of the shipment was worth $6 or $7, four or five others were worth $10 each and the balance of the shipment about $65 each, all in the condition in which they actually arrived. On cross-examination it developed that he was basing his value on "dairy cattle." Robert Zangle, another witness of plaintiff's, also testified over defendant's objection that the market value of five of the cows observed by him at Hynes about the time of their arrival, in an uninjured condition, was from $125 to $135 per head, and that in their injured condition four of them were worth $10 a head, and one about $7. The witness also testified:

"By Mr. Gilbert:

"Q. Well, you would not have the jury understand for a minute that those cows could be driven down herein the general stock yards and be sold without reference to their dairy value and bring any such value as that—that is what you fix your price on? A. The price I give from $125 to $135 was for dairy cows.

"Q. Yes. Used for a special purpose and chiefly valuable for that? A. Yes; that is what I was quoting on."

There is no evidence that the cows in question were other than ordinary cows. There is no evidence of any value beyond the ordinary for breeding purposes, or for amount or quality of milk produced by them. Not only were the cows shipped admittedly "ordinary live stock," but they seem to come squarely within the meaning of that term as used in the contract of shipment. It defines "ordinary live stock" (so far as we are concerned) as follows: "Ordinary live stock means cattle * * * except such as are chiefly valuable for breeding, racing, show, or other special uses." And while the witnesses Rule and Zangle frankly said the market value given by them was based on their value as dairy cows, still can it be said that is a "special use" within the exception that would make them "other than ordinary live stock"? That is appellant's contention. The Standard Dictionary defines "cattle" as: "Domesticated bovine animals, as oxen, cows, bulls and calves." The very common use of cows is producing milk and reproducing their kind, so we must conclude that ordinary cows are necessarily included in the term "ordinary live stock." There is no evidence in the record here that the cows in the shipment were of any particular value above the ordinary for either use, and in our opinion they did not fall within the exception, as their use for either milk production or breeding was not special within the meaning of such exception. The conductor of the train, a witness for the defendant, gave a very succinct statement of the appearance of the animals, which seems to be borne out by the admissions of the parties, as well as the evidence. He said: "They had the appearance of just common ordinary cattle." On the measure of damages the court instructed the jury as follows: "Where goods intrusted to a common carrier for shipment are injured through causes for which the carrier alone is responsible the owner of the goods is entitled to recover, as damages, the difference between the value of the goods at the time and place of delivery in an uninjured condition and their value in the depreciated condition in which they were delivered to the owner, if any." We see no error in the instruction given, or in the admission of the testimony of the witnesses Rule and Zangle.

[3-5] The plaintiff himself, over the objection of defendant, testified that cows of the same type, grade, character, and ages sold for $125 to $135 each, at private sale, at Hynes, during the months of January, February, and March, 1923. There is no question but what the measure of damages in such a case, unless limited by contract, is the depreciation of the market value of the animals at the time and place of delivery. Olcovich v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 332, 176 P. 459. And the testimony of the witnesses Rule and Zangle was in accord therewith, but value at "private sale" at the destination was an erroneous basis. But while the objection should have been sustained to the question asked plaintiff, his answer is in harmony with the other witnesses testifying as to market value, and the jury apparently did not adopt even the lowest figure given by him in arriving at their verdict, and, as the substantial rights of the defendant do not seem to have been affected by the error, it must be disregarded. Section 475, Code Civ. Proc.

[6, 7] 2. Does the contract fix a limit of $50 per head to any damages sustained? Appellant contends that the figures and character "$^{50}/_{100}$" appearing under the heading "Shipper's declared value" fixes such a limit, and that applying that limit plaintiff's recovery could not exceed $189. Section 2176, Civ. Code, provides as follows: "A passenger, consignor, or consignee, by accepting a ticket, bill of lading, or written contract for carriage, with a knowledge of its terms, assents to the rate of hire, the time, place, and manner of delivery therein stated; * * * and also to the limitation stated therein to the carrier's liability for loss or injury to live animals carried. But his assent to any other modification of the carrier's obligations contained in such instrument can be manifested only by his signature to the same." It would seem that such a limitation may legally be made and particularly where the rate is fixed on the value stated. Donlon Bros. v. Southern Pac. Co., 151 Cal. 763, 91 P. 603, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 811, 12 Ann. Cas. 1118. The contract here involved expressly provides that "on shipments of ordinary live stock no declaration of value shall be made by the shipper, nor shall any value be entered in this bill of lading." The shipment made falls in that class and apparently takes the basic rate per car, rates on live stock chiefly valuable for breeding, racing, show purposes, or other special purposes, being based on actual values declared by the shipper. In the latter case there would be a reason for a shipper limiting the value in order to obtain a cheaper rate, which would not seem to apply in the case of a shipment of ordinary live stock. No evidence was introduced as to how the characters relied upon got into the contract, or to explain their meaning, and we are asked to assume that they mean "$50 per head," as the shipper's declared value, and that by their insertion into the contract of shipment it was intended to limit the carrier's liability for loss and injury of the animals to that amount per head. The rate not being fixed on value, as we have seen, it is hard to see, assuming that the characters mean what appellant claims, and further assuming that it was intended as a limitation of plaintiff's liability, where there could be any consideration for the agreement. Defendant suffered no detriment and apparently gave nothing, and certainly plaintiff received nothing by having it in the contract. The fact that it is in writing would make a presumption of consideration ordinarily, but not against the showing on the face of the record that there was none, and in the face of uncertainty as to the meaning we could not presume nor do we see how the jury could find from the face of the contract that the plaintiff accepted the contract of carriage "with a knowledge of its terms" which would seem to be a necessary condition of his "assent" to the limitation. Section 2176, Civ. Code.

In view of the foregoing we see no error in the action of the trial court in refusing certain instructions as to such alleged limitation of liability or in giving the ones it did relating thereto.

Many exceptions are noted both as to the introduction of evidence and the giving and refusing of instructions as well as the refusal of the court to grant a motion for nonsuit, but plaintiff has not seemed to rely on most of these, so it is sufficient to say that we do not see any prejudicial error therein.

Judgment affirmed.

BLAKESLEE et al. v. ALLEN et al.

Civ. 7607.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.
Feb. 26, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 28, 1931. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 28, 1931.

1. Wills ⊶849.

Where trust attempted to be created is void and there are no other apt words in will disposing of property affected thereby, intestacy results (Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8).

2. Wills ⊶675.

Precatory words should not be regarded as creating trust unless it appears testator intended to impose imperative obligation.

3. Wills ⊶675.

In determining whether bequest creates precatory trust, question is whether legatee is beneficiary or merely trustee—whether recommendation expressed meant to govern party's conduct or merely to indicate what testator thinks would be reasonable exercise of discretion.

4. Wills ⊶601(8).

Testator's expression of desire regarding legatee's disposition of estate vested in absolute terms is not construed as limitation (Civ. Code, § 1322).

5. Wills ⊶601(8).

Words "direct" and "shall be expended," in connection with disposition of property bequeathed, merely expressed testatrix' desire.

6. Wills ⊶669.

Whether will attempted to create trust was question of intention to be determined from whole will.

7. Wills ⊶601(8).

Will giving residue to testatrix' nieces and directing that it be expended for charitable purposes made absolute gift and did not attempt to create trust.

In residuary paragraph testatrix gave all rest, residue, and remainder of property to two nieces, share and share alike, and directed that residue, if not exceeding one-third of estate, should be expended for charitable or philanthropic purposes in accordance with testatrix' views as expressed. In another paragraph a trust with respect to home place was expressly created, and in a letter to nieces testatrix stated that the charitable purposes mentioned were only suggestions on her part and that they might find a better use for the property.

*Hearing granted 4 P.2d 948.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Henrietta Farrelly, deceased. Proceeding between Elizabeth Blakeslee and others, and Martha C. Allen and another, in which the former appeal from part of a decree of final distribution.

Affirmed.

Stanislaus A. Riley, of San Francisco (Henry F. May, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal by the heirs and next of kin of Henrietta Farrelly, deceased, and Robert S. Farrelly, her predeceased husband, from that part of a decree of final distribution entered in the above matter which distributes her residuary estate to her nieces Martha C. Allen and Maude T. Pesante. The question to be determined is the interpretation of the 19th or residuary clause of the will of the deceased.

The pertinent paragraphs of the will are as follows:

"Third. I give to my brother Henry Wilson of Broadmoor, Alameda county, California, $10,000.00, and to my brother Calvin Wilson of San Jose, California, $10,000.00; and I give to my sister Clara J. Jackson of Broadmoor, California, $10,000.00. I give to Maude T. Pesante of Oakland, California, daughter of my deceased sister Rebecca Tuttle, $15,000.00. I give to the other surviving children of said Rebecca Tuttle, who may survive me, $5,000.00 each, and I give to each of the seven children of my brother, the above named Calvin Wilson, who may survive me, $5,000.00 each.

"Fourth. I give, devise, and bequeath to my niece Mattie C. Allen the sum of $200,000.00."

"Nineteenth. All the rest, residue and remainder of my property of every kind and nature wheresoever situate I give, devise and bequeath to my said nieces Mattie C. Allen and Maude T. Pesante, share and share alike. If said residue shall not exceed one-third of my estate I direct that the same shall be expended for charitable or philanthropic purposes and in accordance with my views as expressed. If such residue shall exceed one-third of my estate I direct that said one-third of my estate shall be expended as in this item provided, and the excess thereof shall be expended by them as I may suggest to them hereafter.

"Twentieth. In the event the Home Place, which is that certain tract of land consisting of fifty acres, more or less, and now occupied by me and my late husband as our late residence for many years and fronting on East Fourteenth street near Stanley road, be not sold during the administration of my estate, I give, devise and bequeath the same to Charles H. Hale, but in trust, however, to manage and control the same, and I direct that he sell said property at the earliest possible time consistent with his judgment and discretion, and upon the completion of said sale the net proceeds in cash derived from said sale shall vest in and become the property of my nieces Mattie C. Allen and Maude T. Pesante, share and share alike, but it is my wish that said proceeds from said sale be expended for charitable or philanthropic purposes and in accordance with my views as heretofore expressed, and thereupon said trust herein shall terminate. The creation of this trust on said conditions shall in no way be inconsistent with a sale of said property by my said executors during and pending the administration of my estate."

At the time the will was executed the testatrix also wrote the following letter:

"November 6, 1926.

"Mrs. Mattie C. Allen.

"My Dear Niece:

"In my will I have mentioned that I would leave a letter addressed to you with reference to the disposition of certain property, and this is the letter.

"I would like to have the house and lot on Tenth street near Jefferson street in Oakland, California, used for some charitable or philanthropic purpose. The only purpose that occurs to me now that it might be put to is a place where trained nurses temporarily out of employment might find a home.

"The six-acre piece in San Leandro I should also like to have devoted to some use which generally I should define as being made useful for children and young people, if such use can be found, and provided, of course, that I do not dispose of the same prior to the taking effect of my will.

"You will note that I have left the residue to you and to Maude T. Pesante to carry out the purposes herein set forth. You will discuss and counsel with Maude T. Pesante, I know, in connection with these things.

"The above charitable purposes are only suggestions on my part. After investigation and advising with Maude T. Pesante and others who may be competent to advise with you, you may find a better use for each or all of these properties, but you know my general desire in the matter, and I leave it to your good judgment.

"If other suggestions occur to me I will add them and leave them with this letter.

"Very truly yours,

her
"Henrietta (X) Farrelly.

The court found that the intention of the testatrix was to make an absolute gift of her residuary estate to her two nieces above named and not to create a trust.

It is claimed by appellants that the testatrix intended and attempted to leave the residuary estate in trust for charitable purposes, to be administered by her two nieces; that the trust, due to the fact that it was not sufficiently specific, was void, and the residuary estate was consequently intestate property distributable under subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code.

[1-4] The rule is well settled that where a trust attempted to be created is void, and there are no other apt words in the will disposing of the property affected thereby, intestacy is the result. Estate of Heberle, 153 Cal. 275, 95 P. 41; Estate of Hamilton, 181 Cal. 758, 186 P. 587. But precatory words may or may not create a trust, according to the circumstances of the particular case; and they are not to be regarded as having that effect unless it appear that the testator intended to impose an imperative obligation and to exclude the exercise of discretion or option in reference to the act in question. Estate of Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 61 P. 964, 64 P. 1071. As held in the Estate of Hamilton, supra, in determining whether a bequest creates a precatory trust the question is whether the legatee is the beneficiary or merely a trustee for others—whether the wish or desire or recommendation that is expressed by the testator is meant to govern the conduct of the party to whom it is addressed, or whether it is merely an indication of what he thinks would be a reasonable exercise of the discretion of the party, leaving it however to the party to exercise his own discretion. It has also been held that while the expression of the desire of the testator for the disposition of his estate is to be construed as imperative when addressed to his executor, it will not, when addressed to his legatee, be construed as a limitation upon the estate or interest expressly vested in the latter in absolute terms (Estate of Marti, supra; Estate of Mitchell, 160 Cal. 618, 117 P. 774; Estate of Browne, 175 Cal. 361, 165 P. 960; Estate of Hull, 77 Cal. App. 792, 247 P. 1093), it being the rule that a clear and distinct devise or bequest cannot be affected by any reasons assigned therefor, or by any other words not equally clear and distinct, or by inference or argument from other parts of the will (Civ. Code, § 1322).

[5, 6] In the present case the desires of the testatrix are not directed to her executors but to her legatees, to whom she expressly gives all the residue of her estate share and share alike. While this provision is followed by others in which the word "direct" is used in connection with the words "shall be expended," such use is not conclusive upon the intention of the testatrix, but the same may be construed merely as expression of desire on her part. In re Lynch's Will, 102 Misc. Rep. 650, 169 N. Y. S. 321; In re Jansen, 181 Wis. 83, 193 N. W. 972, 49 A. L. R. 5; Estate of Hull, supra. The question is one of intention, to be determined from the consideration of all the provisions of the will. Alexander, Wills, § 1098; Perry, Trusts and Trustees (7th Ed.) § 114; Spooner v. Lovejoy, 108 Mass. 529; Negro Chase v. Plummer, 17 Md. 165; In re McVeigh's Estate, 181 Mo. App. 566, 164 S. W. 673.

[7] That the testator or the draughtsman of her will knew what were apt words for the creation of a trust is manifest from paragraph 20, wherein a trust with respect to the home place is expressly created; and the fact that such words are not used in paragraph 19 is evidence that it was not her intention to do so with respect to the property in question. Kauffman v. Greis, 141 Cal. 295, 74 P. 846; In re McVeigh's Estate, supra; Williams v. Committee of Baptist Church, 92 Md. 497, 48 A. 930, 54 L. R. A. 427. A contrary intention is further shown by the letter referred to in the will, which contains the only specific expression of her desires respecting the use of her residuary estate, and wherein she states that "the above charitable purposes are only suggestions on my part. After investigation and advising with Maude T. Pesante and others who may be competent to advise you you may find a better use for each or all of these properties; but you know my general desire in the matter, and I leave it to your good judgment."

Other reasons are advanced by respondents in support of the findings of the court below, but the above in our opinion sufficiently supports the conclusion that it was the intention of the testatrix to make an absolute gift to her nieces, and that her desires were not meant to govern their conduct but were, as she stated, only suggestions, the whole matter being left to their discretion.

The portion of the decree appealed from is affirmed.

MAKEIG v. UNITED SECURITY BANK & TRUST CO.

Civ. 7302.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 21, 1931.

1. Husband and wife 🔑259.

Husband and wife residing temporarily in different places due to economic or social reasons are not "living separate and apart" within statute (Civ. Code, § 169).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Living Separate and Apart," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Husband and wife 🔑259.

"Living separate and apart" applies to condition when spouses have come to parting of ways with no present intention of resuming marital relations (Civ. Code, § 169).

3. Husband and wife 🔑259, 264.

Evidence sustained finding that husband and wife were not living "separate and apart" so as to make accumulations of wife her separate property (Civ. Code, § 169).

4. Appeal and error 🔑1056(3).

Exclusion of testimony respecting agreement of deceased wife to live with friend did not warrant reversal of judgment holding husband entitled to wife's accumulations as community property.

Although such evidence was to some extent contradictory of that of husband to effect that he and wife were living apart temporarily with idea of ultimately establishing a common home, it related merely to intention of deceased wife to continue in future to have a separate abode from that of her husband, affording a somewhat weak inference that she had always entertained such intention, but could not overcome positive testimony of mutual desire as soon as convenient to resume common habitation.

5. Husband and wife 🔑264.

Evidence held not to establish that accumulated fund of wife was separate property by agreement of parties, or gift from husband.

6. Husband and wife 🔑248½.

Administrator for deceased wife was entitled to amount acquired by her before marriage with accumulated interest as her separate property.

7. Husband and wife 🔑273(1).

Executor of deceased wife was entitled to one-half of fund acquired subsequent to law making community property subject to testamentary disposition (Civ. Code, §§ 1401, 1402; Code Civ. Proc. § 1542).

Although Civ. Code, § 1402, provides that possession and control of community property shall not be transferred to personal representative of wife except to extent necessary to carry will into effect, it appeared that only $10 was bequeathed to husband and entire balance to others, making it necessary for personal representatives of wife to retain possession of amount subject to testamentary disposition in order to carry will into effect.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by George O. Makeig against the United Security Bank & Trust Company, as executor of the estate of Annette Netherland, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Keyes & Erskine, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Kington & Cunningham, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant as executor of the last will and testament of the deceased wife for $10,384.54, and defendant appeals from the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff and his deceased wife first met at Greenville, Miss., in the month of December, 1910, and afterwards moved to California. Plaintiff is a barber by occupation, and the deceased wife, who had been a manicurist, became a saleswoman at a department store in San Francisco. They were married at Bakersfield, Cal., January 18, 1914, and were never divorced. The wife died June 8, 1928, leaving a will naming the defendant executor, and bequeathing the sum of $10 to her husband and the bulk of her estate to her brother. At the time of her death there was deposited in savings accounts in her name, to wit, Annette Netherland, in three separate banks the total sum of $10,001.64. In addition to this, the sum of $194.36 in interest accrued and became due June 30, 1928. The defendant took possession of this total fund after its regular appointment as executor. The court found that $188.58 in interest became due on the above amount on December 30, 1928, and further found that the total of the above sums was community property of the plaintiff and his deceased wife, and gave judgment for plaintiff on his complaint (which sought recovery of the whole fund on the theory that it was community property) and against the defendant for the aggregate of the said three sums; namely, $10,384.58. It is admitted, and the court found that of the above amount $3,696.84 was acquired after August 17, 1923.

The finding that $188.58 interest became due December 30, 1928, respondent admits is not supported by the evidence. The record also shows clearly that at the time of the marriage the decedent had $83.54 on deposit at interest in one of her three savings accounts, and, so far as the record shows, this was never withdrawn prior to her death, and it appears to be a part of the total judgment.

In the period of fourteen and one-half years between the marriage of the parties and the wife's death, they lived together for a period of about six weeks immediately following the marriage. Then by agreement the wife returned to San Francisco and to her work as a saleswoman in a department store there. In reply to a question as to when she next lived with him, plaintiff replied, "We never did settle down." Three years later she visited for a week in El Paso; but, as plaintiff did not have a steady job, and had been moving from place to place working as a barber three or four weeks in a place, the wife again returned to San Francisco. In December, 1917, plaintiff came to San Francisco and lived in one hotel while his wife lived in another. Plaintiff testified: "We did not live together in San Francisco. She lived in one hotel and I lived in another," but in reply to a question from the judge he testified that during that time they had marital relations. She came to plaintiff's room and he went to her room, but neither remained overnight. Thereafter, and from 1918, plaintiff lived in Bay Point, Cal., off and on, being away about one year in Benicia. All of this time his wife continued to live in San Francisco and worked as a saleswoman in a department store from March, 1914, to December 31, 1926. She never lived with him at Bay Point, but during that time the record discloses the parties visited back and forth, plaintiff sometimes meeting her in San Francisco, and several times she visited him at Bay Point over week-ends, occupying the same room, and where she was introduced as his wife.

The parties corresponded. Several letters are in evidence covering the period from February 27, 1916, to June 1, 1928. Plaintiff testified he wrote once a week, and that sometimes she would not write to him for a period of two months.

After the marriage, the record shows she earned about $14,000, and her total deposits during this time were about $9,000. Plaintiff testified that during all this time he sent her the greater part of his earnings, or from $75 to $100 per month, totaling from $12,000 to $15,000; that he kept no record; the amount was simply an estimate; that he never sent it by check or draft, but only by currency just put in an envelope; and that they never discussed financial matters or what she was doing with the money; that he assumed she used it for living expenses, but never asked her.

The marriage status of the two was practically secret, except to three of plaintiff's friends at Bay Point. The wife's closest friends did not know of it. Plaintiff even addressed all his letters to her under her maiden name. He did not know any of her friends in San Francisco. Plaintiff's explanation of their status was that his wife liked San Francisco, and they were trying to get money together for a home. As he testified: "It was always said, 'Well, just as soon as you can get some money together we will come together.' She was always talking every time I saw her when I was with her about saving money up—was making a home." Plaintiff also testified that his wife said, "It won't be long before we will be able to go housekeeping and get a house," and that their only understanding in regard to money was that as soon as they got money enough together they would make a home; that "Easter Sunday, 1928," was the last conversation he had with her about living together; that he had between three and four hundred dollars, which he considered sufficient for this purpose, but that he got crippled just after that and spent all his money on his legs, and that the only other property that he owned was the furniture in his barber shop and the lease to the shop. His testimony was to the effect that he was to provide the home, that they never did quarrel, and their relationship was always friendly.

Respondent's wife went to a hospital about April 13, 1928, where she remained until her death, June 8, 1928. Defendant offered to prove that she did not believe her illness was serious, and hoped and expected to recover in a short time, and had definitely agreed with a lady friend of some years' standing that as soon as she was able she would give up her room in San Francisco and go and live permanently with her friend at Burlingame. The plaintiff objected that this evidence was hearsay, incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and the court sustained the objection.

Plaintiff contends that the bulk of said savings accounts was derived from the money he sent his wife. Defendant contends that said savings accounts were the accumulations of her own earnings from her steady employment, and made possible by her very frugal living as disclosed by the record.

The issues in the case are briefly these:

Was the money so deposited in the respective banks at the time of the wife's death community property, or was it separate property as the earnings and accumulations of the wife while living separate and apart from her husband within the meaning of section 169 of the Civil Code?

If not separate property for this reason, was it separate property as a gift from the husband, or separate property by tacit or mutual agreement of the parties?

If it was community property, is the wife's executor entitled to retain possession of one-half of that portion thereof acquired after August 17, 1923?

Respondent claims, as there was not an actual rupture of the marital relations of the parties, and as the evidence does not show the separation was final, the parties cannot be said to have been living separate and apart.

In the case of Humphrey v. Pope, 122 Cal. 253, 54 P. 847, in construing section 370 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes a wife to sue alone "when she is living separate and apart from her husband by reason of his desertion of her," the Supreme Court quoted with approval Tobin v. Galvin, 49 Cal. 34, "that the words 'while living separate and apart from her husband,' do not mean a temporary absence of the wife. There must have been an abandonment on the part of the husband or wife, or a separation which was intended to be final."

In the case of Union Oil Co. v. Stewart, 158 Cal. 149, 110 P. 313, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 567, which involved the question of the right of the wife to acquire title to her husband's land by adverse possession, the court, in construing the provisions of section 169 of the Civil Code, said, at page 157 of 158 Cal., 110 P. 313, 316: "When a husband abandons and deserts his wife, remaining permanently separate from her, and at the same time delivers to her the possession of his land, she may claim title to it, as her separate estate."

In the case of Loring v. Stuart, 79 Cal. 200, 21 P. 651, it was held that, where the wife lived in one city and the husband in another on account of domestic infelicity, which was never reconciled, and the husband testified he did not intend to return to her, but never told her of his intentions, the Supreme Court held that the earnings of the wife while so living were her separate property within the meaning of section 169 of the Civil Code. See Finks v. Thompson, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 538, 32 S. W. 711; Wright v. Bank, etc., 13 Ga. App. 347, 79 S. E. 184, at page 186.

In the case of Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 P. 228, 229, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170, the Supreme Court said: "If the wife is living separate and apart from the husband, through her own fault, her earnings and accumulations are her own." It is undoubtedly the law that no matter what the cause of the separation may be, if it is a separation in the legal sense the wife's accumulations are her own.

[1, 2] Living separate and apart, however, as contemplated by said section 169, does not apply to a case where a man and wife are residing temporarily in different places due to economic or social reasons, but applies to a condition where the spouses have come to a parting of the ways and have no present intention of resuming the marital relations and taking up life together under the same roof. Under modern conditions, there is many a man living and working in one place and his wife living and working in another, seeing one another only on week-ends, sometimes not for months at a time, yet they are not living separate and apart within the meaning of the section, for there has been no marital rupture, and there is a present intention to live together as man and wife, and their status is only temporary, although it may happen that the condition might exist for some years.

[3] In the light of the above decisions and the law we must approach this case to determine whether the decision is supported by the evidence.

Plaintiff's case rests almost exclusively on his own evidence.

[4] What we have above set forth shows very clearly that there had been no final rupture of the marital relationship. The parties to the marriage were, and always had been, quite friendly; and while, perhaps, the case is unique in the long and persistent separation of the spouses so far as their actual abode is concerned, such living apart seems to have been regarded by them as temporary and with the idea of ultimately establishing a common home. It is true there was offered on behalf of the defendant the testimony of an intimate friend of the deceased that the latter had agreed with the witness to take up her abode with her if and when she left the hospital. Upon objection, this evidence was excluded, and such exclusion is assigned as error. This evidence, being to some extent contradictory of that of the plaintiff, should have been admitted; but we think its rejection was not of sufficient prejudice to the defendant to warrant a reversal of the judgment. It related merely to the intention of the deceased to continue in the future to have a separate abode from that of her husband. It afforded a somewhat weak inference that she had always entertained such intention; but it could not overcome the positive testimony of the husband that up to that time it had been their mutual desire as soon as convenient to resume common habitation; and, if such excluded testimony merely indicated the future intention of the deceased alone, it could not, if admitted, have changed the community status of the fund involved in the present proceeding, since it was all accumulated prior to the genesis of this intention of the deceased to make her permanent home with her friend, nor does it appear that such intention was ever disclosed to the husband.

[5] Appellant contends that, if the money in question was not separate property by reason of being the earnings of the wife, it was separate property as a gift from the husband or by tacit or mutual agreement of the parties. There is no evidence whatever to sustain the contention that the money was separate property by tacit or mutual agreement of the parties; and, so far as its being a gift from the husband is concerned, the husband testified that he never intended it as a gift, and there is no evidence in the record by which this court could hold it was a gift. Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 P. 308; Sprague v. Walton, 145 Cal. 228, 78 P. 645.

[6, 7] The judgment, however, must be modified. The record clearly shows that $83.54 of the amount was acquired by the wife before marriage, and with its accumulated interest thereon since 1912 of $61.15 at the rate allowed by the bank, or a total of $144.69, was the separate property of the wife. There was no evidence to support the finding that $188.58 interest became due December 30, 1928. Moreover, conceding that all the money deposited since the marriage in the banks by the wife, with its accumulated interest, was community property, yet $3,696.84 of that amount was acquired subsequent to August 17, 1923, the effective date of the amendment to section 1401 of the Civil Code, making one-half of the community property subject to the testamentary disposition of the decedent. While section 1402 of said Code provides that the possession and control of the community property shall not be transferred to the personal representative of the wife except to the extent necessary to carry the will into effect, in this case, where only $10 is bequeathed to the husband and the entire balance to others, it is without question necessary for the personal representatives of the wife in this case to retain possession of the amount subject to her testamentary disposition in order to carry her will into effect, not only to pay her debts, but the costs, charges, and expenses of administration as well as the legacies. This executor is entitled to retain possession of one-half of said sum of $3,696.84, to wit, $1,848.42, although it may be community property. 11 Cal. Jur. 1004; Code Civ. Proc., § 1452; Page v. Tucker, 54 Cal. 121.

The judgment must, therefore, be modified by deducting from the amount thereof the total of said sums of $144.69, $188.58, and $1,848.42, namely, the sum of $2,181.69. It is so ordered, and, as thus modified, the judgment is affirmed, appellant to recover its costs of this appeal.

REDD v. WILLIAMS RADIATOR CO.

Civ. 4251.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 6, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 4, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 4, 1931.

1. Master and servant 🔑72.

Letter written by employer to employee expressing dissatisfaction held not cancellation of employment contract, even as to bonus clause therein.

Employment contract provided for bonus in case employee fulfilled expectations after three months, and letter written to employee approximately five months thereafter referred to making change in organization on ground that employee was not making sufficient impression on those persons assigned to him and stated that agreement would have to be canceled, but that employer would be willing to continue to pay same salary, but without bonus feature, concluding with statement as to belief that employee could best serve company's interests in different line of work which would be indicated at earliest opportunity.

2. Master and servant 🔑80(9).

Finding that employer waived alleged cancellation notice respecting contract of employment held warranted.

Evidence established that president of employer corporation, after writing letter to employee expressing dissatisfaction with work and intimating that different line of work would be provided in future, did not at any time make any other arrangement as to terms of employment, substitution of any different contract, or cancellation, and that employee continued performing his duties as he had done from beginning.

3. Master and servant 🔑72.

Written employment contract held supported by sufficient consideration in respect to option providing for bonus.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1).

Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence will be sustained on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; H. V. Alvarado, Judge.

Action by John B. Redd against the Williams Radiator Company, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Black, Hammack & Black, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jacobs & Jacobs, of Stockton, for respondent.

McDANIEL, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. The action was upon an employment contract evidenced by the following document:

"Mr. J. B. Redd,
"7342 Jasmine Avenue,
"Palms, California.
"Dear Sir:

"Confirming our conversation of Tuesday, February 19th, 1924, regarding your employment commencing March 15th, 1924:

"1—For and in consideration of your undivided time and services we will pay you a salary of $300.00 per month ($3,600.00 per year).

"2—If after three months you fulfill our expectations, we further agree to pay you a bonus annually and which shall be governed by the billing of the company and computed as follows:

"When billing exceeds $225,000.00 we will credit you with one-half of one per cent (½ of 1%) of the total billing for our fiscal year ending January 31st and payable 50 per cent February 15th, and 50 per cent August 15th.

"Example:

Billing for year 1925—$250,000.00
½ of 1% of $250,000	$1,250.00
Salary for year	3,600.00
Total compensation	$4,850.00

"3—Bonus for the year 1924 will be computed as above less the time not employed or in other words, if billing equals $250,000 the net bonus would be $1250.00 ($104.20 per month) less $156.25 (1½ months not employed) or $1093.75. Total compensation for the year would be as follows:

10½ months at $300.00	$3,150.00
10½ months bonus at $104.17	1,093.75
Total compensation	$4,243.75

"This agreement is subject to cancellation at any time by giving 30 days notice in advance.

"Yours very truly,
"Williams Radiator Company
"By ———, Assistant Secretary"

Plaintiff entered upon his work under this agreement on the 15th day of March, 1924, and continued in said employment until on or about the 1st day of March, 1925. Subsequently to March 1, 1925, by mutual agreement, plaintiff continued in the employment of the defendant corporation but under a different arrangement. Instead of a bonus and salary, thereafter he worked for a commission on sales, being allowed a checking account of $200. On August 19, 1924, Mr. J. M. Williams, who was president of the defendant corporation, wrote and mailed to plaintiff the following letter:

"Los Angeles, August 19, 1924.
"Mr. Redd:—

"I am going to be away for a few days. I wanted to see you before going but did not arrange it. I will see you on my return the early part of next week.

"It is going to be necessary that we make a change in our organization because it is evident to me that you are not making as much impression on the architects and engineers assigned to you as is necessary for the protection of our interests. I will undertake to give you a different assignment.

"We will have to cancel our agreement that we made last spring, dated March 1st, 1924. I am willing to continue to pay you the same salary of $300.00 per month but without the bonus feature referred to in the letter of March 1st. I feel that there has not been accomplished with the architects and others assigned to you, sufficient to warrant this, either in justice to the company or the other salesmen.

"I am sure that we will all be very busy for the next several months and I believe that you can best serve the company's interests, and in that way your own, by a somewhat different line of work, which will be indicated when I have opportunity to speak to you again.

"J. M. Williams.
"JMW—RF R. F."

It is admitted that under the employment contract plaintiff received a salary of $300 per month regularly until it was fully paid. Plaintiff, however, was not paid any bonus provided for in the contract of employment. Defendant contends that the provision for bonus was canceled by the above-quoted notice and letter of August 19th. The court found that the said contract was not canceled and that finding presents the most important question to be determined on this appeal.

In the cross-complaint the defendant claimed a balance due of $690.21 modified by a supplemental amendment to the sum of $617.66. This so-called cross-complaint, together with the amendment, was duly answered by the plaintiff, who contends that under the commission agreement he was entitled to certain commissions on transactions which had not been allowed by the defendant. There seems to be no serious uncertainty or ambiguity about the written contract. Although it is claimed the second paragraph as to the term of probation is uncertain, it appears to us to be sufficiently definite to indicate the meaning to be that if the plaintiff performed his duties satisfactorily for the first three months the defendant company would pay him a bonus as a part of the consideration for his employment. That bonus was to be ascertained when the amount of the company's business exceeded $225,000 for the fiscal year ending the ensuing 31st day of January. The bonus for the year 1924 under the contract was to cover actually the ten and one-half months from March 15th to the following January 31st, the one and one-half months being the time plaintiff was not employed during that year. The evidence and the pleadings admit that the company during the year did a business of $250,000.

It seems to have been understood by all parties, and no argument to the contrary has been presented, that the word "billing" used in the contract refers to sales of the year billed out and is equivalent to the expression "business for the year."

[1] The letter of August 19th, as will appear upon careful consideration of the language thereof, is uncertain and ambiguous. Appellant contends it manifestly indicates the intention on its part within a reasonable time to abrogate or to cancel at least so much of the employment agreement as relates to the bonus feature; while respondent contends it did not purport to be the thirty days' notice of cancellation, and being expressed with verbs in the future perfect tense that it was merely in effect a threat, at some later time, to cancel the existing contract, which it recognizes as in existence and substitute therefor a new and different line of work under another contract of employment.

It is undoubted that some dissatisfaction is intimated with the employee plaintiff and a different line of work is foreshadowed by the last line or two. Such dissatisfaction was not indicated at the expiration of the first three months of service named as a probationary period in the contract. Appellant waited fully five months, an unreasonable time, to extend the period not authorized in the contract.

[2] It is stated, as will be observed, that a "different line of 'work' will be indicated when I have opportunity to speak to you again." The evidence without serious conflict, if any, shows that the president of the defendant corporation did not at any time make any other arrangement with the plaintiff as to terms of employment, substitution of any different contract, or cancellation. Plaintiff continued performing his duties as he had done for the defendant from the beginning. If it be read into the purported notice that it was to take effect thirty days thereafter it will appear that the defendant had worked six months of the remaining ten and one-half months of the fiscal year. It appears that the amount of business was $25,000 more than the standard established by the contract as the minimum billing, to wit, $225,000, the conditional sum and basis of a bonus allowance. The plaintiff testified that after the date of the letter, the president of company, Mr. Williams, expressed himself as fully satisfied with the plaintiff. The learned judge of the trial court may well have considered that if the alleged notice be regarded as a cancellation notice or one that should be given effect as altering the original contract that under all the circumstances, the notice as such was waived by the defendant. It also was apparent, if given any effect at all, that it was an attempt to declare a forfeiture of the pro tanto earnings of bonus during his work of six months. In Redd v. Garford Motor Truck Co., Inc., 205 Cal. 245, 270 P. 447, 449, it is said: "That the law does not favor forfeitures is well settled by the decisions of this court in numerous cases, and, as was well said in the case of Knarston v. Manhattan L. I. Co., 124 Cal. 74, 77, 56 P. 773, 774: 'Evidence tending to show the waiver of a forfeiture will be looked upon with kindly eyes.'"

The cited case of Knarston v. Manhattan L. I. Co., 124 Cal. 74, 56 P. 773, 774, also holds: "A waiver may be implied by the acts and conduct of the parties." Authorities on this point might be multiplied, but it is unnecessary so to do.

[3] There was sufficient consideration for the written contract relating to the option. Russell v. Johns-Manville Co., 53 Cal. App. 572, 200 P. 668. This is a case which at first glance would appear to hold to the contrary, but in reality is authority supporting option contracts in cases where the extra compensation was a part of the wages promised even though it was only conditionally promised. Other cases supporting bonus contracts will be found in 39 C. J. 159, notes 91, 92, 96.

[4] We are satisfied the employment contract even as to the bonus clause was not canceled and that the plaintiff therefore was entitled to his bonus amounting to $1,093.75. Under the commission arrangement the court found in favor of plaintiff on three separate items, namely, Culver City job No. 1 for $5,376; Culver City job No. 2 for $208.28; and the Jones-Urban Military Academy job for $72.55. The court further found the commissions earned in toto under that commission contract term to be as claimed in the cross-complaint except for the above-named three items and found that the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant, because he had been overpaid as shown by defendant's bill of particulars, in the sum of $617.66. This sum deducted from the four items found to be due to plaintiff which amounted to a total of $1,428.34, left as the balance due plaintiff the net sum of $810.68. There was much testimony adduced upon the trial with reference to all of the business done by the plaintiff under the commission contract during his last year's service. That evidence was conflicting. The court actually made an accounting reconciling the conflicting testimony as best it could. We need not cite authorities upon the point that in such case the judgment in this court must support the finding of the trial court.

The plaintiff is not appealing from any of the adverse rulings under the cross-complaint. We need not, therefore, discuss the evidence further.

The judgment is affirmed.

FERRY v. NORTH PACIFIC STAGES et al.

Civ. 4041.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 6, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⚷417(2).

Appellant's notice of appeal held not fatally defective, under circumstances, although it referred to wrong appellee.

> The notice, stating that appeal was taken from the order of the court dated May 31, 1929, setting aside judgment entered in favor of appellant and against named appellee, was not fatally defective, since there could be no reasonable doubt regarding identity of specific order appealed from, as appellant referred to order of court dated May 31, 1929, and no other order had been entered in the case setting aside a judgment, and furthermore no judgment had been rendered against the appellee named in the notice of appeal.

2. Corporations ⚷507(4).

Where defendant was alleged to be a corporation, and affidavit recited process was served on defendant as association by delivery to member of association, service was not valid if defendant was corporation (Code Civ. Proc. § 411).

3. Associations ⚷20(3).
Partnership ⚷200.

Where complaint alleged individual defendants were associated together and doing business under firm name of certain company, and service of summons was on an individual defendant described as member of association, company as separate entity held not party defendant either as association or partnership (Code Civ. Proc. § 388).

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by W. J. Ferry against the North Pacific Stages, Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company, and others. From an order granting a new trial to the Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company after default judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Louis Oneal and A. G. Shoup, both of San Jose, and George R. Freeman, of Willows, for appellant.

Downey & Chester, of Sacramento, for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial after judgment by default had been rendered against the respondent. A motion to dismiss the appeal was also made on the ground of a defective notice.

The plaintiff brought this action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained while riding as a passenger in an auto stage owned and operated by the defendants. The suit was brought against North Pacific Stages, a corporation; Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company, a corporation; D. M. Shattuck, John Doe Christie et al., associated together and doing business under the firm name and style of Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company. Summons was duly issued therein. An affidavit of service of summons was filed reciting that process in said cause was personally served upon "Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Co., an association, * * * by delivering to and leaving with * * * Fred Gordon, a member of said association," a copy of the summons and complaint. Fred Gordon appeared personally and answered the complaint. The defendant Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company did not appear or answer as a corporation, as an association, or at all. October 14, 1927, upon demand of the plaintiff, the clerk entered default against the Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company, an association. Subsequently, on motion of the plaintiff, and by consent of the court, the complaint was amended by striking therefrom the term "corporation" as it was used to describe and identify the defendant Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company, and by substituting therefor the term "an association." A jury was impaneled. Evidence was adduced at the trial, of damages resulting to the plaintiff on account of a collision of the autobus with a certain bridge. A verdict of $10,000 was returned against the Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company, an association. For this sum a judgment was rendered against the last-mentioned company as an association. Subsequently, on motion of the said Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company, the judgment against it was set aside May 31, 1929, on the ground that the court had acquired no jurisdiction to render judgment against this company. From this order vacating the judgment, the following notice of appeal was duly served:

"Notice of Appeal.

"To the Clerk of the above entitled Court:

"Please take notice that the plaintiff herein appeals to the Supreme Court of the State of California from the order of this court dated May 31, 1929, setting aside the judgment heretofore entered in said action in favor of plaintiff and against defendant, North Pacific Stages."

[1] The respondent asserts this notice of appeal is defective and ineffectual because of the error of referring to the defendant "North Pacific Stages," instead of Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company. We are of the opinion the notice of appeal is not fatally defective. In spite of the erroneous reference to the defendant "North Pacific Stages," there can be no reasonable doubt regarding the identity of the specific order from which the plaintiff appealed. He refers to it as "the order of this court dated May 31, 1929, setting aside the judgment heretofore entered." This was the only order setting aside a judgment which was made by the court in this case. No judgment was rendered against the North Pacific Stages Company. Indeed, this default judgment against the respondent Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company was the only judgment which was rendered in this case against any party to the action. The respondent could not have been deceived regarding the identity of the order from which this appeal was taken.

In Harrelson v. Miller & Lux, Inc., 182 Cal. 408, 414, 188 P. 800, 802, it is said: "Notices of appeal are not strictly construed, and an appeal will not be dismissed because of a misdescription of the judgment or order to which it relates unless it appears that the respondent has been misled by such misdescription."

[2] This brings us to a consideration of the merits of the appeal. It will be observed that, in addition to a reference in the title of the action to the defendant Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company, as a corporation, the complaint specifically alleges that company was a corporation duly organized under and by virtue of law. It is argued by the appellant this descriptive term "corporation," as it is used in the pleading, is surplusage and may be disregarded. We think not. The pleader is very explicit in describing the exact nature of the organization which he seeks to hold liable for the damages sustained as that of a corporation and not an association. The identity of this defendant as that of a corporation is thereby fixed and certain. Process was never served upon this defendant, as a corporation, in the manner required by section 411 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Process was never served upon any purported officer of this company upon whom the statute authorizes service of summons to be made to bind a corporation. If this company is a corporation, then there was no valid service of process upon it as such.

[3] The remaining question is, Was the Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company also made a party defendant, as an association or partnership? Did the court have jurisdiction of this company as an association? It is true paragraph III of the complaint further alleges: "D. M. Shattuck, John Doe Christie * * * were at all times * * * and still are associated together and doing business under the firm name and style of Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Co." It is also true the title to the complaint includes these last-mentioned individuals as party defendants. The foregoing language clearly indicates it was the intention of the pleader to constitute these named individuals as party defendants. They are merely identified as doing business in the name of the Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company. The company as a separate entity is not made a party defendant. To have included this last-mentioned company as a party defendant, independent of the individuals who are alleged to compose the organization, it should have been specifically named as a defendant. This was not done. Our courts have uniformly held, without exception, that similar descriptions of individuals as members of an association or partnership do not constitute the organization itself a party to the action. This is not an action pursuant to the provisions of section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure against the "common name" under which individuals are associated and doing business. Davidson v. Knox, 67 Cal. 143, 7 P. 413; Feder v. Epstein, 69 Cal. 456, 10 P. 785; Maclay Co. v. Meads, 14 Cal. App. 363, 112 P. 195, 113 P. 364. The case of Davidson v. Knox, supra, is very similar with respect to the parties designated, to the case at bar. In that case the caption of the complaint named the defendants as "Richard F. Knox, Joseph Osborne, Samuel P. Ely, W. T. Robinson, and Philip V. R. Ely, copartners, doing business under the firm name of Knox & Osborne." The allegations of the complaint, similar to those of the present case, described the individual defendants in approximately the same language. Service of summons was made on Robinson, Knox, and Osborne. Robinson defaulted. Judgment was taken against the individual defendants and "the joint property of all of said defendants, partners and associates." The question involved in that action was whether the partnership property was bound by the judgment. The court said: "The action was not instituted under section 388. * * * We are of opinion that this is an action against the individual partners doing business under the firm name of Knox & Osborne on partnership contracts, and in such case, under section 414, Code Civil Procedure, the plaintiffs can only proceed against the parties served."

In 47 C. J. 177, § 328, it is said: "Where one sues or is sued in a representative capacity, it must be averred that it is as such representative, and a mere statement of the representative character, following the name of the party, will be treated as only descriptio personæ."

Since the Seattle-Portland-San Francisco Auto Stage Company, as a separate entity, was never made a party defendant in this action, and the service of summons was merely made upon Fred Gordon, who is described as a member of "said association," the court never acquired jurisdiction over the company either as an association or as a partnership. Default was therefore erroneously entered against this company as a separate entity. The judgment was properly set aside.

The order setting aside the judgment is affirmed.

BLATTMAN v. GADD et al.

Civ. 7315.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Feb. 20, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 21, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 20, 1931.

1. Appeal and error 🔑843(2).

Right of taxpayer in reclamation district to sue for cancellation of contract of trustees became moot, where trustees later joined in seeking relief.

2. Attorney and client 🔑134(1).

Evidence as to mistake of trustees of reclamation district concerning their rights, though not of itself warranting cancellation of contract for employment of attorney, was admissible to disclose situation of parties.

3. Attorney and client 🔑143.

Contract of reclamation district for employment of attorney, if void because unconscionable, could not be made effective by ratification.

4. Attorney and client 🔑134(1).

In suit to cancel contract for employment of attorney by reclamation district to prosecute claim against state reclamation board for excess cost of improvement over estimate, consideration of evidence as to reassessment to follow held not improper (St. 1913, p. 266, § 7).

> The original estimate of the cost of the particular project in the reclamation district was $40,500, and, when the work was completed, it was found that the cost was in excess of $160,000, so that the district was obliged to obtain reimbursement for the excess over $40,500, the amount obtained by assessment. Upon the evidence as to reassessment, the court found that the surcharge or extra cost would be properly chargeable against the district, and, upon the reassessment, the district and the lands embraced therein would have to bear the additional burden. Irrespective of whether the assessment for the surplus would fall heavily upon the particular district, cost of collection of the district's claim amounting to over $68,000, which was paid the attorney, would always be diverted from reclamation purposes.

5. Levees and flood control 🔑25.

Jurisdiction vested in assessors of reclamation district to levy assessments is conclusive on all questions of fact (St. 1911, p. 831).

6. Contracts 🔑1.

Question whether there has been unconscionable exercise of superior power depends largely on situation of parties.

7. Attorney and client 🔑133.

Relationship of attorney and client may exist without general retainer or express contract.

8. Attorney and client 🔑63.

Attorney must exercise utmost good faith towards clients and must make full and complete disclosure.

9. Attorney and client 🔑147.

Reasonableness of attorney's fee may be inquired into, though contract for payment is contingent.

10. Attorney and client 🔑143.

Status of parties, nature of controversy, and work involved may be considered in determining reasonableness of contract for attorney's fee.

11. Levees and flood control 🔑9.

Power of reclamation district to contract is always limited by reasonableness of contract and soundness of discretion exercised.

12. Attorney and client ⚷147.

Contract of trustees of reclamation district for employment of attorney on contingent fee basis to present claim against state reclamation board for excess expenditures by district held void and incapable of ratification under evidence, as unconscionable and contrary to public policy.

> The contract provided for the employment of an attorney who specialized in the branch of law particularly affecting reclamation and reclamation boards and districts, and called for payment to him of 20 per cent. of amount allowed up to $40,000, and 50 per cent. of any excess sums on claim for $160,000, on account of district's expenditures in excess of anticipated needs and original assessment. The evidence disclosed that the attorney engaged to assist him a former member of state reclamation board immediately on such member's resignation, and that such person was pointed out to the trustees as having a pull, and that he received approximately $50,000 out of the total amount allowed of $160,000. It further appeared that the attorney had advised the trustees that the claim would not be allowed for any greater sum than the amount apportioned, namely $40,500.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Suit by Joe Blattman, for himself and others similarly situated, against Peter R. Gadd, Charles F. Metteer, and others. From an adverse judgment, defendants named appeal. Affirmed.

Butler, Van Dyke, Desmond & Harris, and C. F. Metteer, all of Sacramento, for appellants.

Downey & Chester, and Theodore W. Chester, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

The plaintiff, a landowner and taxpayer within reclamation district No. 1001, brought this action on behalf of himself and others similarly situated. The purpose of the action was to have declared null and void and to rescind a certain contract of employment entered into between the trustees of reclamation district No. 1001, on behalf of said district, and appellant Charles F. Metteer. Further, plaintiff sought, as part of the relief necessarily incident to the cancellation of the contract, the return to the reclamation district of certain outstanding warrants delivered to Metteer, a number of which warrants had been assigned to appellant Gadd.

All of the defendants appeared and answered, and, upon issues joined, trial was had. The reclamation district strenuously contested the claims of plaintiff throughout the trial. However, before decision in the lower court, there seems to have been a readjustment in the affairs of the district, resulting in the election of a new board of directors, or at least the election of sufficient new members to change the policy of the said board. Thereupon the reclamation district, and the directors as well, caused to be filed amended answers, wherein was adopted the theory of the plaintiff, and the district and the directors asked that judgment be entered in conformity with the prayer of the plaintiff. The judgment that followed was in favor of plaintiff, and the defendants Gadd and Metteer prosecute this appeal. Each of the named appellants appears separately and with separate counsel. There is one strange feature of the appeal, and it is that each appellant, in greater or lesser part, urges the arguments advanced by counsel for the remaining defendants at a time when the position of the said defendants had not become unfavorable to the cause of the present appellants. This is mentioned merely in passing. It is perhaps axiomatic that sound law remains sound, irrespective of its source. Many reasons are advanced to overthrow the judgment, and the case has been exhaustively briefed. In intelligent discussion of the points raised, it becomes necessary to review the facts surrounding the entire case.

Reclamation district No. 1001 is one of the agencies created and existing pursuant to the general plan of reclamation and flood control, as outlined in a series of legislative enactments reviewed and cited in the case entitled In re Sutter-Butte By-Pass Assessment No. 6 of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Drainage District, reported in 191 Cal. at pages 650 et seq., 218 P. 27. The case cited is an instructive treatise on the creation, aims, and objects of reclamation districts, as existing under our law, and a reference thereto will serve in lieu of any general or special review here. Reclamation district No. 1001 was created and exists under an act of the Legislature found in Statutes of 1911 at page 831. This district and the lands embraced therein form a portion of the entire territory coming within that assessment district formed by the state reclamation board and designated "Project No. 6," which said project had for its main purpose the building of the Sutter-Butte by-pass. This assessment district embraced within its area some five hundred thousand acres. The details of project No. 6, as well as its general purpose, will be found in the cited case. The west line of district No. 1001 forms a portion of the east line of project No. 6, and, as an integral part of the reclamation and flood control contemplated in the general plan of the said project, it was proposed and found necessary to reconstruct and raise the levees forming the said boundary line. The entire cost of project No. 6 was estimated at some $8,000,000, and the total assessment against the lands embraced within district No. 1001 amounted to $131,154.58. It was estimated in project No. 6 that the cost of reconstructing the levee on the boundary referred to would be $40,500, and in the validation proceedings, subsequently approved by the courts, as noted, said amount was assessed against the lands of district No. 1001 for the contruction of the levee.

There had been negotiations between the state reclamation board and district 1001 over an extended period prior to the adoption of project No. 6 in which negotiations the sole object of concern was the enlargement and alteration of the particular levee of the district. It will suffice the present needs, however, to begin our discussion and consideration at the point when and after project No. 6 had been finally adopted and the assessment thereunder validated. The trustees of the district, as well as the members of the state reclamation board, had determined that the district was better equipped to undertake the work contemplated by the project within the district. Accordingly, it was agreed between the board and the district that the latter should proceed and complete the alteration and rebuilding of this levee under the plans of project No. 6. It is understood that throughout this opinion all reference to the levee is restricted to the work done within the boundaries of district No. 1001. After the work had been commenced it was found that conditions existing required improvements far beyond those contemplated or upon which estimates had been based. Without detail, when the work had been completed, it was found that the cost was in excess of $160,000 as against the original estimate of $40,500. Incidentally, it might be noted that the actual cost of the entire project was far in excess of the original estimates. When the work was completed and the additional cost determined, the question then uppermost was that of reimbursement to the district. Detailed statements were prepared and all expenditures were analyzed and confirmed; this from both an accounting and an engineering standpoint. A complete analysis of the work having been completed, with vouchers and engineering data obtained in support thereof, the district presented to the state board its claim in the amount and sum of $142,634.99.

From this point we begin to turn into the field of disputed fact. It is not our purpose nor is what follows intended to reflect that state of fact upon which all sides concur. Necessarily, however, we confine ourselves to the record and as is usual and compulsory we accept the facts as found or assume that finding, in case of conflict of fact which supports the judgment. It may be further noted that, except in more or less minor details, no real conflict appears. It is at this period, or thereabouts, that defendant and appellant Metteer enters into the transaction. Metteer was and is an attorney at law. While engaged in general practice he has, to a large extent, specialized in that branch of the law peculiarly affecting reclamation and reclamation boards and districts. In this practice he has acquired an extended and intimate acquaintance, not only with the procedure involved but also with the administrative officers engaged in this work. While he has never been under regular or permanent retainer or employment by district 1001, yet the fact is that from time to time, as occasion required, he did attend to such matters as might necessitate the employment of counsel. When it was found that the reclamation board, after presentation of the claim, seemed to be taking no action toward the consideration thereof, the trustees of the district again turned to Metteer for aid and advice. After consultation it was arranged and agreed that Metteer should be retained, and he was retained as counsel for the district to attend to the presentation and collection of the claim then pending before the state board. At the time of this employment it seems conceded that all of the required data, both engineering and accounting, had been gathered and compiled, and that very little, if any, further work was necessary in this connection. Upon review of this data it was decided to amend the claim which had been presented; the amendment being principally in amount. The amended claim was for the sum of $157,356.27, with an additional amount of some $20,000, claimed due as interest upon the moneys advanced. This claim was filed October 11, 1923, and on October 20th of the same year there was filed by the district a supplemental claim for some $7,600, including an item of $1,264.21 alleged to be due as interest. Thus it will be noted that the claim as finally made was for something in excess of $185,000. From the time of the first presentation of the original claim to October of 1923 little, if anything, was done as to urging the claim before the board; the district and its directors and counsel apparently being content with the priority resulting from the date of filing. As will hereinafter appear, however, there seems to have been much personal discussion with individual members of the state board, and, though these discussions were more or less frequent, yet formal action on the claim was deferred and time went on with no indication or promise of early action.

At this juncture we bring defendant and appellant Gadd into the discussion. Gadd, from February up to and including August 22, 1923, was one of the members of the state reclamation board and was at all of these times an active member, being for some portion of the period stated the secretary. From the record before us and the testimony of Gadd it is readily apparent that he was a controlling factor in the board's policies and actions. Prior to his appointment on the board, Gadd had been a civil engineer of extended practice, specializing, to a great degree, in flood control, drainage, and construction. In August, 1923, shortly after Gadd's retirement from the board, there transpired the events going to constitute the controversy here. In the further detail leading up to the present action no effort will be made to attain strict chronological accuracy inasmuch as this detail is useless.

During the pendency of the claim before the board, Metteer was a frequent visitor at the board offices. It seems that Metteer had his office in the same building and was in and out on business with the board or its executives as frequently as twice a week throughout the period. Many informal discussions were had regarding engineering details and other matters. During this period Gadd became quite intimate with the matter of the pending claim, though not acquainted with the detail. Immediately upon Gadd's resignation (and some evidence indicates or at least supports the inference that prior thereto) he took up with Metteer the question of his (Gadd's) employment in presenting the claim for action. At this juncture, in connection with the question of Gadd's employment, there arose, quite in order, the question of compensation, both as to Metteer and Gadd. It developed, after some consultations and discussions between Metteer and the trustees of the district, that the latter did not desire to enter into any contract with Gadd, but thought it more advisable to contract directly with Metteer, leaving the compensation of Gadd to be a matter of contract between himself and Metteer. Accordingly there was drawn up the contract which brought the controversy now before us. The trustees agreed with Metteer that he should present the claim and as compensation for his services should be compensated, contingent upon his success, from the amount recovered. On all sums up to and including $40,000 Metteer was to receive 20 per centum of the amount allowed, and upon all sums over and above that amount he was to receive 50 per centum. Thereupon Metteer contracted with Gadd to pay to the latter 75 per centum of all amounts received by Metteer, out of the amount Metteer received from funds over $40,000, and 50 per centum of the amount received from the funds under that sum. Thereafter a hearing was arranged before the state board for October 23, 1923, which was just twenty-three days after the date of the agreement between the district and Metteer, and the agreement between Metteer and Gadd. On October 24, 1923, the claim was allowed for $160,802.39 and warrants issued for the payment thereof. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the species of warrant. Suffice it to say the warrants were in regular form, drawn upon the state treasurer and payable out of the Sutter-Butte by-pass fund. On October 25, 1923, the district indorsed and turned over to Metteer warrants of the face value of $68,401.19, and Metteer turned over to Gadd a portion of these to the extent of $50,000.

As stated hereinbefore, this action was instituted by the plaintiff as a taxpayer within district 1001 to set aside the transaction, declare the agreement null and void, and have returned to the district the warrants thus delivered to Metteer, and by the latter to Gadd. The trial court rendered judgment as prayed and fixed the value of the Metteer service at $1,500. The foregoing facts will be supplemented as we take up the various contentions presented.

[1] The main theory of the respondent is to the effect that the contract referred to is unreasonable, unconscionable, and in substance amounts to a waste of the funds of the district, and that by reason of this taint it is a contract that the trustees of the district had no power to enter into. Further, that the law governing districts of this character especially enjoins such use of the warrants received. The chief argument of both appellants is an attack upon this theory of respondent, it being evident from the findings and the judgment of the trial court that this issue was the prevailing one at the trial. Before approaching a discussion of this most important feature of the case, there are certain other contentions that may be here taken up and disposition thereof made. It is contended by both appellants that the plaintiff, as a taxpayer within the district, is not competent to maintain the action upon the facts related. This contention is advanced under many theories, including the nature of the contract and the discretion vested in trustees of such a district. However, it appears from the record before us that, prior to judgment, the pleadings were so amended that the defendant district and the defendant trustees thereof, or at least a majority of them, joined with the plaintiff in the relief asked, so that in effect, as the controversy eventuated, the issues joined were between the district and the appellants. True, it is urged, that the cause still remained the same. The plaintiff taxpayer remained the actor throughout, but the condition existing, which gave to the taxpayer his right to maintain the suit at all, was the fact that the trustees of the district refused to act and his status was practically that of a minority stockholder, whose suit was to recover, not for himself, but for the corporation or district whose rights were being lost through neglect of the trustees. Therefore, when the district acquiesced in the claim of the plaintiff, that the district had been defrauded or its funds dissipated and assumed the duty, properly chargeable to them as trustees, the plaintiff had accomplished the purpose of his suit, namely to have inquiry made and the claim of restoration urged. It would follow then that the question of plaintiff's right to maintain the action has become purely academic and under the changed pleadings has become moot. No further consideration need be given this point.

[2, 3] Other points raised involve the question of mistake, as a ground for rescission, and a ratification after mistake disclosed. These points, too, become more or less beside the main question and not deserving of minute discussion. We might concede that the mistake claimed, as will hereinafter appear, would not of itself be sufficient to declare ineffectual the contract, but evidence concerning the same would be relevant and material, as an aid in disclosing the situation of the parties at the time of contracting. Also the question of ratification requires little notice for the reason that, if the contract is of the character claimed by plaintiff and found by the court, it could not be ratified; if it were free of the taint charged, its validity would not be questioned and ratification would be surplusage. This brings us then to what we deem the essential point in the case, namely, the question of unconscionableness, coupled with the power of the trustees to enter into the contract, if found to be unconscionable and oppressive.

[4, 5] At the trial the court admitted evidence concerning the original assessment of benefits, and likewise the court permitted testimony on the benefits and assessments to follow and as to where the burden would fall for payment of the excess amount over the original estimate of $40,500. Upon the evidence thus received, the court found that the surcharge or extra cost would be properly chargeable against the district, and, upon a reassessment, the district and the lands embraced therein would have to bear the additional burden. It was the trial court's conclusion that upon reassessment the district would have to pay the additional charge of collection, as well as the difference between $40,500 and the claim allowed of some $160,000. Appellants urge this to be error and error of such a serious nature as to vitiate the judgment, in that both the admission of the evidence objected to and the finding of the court thereon operate to the prejudice of appellants and constitute a grave misconception of the law applicable. It is the claim of the appellant that the original assessment and the proceedings validating the same fixed, once and for all, the proportionate liability of each district within project No. 6, and that all future liability or future assessments or reassessments in completion of the project must automatically follow in the same proportion. In other words, and by way of illustration, if the entire cost of project No. 6 was $8,000,000 and the benefits accruing to district 1001 were determined and fixed in the original assessment at $1,000,000, it would be obvious that the proportionate share of the project to be borne by the district would be one-eighth. Applying this theory, appellants contend that the construction or reconstruction of the levee in district 1001 was a part of the general project, and that, while a definite sum was allocated to and assessed against the lands of the district, the sum so named was an allocation proportionate to the entire project, and that, when the cost went above the estimate, the surplus was to be, and by law was required to be, borne by the entire project.

Appellants have diagramed the mathematical conclusions to be drawn from this theory, from which it appears that the liability of the district would be in a small amount, and that, while the amounts paid Metteer might appear gross, yet in reality the cost to the district or the lands therein would be assessed only to a perhaps negligible extent. Urging the importance of this contention, appellants argue that the trial court was guided wholly by the size of the sum paid Metteer in so far as it affected the district, and that, if the trial court had correctly approached the subject and found, as the law compelled the finding, the slight cost to the district, then the trial court would have had no basis from which it could conclude the contract to be unfair or unconscionable. We do not feel that the question is as important as appellants would have it appear. Without reviewing the authorities cited by appellants, it is manifest that the same question has never been before the courts of this jurisdiction. While we do not feel called upon to decide just how any future assessments or reassessments must be allocated or levied we might point out wherein the contentions of appellant would be an independent question for subsequent determination, first by the levying power of the state.

In the validation proceeding hereinbefore referred to and found reported in 191 Cal. 650 et seq., 218 P. 27, the Supreme Court holds that the matter of assessments of the nature here under consideration is essentially a question of fact, and proceedings to that end are purely statutory and almost summary. Without expressly deciding the point, it being unnecessary to this controversy, it could well be that proceedings upon reassessment would permit the charge of the surplus under project No. 6 to the particular units wherein the excess accrued, upon a showing of excess cost in materials or work exclusively for the benefit of such units.

There is in the record before us much evidence to support the claim of respondent, that the levee constructed on the boundary of the district was essentially a part of the reclamation work of the district, as well as being a portion of the general scheme involved in project No. 6. The question of this levee and its reconstruction had been before the state board before the determination to undertake the general project, and was then approached as a distinct district improvement. Much of the work of preparing and enlarging the levee, so as to fit it for the general improvement, embraced repair of the then existing conditions. And the state board, in fixing the benefits accruing, determined not that the amount assessed was the fair proportion, compared with benefits, that should be borne by the district, but that the construction of this particular portion of levee was for the benefit of the district and the cost thereof should be borne by it alone. The benefit determined was not such benefit as would accrue from an expenditure of any sum of money, proportionate or otherwise, but the benefit that would accrue from the reconstruction of the levee, the cost of which was fixed merely by way of estimate. It would seem in keeping with the theory of assessment proportionate to benefit that the benefits should be determined by the improvement made, and the cost at all times determined by the cost of the improvement, otherwise there would be no reason, nor would there be necessity of specifying the portion of the work determined as of benefit. A mere allocation of amount would suffice. We have endeavored simply to point out that the question of reassessment remains an open one with the jurisdiction to levy vested in the assessors, subject to review by the special court provided by the statute. And under the ruling referred to (191 Cal. 650, 218 P. 27), the jurisdiction so conferred is conclusive on all questions of fact.

As a conclusion drawn from the foregoing discussion regarding the reassessment, it was proper for the trial court to consider that there might be, and that there was, even an uncertainty with respect to the reassessment, and that in determining the effect of the contract here involved this feature might well be considered. We do not feel that it is necessary here to determine all of the questions that might arise upon the reassessment, nor to in any wise embarrass or preclude the action of those vested with the authority of allocating the amounts levied, but both of the appellants admit that, if it were properly determined that all of the cost of the levee is chargeable to district 1001, then the contract under discussion would appear to be unquestionably unconscionable. In other words, it seems conceded that the criterion of unconscionableness is not the gain accruing to Metteer, but the loss suffered by the district. Under some set of circumstances this might be true, but here we have present other conditions. It appears that at the outset the district has expended a sum in excess of $160,000, and the claim presented was for reimbursement. Nothing appearing to the contrary, it must be assumed that this original expenditure was from funds of the district or funds for which the district incurred liability. The allowance by the state board was a repayment. Therefore it is apparent that, if the district gets the larger portion of the repayment from the entire area included within project No. 6, and this contract is upheld, there will be restored to the district's fund a sum lessened by some $68,000 paid for collection. Illustrating, if the district had $168,000 in its treasury and expended the same in the construction of the levee, it would make no difference from what source might come the repayment; when the entire sum was repaid there would still have to be deducted the allowance for collection, leaving the net that much short of the sum originally had. But disregarding this entirely and assuming for the present that the assessment for the surplus would fall but lightly upon the district, we are still confronted with the fact that the costs of collection—over $68,000—have been paid to the appellants, and that, whatever methods of assessment or repayment may follow, there will always be diverted from reclamation purposes this amount.

In the case of People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 379, 103 P. 207, 211, the court says: "* * * It was clearly desirable and beneficial to the state that all of these lands should be reclaimed for purposes of husbandry. This improvement would add great wealth to the state, and * * * would result in a public benefit."

In the General Laws providing for reclamation and the agencies in charge thereof, we find this declaration of legislative purpose and intent: "The State of California and the people thereof are hereby declared to have a primary and supreme interest in having erected, maintained and protected on the banks of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers and their tributaries and the by-passes and overflow channels * * * good and sufficient levees and embankments or other works of reclamation, adequately protecting the lands overflowed by said streams, and confining the waters of said rivers, tributaries, by-passes and overflow channels within their respective channels." Stats. 1913, chap. 170, pp. 252, 266, § 7. With the foregoing in mind it would appear to make little difference from what particular fund money was improperly drawn, or upon whom the burden would expressly fall, as long as it was admitted that the charge was imposed upon the reclamation as a whole. When appellants urge the justice of their claim upon the theory that the sums claimed are to be paid by a comparatively large number, admitting, as they do, that, if the burden fell upon a lesser number, the contract could be properly classed as unconscionable, the general policy of the law, as announced, offers them little consolation. Aside then from the particular interest of the district, public policy would enter into the question and require as exact a construction in the premises as would be demanded if the district alone were involved.

[6] This brings us directly to the contract itself. From the facts before it, as hereinbefore detailed and as will hereinafter develop, the trial court concluded that the contract and agreement between reclamation district 1001 and C. F. Metteer, dated October 1, 1923, was and is unreasonable, unconscionable, and void. It is conceded that, if the facts warrant this conclusion, the judgment here appealed from must be affirmed. The term "unconscionable" has often received judicial interpretation, but in each case the definition given reflects the facts of the case then before the court. Where great hardship and oppression have been present, fitting language expressing indignation of the court has been employed, but the exact meaning of the term cannot be embraced within a formulated definition. The determination regarding the conscience, as it were, of a contract does not hinge upon the fitting of the facts to any phraseology. As was said in Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 403, 23 P. 16, 21, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137: "The question whether there has been an undue advantage, an unconscionable exercise of a superior power, depends largely upon the situation of the parties at the time of the negotiations." Instead, then, of announcing the rule to be that a court will not enforce a contract because it appears unconscionable, it would better be stated that, because a court will not enforce an unjust contract or grant relief, the contract is thereby classed as unconscionable. And intermixed among the elements going to constitute a contract unconscionable are the elements of fairness, reasonableness, oppression, and injustice, each and all dependent upon the facts of each particular case.

[7, 8] Completing now the facts sketched at the outset, we may more closely scrutinize the conditions existing at the time of the execution of the contract. The district had a valid claim against the state board. All of the accounting and engineering data had been prepared and the claim presented. Metteer had been the attorney for the district, and without exhaustively covering the entire field of law with reference to the relationship of attorney and client, there is ample evidence to sustain the conclusion that such a relationship did then exist between Metteer and the trustees and the district. It is not necessary to effect that relationship that there should be a general retainer or express contract to that specific end. The questions involved came within a branch of the law characterized by appellant as being highly specialized. Both at the trial and in his brief, appellant Metteer stresses this point even to the extent of complaining, though respectfully, that the honorable trial judge, by reason of lack of experience in this particular field, would be greatly handicapped in arriving at any just solution of the problems presented. Much less, therefore, could we expect familiarity with the legal questions involved on the part of the trustees of the district. When the question of the contract of Metteer was before the trustees for consideration, they were advised many times that the claim would not be allowed for any greater sum than the amount apportioned under project No. 6, namely, $40,500. Being in this state of mind, and being so advised by Metteer, then any question of compensation in so far as it affected any proportion of the amount realized over and above $40,000 meant nothing to the trustees. It is readily deducible that at the very outset the parties were not on an equal footing and that the situation was such that an unfair advantage rested with the attorney, he having a superior knowledge of the true merits of the claim. It was the duty of the attorney in dealing with his clients to exercise the utmost good faith, and before contracting to equalize the advantage by a full and complete disclosure. Citation of authority in support of this proposition is hardly necessary, though the latest expression of the Supreme Court on the subject may be found in the case of Anderson v. Eaton, 293 P. 788, wherein is reaffirmed the basic principle that it is an attorney's duty to protect his client in every possible way, and it is a violation of that duty for an attorney to assume a position adverse or antagonistic to his client without the latter's free and intelligent consent, given after full knowledge of all of the facts and circumstances. Obviously a situation wherein skilled counsel knows, or ought to know, the nature of his client's claim, and leaves the client uninformed or misinformed as to the legal sufficiency thereof, to the end that the former secures benefits greatly out of proportion to the service rendered, does not measure up to this standard. The appellants contend that the law governing attorney and client has always recognized the principle that an attorney is justly entitled to fair and reasonable compensation; that within this principle rests another, namely, that the measure of compensation varies with circumstances. From these premises grows the practice of compensation only upon contingency, referred to generally as contingent fees.

[9, 10] Much has been said by the courts of various jurisdictions on the matter of contingent fees, and the practice of contracting on that basis has been recognized and approved. Yet we cannot conclude, from the authorities reviewed, that the mere circumstance that the fee agreed upon may be contingent upon the outcome precludes any inquiry as to the reasonableness of the amount thereof. The question of the reasonableness of the fee always remains open, though the fact of contingency often determines the controversy. However, other elements may be considered, and among these may be mentioned the status of the parties, the nature of the controversy, and the work involved. It will be borne in mind that the contracting district, in the instant case, is a governmental agency, authorized and empowered to contract for legal services and to pay for the same regardless of outcome. Therefore, the matter of fees is not confined to the outcome, as is usually the case where contingent fees are considered. Further, from the record, there was no actual controversy then existing. The claim of the district had been filed with the state board, and there is not the slightest evidence from which it might be fairly, or otherwise, deduced that the district would be called upon to make other than due and ordinary proof of the items detailed. No question of jurisdiction was involved and no refusal to act had been indicated. And further than this, there remained but little, if anything, in the way of revising the claim or elaborating the detail thereof. This can readily be seen when the fact appears that, within approximately a month after the contract for fees was made, the claim was brought to a hearing and allowed. The work involved can be more readily appreciated from the record, which discloses that the attorney did practically nothing with the claim, and the engineering work found necessary by Gadd to familiarize himself with the claim embraced services of a value, according to his own estimate, of less than $500.

The case of Robinson v. Sharp, 201 Ill. 86, 66 N. E. 299, 301, presents a situation similar to the case at bar. In that case an attorney had entered into a contract with a policyholder to collect the claimed proceeds of a life insurance policy. There, as here, the contract, contingent upon the success of the collection, provided for a fee of 50 per cent. of the recovery. In declaring such a contract void and unreasonable, the court says: "The insurance company did not question liability to pay the policies, but paid them without delay upon presentation of formal proofs of death, etc., and there is nothing in the evidence which tends to prove the company ever contemplated denying liability, or that there was any reason to apprehend there would be any necessity for litigation of any kind in the matter. Nor is there any evidence in the record tending to show that the appellant believed or expected that liability to pay would be denied, or that resort to litigation would be necessary. Under such state of circumstances an agreement requiring his clients to pay one-half of the face of the policies can but be denounced as unfair, and obtained by undue exercise of the influence which the appellant enjoyed as the legal counselor and adviser of the appellees." In the cited case, it might be noted, there was some small showing of anticipated controversy, while in the instant case there is not even a suggestion thereof or a scintilla of evidence from which it might be even inferred that any action would be necessary other than the mere securing of a hearing upon the claim. If the reasoning of the Illinois court just quoted is sound with reference to the contracts of individuals, and we so deem it, then with much greater force would it apply to the case before us wherein one of the parties to the questioned contract is a public agency, itself a trustee. In almost every branch of government we find the subordinate agencies contracting with the government itself, and out of this relationship arise, almost daily, demands and cross-demands, and receipts and expenditures forming the basis of reciprocal claims. If, in the ordinary course, each agency involved were permitted to contract for a dissipation of the claim through contracts similar to the one under discussion, the evils which may readily be anticipated would be destructive of any idea of regulated governmental finance.

[11, 12] Aside from all other questions it is apparent that the power of an agency, such as a reclamation district, to contract, clothed though such a district may be with vast discretion in these matters, is always limited by the reasonableness of the contract and the soundness of the discretion exercised. The trustees of the district had no power to make a contract with Metteer under which he would receive more than the reasonable value of his services, and enough has been said hereinbefore to conclude that the contract before us did provide for payment of an amount grossly unreasonable. Therefore, it follows that the contract was beyond the power of the trustees to enter into, and therefore beyond their power to ratify. Bottoms v. Madera Irrigation District, 74 Cal. App. 681, 242 P. 100; 15 Cor. Jur. 548.

We have, to this point, considered the controversy more in the light in which it affects the parties thereto. There is another aspect of the case which in itself would be of controlling importance, namely, the question of a sound public policy. This phase of the case, strangely enough, seems to be merely hinted at in the court below and in the briefs of counsel before us, yet sufficient appears to indicate that it was constantly in mind. As hereinbefore stated, the appellant Gadd was a member of the state board, before which was pending the claim of the district. It is admitted that on many occasions prior to Gadd's resignation, and while the claim was pending, he and Metteer had sundry minor discussions regarding the claim; that Gadd was familiar with the details thereof and knew the merits of the claim and how little further work was necessary to properly shape it for action by the board. Immediately upon Gadd's resignation, or so soon thereafter that it makes no appreciable difference, we find the appellants Metteer and Gadd negotiating with the trustees on the question of Gadd's employment. It was pointed out to the trustees of the district that Gadd, by reason of his recent membership on the state board, had what was described as a pull or some roundabout influence. According to the record the word "pull" was the exact word used, and this word in its very essence and in its most common usage implies the use of an improper and undue influence. Gadd, at the outset, was desirous of a contract that would provide that he get everything recovered over and above the $40,500 provided for in the estimate under project No. 6, or at least the portion thereof embracing Metteer's fifty per cent. The negotiations between Gadd and Metteer, made known to the trustees of the district, and the urged need of Gadd's alleged pull being stressed, the trustees made the contract with Metteer, knowing of the contract either executed or about to be executed between Metteer and Gadd.

One significant feature of the case here disclosed is that it must have been apparent to all concerned that the arrangement would not bear scrutiny from the fact that, with knowledge as indicated, it was deemed expedient and tactful that there should be no express contract between Gadd and the trustees. Phrasing it bluntly, the unconscionableness of the entire transaction was manifest, and the proceeding in its inception indicated a scheme rather than a contract. Courts, as such, have no monopoly on conscience, but react in conformity to general human experience, and in this connection it is interesting and instructive to note the common interpretation placed upon the contract involved by that portion of the public most concerned, and particularly the state reclamation board, as disclosed by the record before us. When the facts surrounding the claim of the district, and the particular fact of the warrants being delivered to appellants here became generally known, the state board immediately convened and attempted to reopen the claim and make further investigation concerning the same. The attitude of the state board was one naturally to be expected. This board felt that, if a district could pay out a sum approximating $70,000 merely to bring to a hearing a claim for $160,000, then there must be something inherently wrong or fraudulent about the claim itself. Finding, upon examination, that the claim was correct in every detail, the other fair inference deducted from the transaction was that a claimed pull or influence with the board had been bartered, and from the record it cannot be disputed that this did not lack a factual basis. It might be deemed expedient or generous to gloss over the contract with a presumption of honesty and fair dealing, but in the face of the trial court's judgment annulling and canceling the contract, no amount of platitude or sophistry can overcome the presumptions arising when all of the concomitant facts are considered. When a member of a board or commission, before which a matter involving payment of money has been pending for some period of time without action, resigns his office and almost coincident therewith allies himself with the prosecution of the claim, and within a month thereafter secures favorable action on this undisputed claim, and for that service is awarded a sum of money approximating $50,000 out of a total claim of $160,000, it seems unnecessary to go to the authorities to find reasons why the transaction should be held unfair and of no effect. When the transaction is minutely detailed and each proposition of law separated, it might readily be that no one principle of law would suffice to nullify the transaction. On the other hand, it is equally true that no one principle of law could add conscience thereto. The case, as a whole, in all of its phases, must be considered, and, after such consideration, we agree with the trial court that the contract was unreasonable and unconscionable, and therefore void. Thus tainted it was beyond the power of the trustees to enter into such a contract, and no act on their part could or would have the effect of giving effect to the attempted arrangement through ratification.

Summing up the entire case it can be seen that the district received nothing more than a hearing, and that for this privilege it is to be mulcted in the sum of $68,000, if the judgment should be reversed. Surely public policy and public good, as the law uses these terms, does preclude such a result. A holding in support of a contract such as this would go far toward a destruction of all public service and would bring about suspicion and distrust of public agencies and hasten an era of anarchy and chaos.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARTHOLOMAE OIL CORPORATION v. DELANEY et al.

Civ. 7739.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

March 3, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 2, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 30, 1931.

1. Quieting title 🔑21.

Defendants in action to quiet title to leasehold interest were without right to set up adverse claim under contract for purchase of oil produced on premises.

> Leasehold interest and oil in place to which plaintiff sought to quiet title were both real property, while the asserted claim by virtue of contract to purchase some of oil after it had lost its character of realty by severance from land did not affect real estate in any particular.

2. Quieting title 🔑21.

Contract to purchase oil was not "adverse claim" affecting real estate (Code Civ. Proc. § 738).

> [Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Adverse Claim," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Judgment 🔑255.

Court, refusing to permit proof of contract to purchase oil in action to quiet title to leasehold interest, erroneously entered judgment restraining assertion of rights under contract.

> Since the asserted rights by virtue of contract to purchase oil did not constitute a claim adverse to interests under leasehold in premises, any judgment affecting such contract was wholly outside issues of case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

Action by the Bartholomae Oil Corporation against A. J. Delaney, the Delaney-Camp Oil Company, Incorporated, the Camp Oil Company, Incorporated, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants named appeal.

Modified and, as modified, affirmed.

Hibbard & Kleindienst, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Joseph E. Bien, Earl D. Killion, and Werner Olds, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued to quiet title to a leasehold interest for the exclusive right to drill, develop, and remove petroleum, natural gas, asphaltum, and other kindred substances from certain real property. The cause was tried before the court, which made findings and judgment in favor of the plaintiff from which the defendants appeal upon typewritten transcripts.

The complaint pleaded plaintiff's leasehold interest in the real property which gave to the plaintiff the exclusive right to drill, develop, and remove all petroleum and kindred substances from the land for a period of twenty years. It was also alleged that the plaintiff was in possession of the premises and of all petroleum, natural gas, asphaltum, and other kindred substances situated upon and contained in said premises; that the defendants claim some estate or interest therein, but that they had no estate or interest whatsoever "in said lease and/or to the oil, petroleum, gas, asphaltum and/or other kindred substances situated and being within said leasehold and said premises." These allegations were followed by the usual prayer for a decree quieting plaintiff's title to the lease of the premises and to the oil and kindred substances situated and being within and upon said premises. A prayer was added for an injunction restraining defendants from asserting any claim whatsoever to the leasehold interest or to the oil and kindred substances situated or being, "or produced" from said land and premises. The defendants answered denying any interest or estate in the lease but claiming an interest in the oil and gas situated upon said premises by reason of a contract between the plaintiff and defendants whereby the former agreed to sell to the defendants one-half of all the oil produced from a certain well known as Bartholomae No. 3 situated on the premises, such sale to be made at the market price of such oil at the Long Beach oil field.

Plaintiff made proof of its title to the leasehold and then dependants endeavored to prove what they claimed to be an interest in the oil by reason of the contract; objections were made to this line of proof and sustained. Thereupon the trial court made its findings and entered judgment in favor of plaintiff through which it quieted plaintiff's title to the leasehold and to all petroleum, natural gas, and kindred substances situated upon and contained in said premises. It further decreed that the defendants had no interest whatsoever in these properties, but the judgment forever enjoined and debarred them from asserting any claim to the leasehold or to the oil being or "produced from" said premises.

On this appeal the appellants raise five points, all of which concern the ruling which determine that the appellants' claim under their contract for the sale of the oil produced was not an adverse claim to the property to which the respondent sought to quiet title. These specifications may, therefore, all be considered as one.

[1] It will be noted from the portions of the complaint which we have cited that the respondent sought to quiet title to its leasehold interest and to the oil and other kindred substances situated upon the premises described. Thus all the property described in the complaint and to which issue was joined by the complaint was real property. By their answer the appellants denied any adverse claim to the leasehold, but endeavored to set up a claim to the oil by reason of their contract to purchase one-half thereof after a certain date. In denying appellants the right to offer proof in support of their claim and in finding that they had no adverse claim to the oil situated upon the premises the court did not err. The leasehold interest and the oil in place to which the respondent sought to quiet title were both real property, but the asserted claim of the appellants to purchase some of the oil after it had lost its character of realty by severance from the land did not affect the real estate in any particular. A somewhat similar case arose in Meyer v. Quiggle, 140 Cal. 495, 74 P. 40, where a plaintiff in a quiet title action was met by the offer of the defendant to prove an adverse claim by reason of a written contract under which plaintiff engaged the defendant to sink a well upon the premises and promised to pay him at the rate of $100 per inch of water developed from the well, either in land or in cash. In holding that defendant's rights under the contract did not constitute an adverse claim to the realty, but were such as must be enforced under an independent action, the Supreme Court (page 497 of 140 Cal., 74 P. 40) said: "It is clear that under the contract the defendant had no interest whatever in the land, nor any right to a conveyance which would be specifically enforced. * * * It is also clear that there is no lien on the land by virtue of the contract, taken in connection with the allegations of the answer and cross-complaint. There is nothing to show that the defendant ever filed or claimed a lien under the mechanic's lien law, and the contract itself does not purport to give the defendant a lien upon the land for the value of his services in performing the contract. The claim of the defendant, therefore, does not affect the real estate in any particular. It has no more relation thereto, in legal effect, than if it were an independent contract for the payment of money, or an independent cause of action in tort against the plaintiff."

[2] Thus, in the case at hand appellant's rights under their contract were nothing more than such rights as would ordinarily accrue in a contract for the sale and purchase of personalty. They did not constitute a lien upon or an interest in the land from which the oil was to be produced or in the oil itself while it remained unsevered from the land. At most, they obligated the respondent to deliver to the appellants one-half of such oil as the respondent should produce from the well. The contract, however, did not require the respondent to produce any fixed amount of oil from that well, nor in fact to produce any oil at all. No authorities have been cited by either party which are directly in point, but we are satisfied from first impression that notwithstanding the amendment to section 738, Code of Civil Procedure, which permits a suit to quiet title to personalty as well as to realty, there is no change from the rule announced in Meyer v. Quiggle, supra, that a contract of this nature does not constitute an adverse claim affecting the real estate, and is not a matter of defense to, or a subject of cross-complaint in, an action to quiet title to the land and to the oil in place.

However, the judgment appealed from is wholly without equity. The respondent having denied to the appellants the right to put their contract in issue, it nevertheless took judgment against the appellants forever restraining them from asserting any rights under that contract. The appellants were thus debarred from proving their contract and at the same time foreclosed from asserting any rights under it, and the injunction to this extent was decreed without any evidence of any character to support it.

[3] It must be apparent that if the asserted rights of the appellants under their contract are not a claim adverse to the interests of the respondent in the premises described, then any judgment affecting that contract is wholly outside the issues of the case tried. It must be equally apparent that the appellants might have a valid or enforceable contract for the purchase of the oil after it has been severed from the realty, and that whether such contract is valid and enforceable is a question upon which they are entitled to be heard.

For the reasons stated the judgment is modified by striking therefrom the language which purports to restrain appellants from asserting any rights under their contract to the oil, gas, and kindred substances produced from the land and premises described.

As so modified the judgment is affirmed, with costs to appellants.

WORKS, P. J.

Defendant was convicted upon a charge of violating the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code by committing a lewd and lascivious act upon the person of a little girl. He appeals from the judgment and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

The alleged victim of appellant was five years of age on April 30, it was charged in the information that appellant committed the crime upon her on May 16, and the trial of the charge commenced on August 5, all in 1930. It is provided by section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure that "children under ten years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly," cannot be witnesses. The little girl in question here was tendered as a witness, the trial judge subjected her to what we cannot but regard as a perfunctory examination in order to determine whether she rested under either of the disabilities mentioned in the statute, and at the end of the examination he concluded that she did not and permitted her to testify. It is now contended that the court erred in allowing her story to go to the jury.

[1, 2] This identical question received a most thorough consideration at our hands nearly ten years ago in People v. Delaney, 52 Cal. App. 765, 199 P. 896, 903, and during that lengthy period of time the trial judges and the profession of the state should have become acquainted with the views expressed in the opinion of the court. Despite that fact, in the present instance the judge, at the conclusion of the examination conducted by him, had not made a record from which he could possibly determine whether the child was sufficiently qualified to occupy the witness chair in a court of justice or whether she was not. It was said in People v. Delaney, however, that "it is the duty of a judge, at any time after he has determined that a child is competent as a witness, to change his mind upon due occasion, remove the child from the witness stand, and instruct the jury to disregard his testimony." This means that the entire record made by a witness under ten years of age in a particular case is to be scanned in order to determine whether he is competent to testify. If his testimony to the merits of one cause may be examined to nullify the ruling of the trial judge made at the end of an examination on voir dire, it follows necessarily that such testimony in another cause may be invoked to support the ruling on voir dire. We have accordingly read with care the entire testimony of the little girl in the present case, and while there are places in the record where the idiosyncrasies of childish expression and demeanor stand forth, we have no hesitancy in saying that this child had the mentality necessary to qualify her under both branches of the statute. In partial justification of this conclusion we quote a part of her direct examination on the merits, prefacing the quotation with the statement that the crime is alleged to have been perpetrated in a room in an apartment house:

"Q. Was this apartment house where you were, was that near your home? A. Yes.

"Q. On the same street? A. Yes.

"Q. In the same block? A. I live in a court.

"Q. You live in a court. That court is right near the apartment house? A. Yes.

"Q. Now * * * after you had been up in the room, and you told this man that you wanted to go home, did you leave the room and go home? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you cry? A. Yes.

"Q. Where were you when you started to cry? A. Downstairs.

"Q. Did you see anybody as you came out of his apartment? A. Yes.

"Q. Who? A. The landlady.

"Q. What is the landlady's name? A. I don't know.

"Q. Is she here? A. I don't know her name.

"Q. Is she here today? A. Yes.

"Q. Which lady is it? A. That one over there with the blue dress (indicating).

"Q. Which blue dress? A. The light one.

"Q. The light one. Will you stand up, please (addressing a lady in the courtroom, who arose to her feet). Is this the lady who is the landlady? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Then did you go on home? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you see anybody when you got home? A. No.

"Q. Was your mother there? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you tell your mother what had happened? A. Yes.

"Q. What? A. Yes."

Following is a part of the record made on the cross-examination:

"What kind of bloomers did you have on that day? A. I don't know.

"Q. Did they have elastic in them? A. Yes.

"Q. Where was the elastic? Around the legs or around the waist? A. Around the legs.

"Q. It had elastic around the legs. Are all your bloomers made that way? A. Yes.

"Q. All the bloomers you have, have elastic around the legs? A. Yes.

"Q. And do they all have elastic around the waist? A. No.

"Q. And did the bloomers that you wore that day have elastic around the waist? A. No.

"Q. Did they have buttons on them? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you have on the same dress that day that you have on now? A. No, this is a different dress. I didn't have this dress when I was up there.

"Q. Were the bloomers the same color of the dress that you had on? A. I don't know.

"Q. Did Mr. Walker put his hands under the elastic of the bloomers? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you take your little bloomers down? A. He did, but I didn't.

"Q. Did you unbutton them? A. Yes.

"Q. Take them off? A. No, he just took his hand and put his hand in them.

"Q. Which way did he put his hand in, from the top or from the bottom? A. Here (indicating) from the top."

We think, as it finally turns out, that the trial judge exercised a proper discretion in permitting the child to testify.

[3] Appellant asserts that the trial court erred in refusing to give a certain instruction, setting it forth. No argument is advanced nor is authority cited to show that the proposed instruction contained a statement of the law. It is only said that "the law as set forth in the refused instruction" was not covered by any instruction given, and that the jury should have been "fully instructed on this question of law." Such a presentation gives us nothing to decide.

The same objection applies to questions attempted to be presented as to other instructions which were refused. In addition, we are convinced as to these particular instructions that they either do not state the law or were not required under the evidence, or that they were covered by instructions given.

Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: CRAIG, J.; IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

Finding that assignee was not innocent purchaser of negotiable instruments, for value and without notice as to infirmities, held unsupported by evidence.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. D. McConnell, Judge.

Action by C. A. Stockton against G. O. Hughes and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

Leland S. Davidson and A. D. Mitchell, both of Ontario, for appellant.

Ernest P. Wellman, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This action is one for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon real property brought by the plaintiff who sues as the transferee of the note and mortgage from the mortgagees before maturity. The answer of the defendants admitted the due execution and delivery of the note and mortgage and the nonpayment thereof. The defendants, however, denied that said instruments had been assigned to the plaintiff or that he was the owner thereof, and further denied that he was an innocent purchaser for value. The answer then proceeded to affirmatively allege that there was no consideration for the making and execution of the note and mortgage. The trial court found that the note and mortgage were duly executed and delivered, and were purchased by, and assigned to, the plaintiff before maturity. The court, however, further found that the assignment was not made for value or in the ordinary course of business, that the consideration therefor had wholly failed, and that the plaintiff was not an innocent purchaser, but took the note and mortgage with all the equities existing between the mortgagor and mortgagees. As a conclusion of law from the foregoing findings, the trial court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover upon the note or to have the mortgage foreclosed. From the judgment entered thereon, the plaintiff has prosecuted this appeal and has filed his opening brief herein and an appendix containing the reporter's transcript.

[1] The appellant contends that the findings of the trial court to the effect that the transfer of the note and mortgage to him was not made for value nor in the ordinary course of business, and the further finding that he was not an innocent purchaser, but took the note and mortgage subject to all the equities existing between the mortgagor and mortgagees, are entirely unjustified by the evidence in the case; but that, on the contrary, the evidence conclusively shows that he was the purchaser of the note and mortgage in due course and for value, and without notice of any infirmity or defect therein or in the consideration therefor, and that from these premises it follows that he took said instruments free from any equities or infirmities that may have existed between the original parties thereto. The appellant, in support of these contentions, refers the court to the particular portions of the evidence in the case upon which he relies, and to the reporter's transcript which accompanies his brief. The respondents have presented no brief herein, although their attention has expressly been called to their failure so to do by the clerk of this court, and although an order to show cause was issued and duly served upon them requiring them to present such brief, and giving them notice that, unless they did so, the cause would be submitted for decision upon the appellant's brief on file. The cause has accordingly been submitted for decision. We have carefully examined the record, and we are satisfied therefrom that the several contentions of the appellant above noted should be sustained. The undisputed evidence shows that the note and mortgage in question were given by the respondent G. O. Hughes to the plaintiff's assignors as first payment upon a herd of cattle. They are in form negotiable. Civ. Code, § 3265. They were transferred to the plaintiff before maturity or default. The consideration for their transfer was that of the payment by the mortgagees to plaintiff, pro tanto, of an antecedent indebtedness amounting approximately to $8,000. That such preexisting debt constituted a sufficient consideration for the transfer of these negotiable instruments, the authorities uniformly hold. 19 Cal. Jur. 839; Civ. Code, § 3106; Popp v. Exchange Bank, 189 Cal. 296, 208 P. 113; Kunz v. Cal. Trona Co., 169 Cal. 348, 146 P. 883; Bridge v. Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 167 Cal. 774, 141 P. 375; Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 471, 58 P. 910, 59 P. 296, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195; Westphal v. Nevills, 92 Cal. 545, 28 P. 678. It follows necessarily, therefore, that the plaintiff, if otherwise an innocent purchaser of these negotiable instruments, was the holder thereof for value and in the ordinary course of business, and that the findings of the trial court to the contrary are without support in the evidence.

[2] The only remaining question presented is as to whether there is sufficient evidence to support the further finding to the effect that the plaintiff was not an innocent purchaser of these instruments. The only evidence which we are able to find in the reporter's transcript touching this question consists of the testimony given by the son of the mortgagor, who testified that, after the execution of these instruments, but before their maturity and transfer to the plaintiff, he had held a conversation with the mortgagee King, wherein he complained of the cattle transaction in the course of which the note and mortgage had been given, and said that his father and he wanted to have the note and mortgage back. The witness stated that he thought Mr. Stockton was present in the room with a number of other people when this conversation was held, but that he did not know whether Mr. Stockton heard the conversation. The plaintiff positively denied being present upon the occasion referred to, or hearing any such conversation, and also testified most positively that he was entirely unaware of any infirmities in said instruments at the time of their transfer to him. In this state of the record it would seem to be clear that the finding of the trial court that the plaintiff was not an innocent purchaser for value and without notice as to any infirmities to the instruments in question is unsupported by the evidence in the case.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

KLOPPUTH v. McCORD et al.

L. A. 11006.

Supreme Court of California.

March 13, 1931.

1. Evidence ⚷450(3).

Instrument reciting sale held so informal and ambiguous as to require interpretation and permit introduction of parol evidence.

The instrument which was relied on as constituting deed, and on basis of which plaintiff sought to quiet title, was signed by sellers and dated with name of town, and recited sale to another of "lot 29, 25 by 150, for the sum of $200 paid $172.93 as part payment," and at the bottom thereof contained the words, "Stearn Compton Villa Tract."

2. Appeal and error ⚷671(1).

Decree for defendants could not be reversed where instrument relied on by plaintiff as deed was ambiguous and appeal was on judgment roll alone.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by Albert Klopputh against William McCord and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Irving P. Austin, of Compton, for appellant.

Louis K. Beeks, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This action is one brought by the plaintiff to quiet title against the defendants to a lot in the city of Compton, county of Los Angeles. To the plaintiff's complaint alleging ownership the defendants William McCord and Mary McCord filed an answer, denying the allegations thereof, and also served and filed a cross-complaint alleging themselves to be the owners of the lot in question. The trial court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of the said defendants upon their cross-complaint, and judgment was accordingly entered decreeing that the plaintiff had no right, title, or interest in the premises and that the said defendants were the legal owners thereof. The plaintiff appeals to this court upon the judgment roll. The respondents have filed no brief and the cause has been submitted for decision after an order to show cause.

The appellant rests his claim of title upon an instrument in the following form:

"Feb. 6, 1923, Compton, Cal.

"Sold to Mrs. Elizabeth Pohlman Lot 29, 25 by 150, for the sum of $200.00 paid $172.93 as Part Payment.

172.93 Paid

$ 27.93 Bal.

"[Signed] William McCord
"Mary McCord.

"Stearn Compton Villa Tract."

[1] This instrument was acknowledged by Mary McCord only and was thereafter assigned to the plaintiff. It is contended by the appellant that this instrument constitutes a deed to the premises. It is evident, however, from a reading thereof that it is so informal and ambiguous as to require interpretation by the trial court, and in some respects at least to permit also the introduction of oral evidence to explain the scope and purpose of the instrument.

[2] The appeal being upon the judgment roll, we have nothing before us to indicate whether or not the trial court took such evidence and based its conclusion thereon that the instrument in question did not constitute a deed so as to invest the plaintiff's predecessor with title to the property. The defendants and cross-complainants, as the trial court found, were only the holders of an equitable interest in said premises at the time of the execution of the above instrument, but later became the owners of the legal title thereto by virtue of a grant deed from the holder of such legal title. The trial court accordingly adjudged said defendants to be the owners of the premises and quieted their title thereto. In the above state of the record we are unable to conclude that the trial court was in error in so doing.

The judgment is affirmed.

RICHARDS, J.

The petitioner seeks the issuance by this court of a writ of mandate directed to the Honorable C. J. Luttrell, judge of the superior court in and for the county of Siskiyou, requiring him as judge thereof to proceed with the further hearing and determination of a certain action pending in said court, and also for an ancillary writ of prohibition to be directed to Hon. Walter E. Herzinger, judge of the superior court in and for the county of Shasta, restraining him as judge of said court, or otherwise, from sitting in or entertaining any proceedings in said action. The action with respect to which the petitioner seeks the aforesaid remedies was and is a proceeding in eminent domain which on Janary 18, 1930, was commenced by this petitioner as plaintiff therein in the superior court in and for the county of Siskiyou, and which action was entitled "Central Pacific Railway Company, a Corporation, Plaintiff, v. Mary Louise Deetz, Bank of Italy National Trust and Savings Association, a National Banking Association, First Doe, Second Doe, First Doe Company, and Second Doe Company, Defendants." The purpose of said action was that of the condemnation of a certain right of way over and across a certain tract of land, the precise description and boundaries of which were fully set forth in a certain map or plat thereof which was attached to and made a part of the plaintiff's complaint in said action, and of which tract of land the defendant Mary Louise Deetz was alleged to be the sole owner. As to her codefendant Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association, it was alleged in said complaint that said association claimed some interest or lien upon the land sought to be taken "under and by virtue of a certain mortgage from Henry J. Deetz and Mary L. Deetz to Frank H. Mills, dated May 7, 1924, and by said Mills assigned to defendant Bank of Italy National Trust and Savings Association on June 24, 1929."

The aforesaid actual defendants to said action were duly served with process therein. The defendant Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association did not appear in said action. The defendant Mary Louise Deetz did, however, appear therein through the filing of her separate answer, wherein she admitted and alleged her ownership of the aforesaid tract of land as averred in the plaintiff's complaint, but otherwise confined her answer therein to her claims for damage and compensation for the portions of her said land sought to be taken in said condemnation proceeding. The cause came on for trial in said court and before the Honorable C. J. Luttrell as the judge thereof on the 22d day of July, 1930, and the trial thereof thereafter proceeded from day to day until on or about July 29, 1930. During the progress thus far of the trial of said action the undisputed evidence educed therein disclosed that for many years prior to the institution thereof the plaintiff had been and still continued to be engaged in the operation of a certain standard gauge steam railroad upon and over a certain railroad right of way extending from Roseville in the county of Placer, state of California, northerly through the counties of Yuba, Sutter, Butte, Tehama, Shasta, and Siskiyou and beyond the California-Oregon interstate boundaries, and being the railroad for which a right of way over the route through said counties upon which the said railroad had been constructed had been granted by an Act of Congress approved July 25, 1866 (14 Stat. 239), entitled, "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific Railroad, in California, to Portland, in Oregon." The main line of said railroad as originally constructed was as to a portion thereof located within and across sections 25 and 26, township 41 north, range 5 east, and the portion thereof as thus located was situate upon and was imposed as a right of way upon and across a certain tract of land therein consisting of several hundred acres, of which Henry J. Deetz and Mary Louise Deetz, his wife, had come to be the owners. The evidence as thus far taken in said action further disclosed that at some time prior to the institution of said condemnation proceeding Henry J. Deetz had conveyed to his wife, Mary Louise Deetz, the particular portion of said larger tract of land upon which the plaintiff through said condemnation proceeding was seeking to relocate its aforesaid railroad and right of way so as to eliminate certain curves therein and to confine the same as thus relocated solely to the portion of said larger tract of land of which said Mary Louise Deetz had thus become the sole and separate owner.

During the course of said hearing, the original of the map or plat of the entire Deetz properties was introduced in evidence. It showed that for many years prior to the institution of the condemnation proceedings the railroad right of way as originally laid out and used, to the width of 200 feet, formed roughly the dividing line between what is now the property of Mary Louise Deetz and the remainder of the original tract, the title to which remained up to the time of his death in Henry J. Deetz. There was thus at all of said times an actual and physical separation of these two tracts of land caused by the railroad right of way and its uses; the only means of access and regress between the two tracts being by means of a subway under said railroad at a certain point through which cattle might pass and the combined activities of the two bodies of land might be carried on. The evidence further disclosed that, subsequently to the making and execution of the aforesaid deed by which Mary Louise Deetz had become the sole and separate owner of said smaller tract of land, a mortgage had been made and executed by Henry J. Deetz and Mary Louise Deetz, his wife, to the aforesaid Bank of Italy corporation, covering the larger portion of said original tract of land, the ownership of which remained in Henry J. Deetz, but which mortgage did not in fact cover or constitute a lien upon any portion of the land and premises of Mary Louise Deetz which were sought to be affected by said condemnation proceeding. The evidence further disclosed that thereafter Henry J. Deetz had died, being at the time of his death the owner of said larger tract of land, leaving the same as a portion of his estate to his widow and heirs. The evidence in the case educed during the time when the trial of said action had thus far proceeded showed such jurisdictional and other facts as would have entitled the plaintiff to a decree of condemnation.

When, however, the trial of said action had thus proceeded up to a point when it was practically ready for the making and entry of the findings and decision of the trial court and of the aforesaid judge thereof, the defendant Mary Louise Deetz, through her attorney of record, Jesse W. Carter, Esq., presented and filed in said court on July 29, 1930, a certain statement verified by her, wherein she asserted and set forth that the Honorable Charles J. Luttrell, judge of said court, was disqualified to hear and determine said cause or to further sit and act as the judge of said court therein, or as such to further hear or determine said action, for the reason that said Charles J. Luttrell was interested in the result of said cause by virtue of the asserted fact that at the time of the commencement thereof he was and ever since had been and continued to be a depositor in the said Bank of Italy Trust & Savings Association, the codefendant of the affiant therein, and that, by virtue thereof, the relationship of debtor and creditor existed between said Charles J. Luttrell and the said Bank of Italy corporation, and that, by virtue of such interest, he was disqualified to sit or act in said cause or to hear and determine the same. The affiant further deposed that the aforesaid facts which were claimed to show the disqualification of said judge were not known to her or to her said attorney prior to July 26, 1930. Coincidentally with the presentation and filing of the foregoing statement, the defendant Mary Louise Deetz, presented and filed a further statement, verified by her said attorney, to the effect that the said Charles J. Luttrell was disqualified to hear and determine said action for the stated reason that he was at the time of the commencement of the action, had been, and continued to be, a stockholder in and the owner of certain shares of the capital stock of the Transamerica Corporation, which was during all of said time the owner and holder of practically all of the shares of stock of the Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association, and that, by reason of said fact, said Charles J. Luttrell was disqualified by interest from sitting or acting as the judge of said court in said action or from hearing or determining the same or any matter in connection therewith. Wherefore the said defendant Mary Louise Deetz prayed that the cause might be heard and determined by some other judge or jury as provided by the laws of the state of California.

In the meantime, and while the trial of the cause of action was in course of progress, the attorney of record of the defendant Mary Louise Deetz, assuming, as the petition herein narrates, to represent certain children of Mary Louise Deetz, undertook to intervene in the action in eminent domain, claiming to have some interest in the entire tract formerly owned by Henry J. Deetz, adverse to the interest of Mary Louise Deetz therein. The matter of the right of these asserted adverse claimants was undetermined at the time the aforesaid statements asserting the disqualification of Judge Luttrell were presented and filed. In the answer which the respondents have made and filed to the petition herein it is alleged that during the trial of said action it was stipulated that, with respect to the aforesaid adverse claims of the children of the defendant Mary Louise Deetz, the said superior court should proceed with the trial of the cause upon the theory that Mary Louise Deetz was the sole owner of all of the property described in the complaint in said action, and that any award made for compensation or damages to said property would be made solely to Mary Louise Deetz, and that the interest, if any, of the children of Mary Louise Deetz in any of said property could be determined in any subsequent proceeding which said children might see fit to institute against said plaintiff, and that, in view of such stipulation, the interest of the children of Mary Louise Deetz in any of said property was not considered by said superior court in said proceeding, and was and is not an issue therein or in the instant proceeding.

Upon the presentation and filing of the aforesaid statements asserting the disqualification of Judge Luttrell, the plaintiff in said action presented and filed its resistance to the charge of disqualification, and in so doing set forth and showed, through the presentation of the official record of the mortgage held and possessed by the Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association, that said association had in truth and fact no interest whatever in and no lien upon the property of Mary Louise Deetz which was in course of being subjected to such condemnation proceeding, and that said banking association had been joined in said action by the plaintiff therein upon an erroneous report presented by a searcher of records with respect to the lands affected by said mortgage. Thereupon and upon such showing the plaintiff moved the trial court for leave to amend its complaint in said action by striking therefrom all reference to the Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association, and to dismiss the action as to it, upon the ground that through said error it had been improperly joined as a defendant in the action. In the aforesaid state of the record it is alleged by the petitioner that the Honorable C. J. Luttrell, one of the respondents herein, declined to rule upon either or any of the aforesaid motions of the plaintiff in said action or to in any wise proceed with said cause, except that he did, without prejudice to any charge of disqualification, but by reason of the great expense to which the petitioner herein had been put in preparing for said trial and in going to the county of Siskiyou for the same and of the nature of said trial and the necessity for a speedy determination of the cause, hear the testimony upon the issues tendered therein to the extent that all of the evidence in the cause has been taken and the parties thereto have rested. The petitioner alleges that the respondent Luttrell, having so done and the cause being thus ready for decision upon the merits, declined and refused to decide the cause on its merits or to determine the same or to take any further action therein, except to call in another judge. The record discloses that the parties to the action agreed and stated in open court that Judge Luttrell might select another judge agreeable to the parties, to sit and act further in the cause, but that Judge Luttrell was unable to secure such other judge upon whom the parties might agree. Thereupon, and upon the suggestion of Judge Luttrell, but without the consent of the petitioner herein, the chairman of the judicial council of the state of California, upon the representation that the parties to the action had failed to agree as to the calling in of another judge, requested the respondent herein Hon. Walter E. Herzinger to sit and act as the judge in said action, in order to pass upon the question of the disqualification of respondent C. J. Luttrell, and that, in conformity with said request, the respondent Herzinger has undertaken to sit and act as the judge in said action, and has set for hearing therein the matter of the disqualification of his co-respondent Luttrell. For the foregoing reasons the petitioner prays this court to issue the aforesaid writs of mandate and prohibition.

[1] The respondents appeared in response to said petition and presented and filed their demurrer thereto and also and at the same time moved this court to strike out certain portions of the petition upon the ground that the same and each thereof were irrelevant, immaterial, and surplusage. The respondents also filed an answer to the petition containing specific admissions and denials, the latter of which were in the main based upon a want of information and belief. The respondents a little later presented and filed an amendment to their answer, setting up certain matters which were deemed by them to be material. To the respondents' amended answer the petitioner has presented a demurrer, the merits of which are also discussed in the briefs of counsel filed herein, but whether or not the matters thus presented require decision will depend upon our disposition of the main issues involved in this proceeding. The primary questions presented for our consideration are those which arise upon the respondents' demurrer to the petition. The respondents in support of their demurrer insist that the petition does not state facts sufficient to justify the issuance of either writ as prayed for therein, for the reason that it appears upon the face thereof that the petitioner has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. The remedy which they thus urge as a reason why neither of these writs should issue is that already invoked and in process of determination under the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 957), and which has relation to the disqualification of judges in actions or proceedings and to the method by which the existence or nonexistence of such disqualification is in the first instance to be determined. The respondents plausibly argue that, since the very question as to whether Judge Luttrell was or was not disqualified to sit or act in the action in eminent domain instituted and pending in the court over which he presides has been presented to Judge Herzinger for determination, in strict compliance with the method provided for in section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure as recently amended, and that the determination of that issue by Judge Herzinger either way will furnish the petitioner all of the remedy to which it is entitled. We are of the opinion, however, that the remedy thus afforded to the petitioner is not, when pursued to its finality, such a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy as would suffice to meet the emergencies of this particular case, since, while the law does not provide for an immediate appeal from the decision of a judge who is thus called in to determine the question of the disqualification of the judge whose regular function and duty it would be to proceed with the hearing and determination of the cause pending before him, the matter thus decided would be the proper subject of consideration upon an ultimate appeal from whatever judgment might be entered in the cause, and, since this is true, the result might finally be that the party to the action, who might deem himself injuriously affected by the decision of the judge called in to determine this single issue might, by prevailing upon such appeal, set aside and render nugatory all of the proceedings and eventualities of the cause, for the reason that the judge who had actually tried the same was not the judge who in point of law was entitled to sit or act therein. Proceedings in eminent domain partake of the nature of summary proceedings. Code Civ. Proc. § 1264. It is the public interest which is to be subserved by the taking for public or quasi public purposes the property of those private persons who are parties defendant in such action. This is well illustrated by the situation presented in the original action wherein it must be assumed that the public interest will be subserved by the speedy completion of a main line railway over the route prescribed and over the lands of the immediate party or parties defendant in said action. It would amount to a very serious interference with this result to have the question of the qualification or disqualification of the judge, whose regular function and duty it would be to hear and determine said action, remain in doubt and in danger until such time as the question should be determined upon the ultimate appeal from the judgment. We are enforced in our conclusion that the particular question sought to be submitted to Judge Herzinger for decision cannot be held to constitute such a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, as would prevent the petitioner from seeking these writs, by the decision in the case of Evans v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 290 P. 662, wherein substantially the precise question submitted for our decision herein was involved. In that case it appeared that the trial judge was proceeding to hear and determine several causes at issue in his court, when a statement as to his disqualification so to do was presented and filed in conformity with the procedure outlined in section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure as recently amended; whereupon another judge was designated, pursuant to such procedure, to hear and determine the question of the disqualification of the trial judge, and who upon such hearing determined that the trial judge was not disqualified. Notwithstanding such determination, a writ of prohibition was sought in the appellate tribunal preventing the trial judge, thus held to be qualified, from proceeding to hear and determine the causes thus at issue before him. The appellate tribunal entertained such application and granted the writ, and, in so doing, considered the question as to whether the procedure undertaken in pursuance of the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure furnished such a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy as would serve to prevent the issuance of such a writ. In deciding this question to the contrary, the court reviewed the recent decisions of this court in the cases of Hall v. Superior Court, 198 Cal. 373, 245 P. 814, 820, and Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 315, 187 P. 1056, and also the decision of the appellate court in the case of Quatman v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. App. 203, 221 P. 666, 668, in which latter case it was stated that "where a judge is disqualified to act in any proceeding or cause, the disability necessarily enters into all orders and decisions made by him other than those specially excepted and provided for in the Codes, and to refuse the writ on the ground that a remedy might be had in another manner would be to permit the trial to proceed to a final conclusion by the disqualified judge and then set aside the proceedings as void ab initio." This language was quoted with approval by this court in Hall v. Superior Court, supra, which added thereto its own conclusion that "no good purpose could be served in permitting a disqualified judge to perform certain acts and thereafter declare them void on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to perform the same." We are satisfied with the correctness of these views, and hence conclude that the fact of a pending proceeding in the trial court under the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine the qualification or disqualification of Judge Luttrell to further proceed with the hearing and determination of the original cause pending before him does not furnish an adequate reason why this court should not entertain the instant proceeding.

[2, 3] The real issue presented is as to whether upon the admitted facts set forth in the verified statement presented and filed before the trial court Judge Luttrell is or is not disqualified to sit or act in the original action and to proceed to hear and determine the same. The primary reason set forth in the first statement presented and filed by the defendant Mary Louis Deetz consisted in the admitted fact that at the time of the institution of such action and at all times thereafter Hon. C. J. Luttrell was and continued to be a depositor in that certain banking corporation known as Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association, and which banking corporation was her codefendant in said action. It was urged before the trial court, and is here insisted by the defendant Mary Louise Deetz, that the aforesaid relationship of the trial judge to said corporation amounted to a disqualification under the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure; the basis of such contention being that the relation thus existing between the trial judge and said corporation amounted to the relation of debtor and creditor, to the extent of creating such an interest in the action as would suffice to prevent Judge Luttrell from hearing or determining the same. Section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1927, p. 1403, § 1), as it existed prior to its recent amendment, read as follows: "170. No justice, judge or justice of the peace shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding: 1. To which he is a party; or in which he is interested."

The section of the Code as it thus read did not attempt to define the particulars wherein the "interest" of a trial judge should consist, but it is quite well settled by the uniform current of authority upon the subject that it must be such a direct and immediate interest in the result of the litigation as would in some degree tend to form an improper bias which might influence his conduct in the consideration and disposition of the cause; and, while it is true that the relation which one holds to a banking corporation in the capacity of a depositor has been held to constitute the technical relation of creditor and debtor which might in some instances arise to the dignity of a disqualifying interest, the current of authority is averse to the conclusion that the bare fact that a trial judge may happen to be a depositor in a bank which may have such a more or less immediate relation to the action and to the result thereof as to cause it to be made a defendant therein, is thereby, in the absence of any further showing, subject to the disqualification of interest in respect to the trial of the cause. In each of the cases relied upon by the respondents the interest of the trial judge which was held to constitute such disqualification arose out of some special relationship of the trial judge to the parties in the action, as, for example, in Regents of the University of California v. Turner, 159 Cal. 541, 114 P. 842, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1162. The case was one wherein the judge in whose court an estate was being administered had a creditor's claim against the decedent, and hence was required in the course of administration to pass upon the validity of his own claim. In the case of Moody v. Shuffleton, 203 Cal. 100, 262 P. 1095, also relied upon by the respondents, the relation between a judge and a party defendant was not involved; the alleged disqualification being that of a supervisor to pass upon a claim before the board in which he was directly interested. In the case of Quatman v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. App. 203, 221 P. 666, the judge was one of the creditors of a corporation upon the alleged insolvency of which another creditor was seeking the appointment of a receiver in an action wherein the trial judge would be required to pass directly upon the validity of his claim against such corporation. It is not necessary to review the conflicting decisions from other jurisdictions, since those, as a rule, depend upon the particular language of the statutes upon which the varying rulings of such tribunals depend. The trend of authority in California, under section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it read prior to its recent amendment, has been favorable to the view that the bare relationship of debtor and creditor existing between a trial judge and a party defendant would not in and of itself suffice to constitute a disqualification. Southern California M. R. Co. v. San Bernardino National Bank, 100 Cal. 316, 34 P. 711; Johnston v. Dakan, 9 Cal. App. 522, 526, 99 P. 729. It may be generally stated that the bare relation which a trial judge might happen to hold toward a national banking corporation, one of the defendants in an action, in the capacity of a depositor therein, ought not, in the absence of any further showing, to constitute any more of a disqualification to try the cause than would the relation which such a judge might hold to a municipality as a taxpayer therein disqualify him to pass in judgment upon the validity of the tax. See Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co., 118 Cal. 249, 50 P. 268; Higgins v. City of San Diego, 126 Cal. 303, 58 P. 700, 59 P. 209; Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 133 Cal. 529, 65 P. 1049; Oakland v. Pac. C. L. Co., 171 Cal. 392, 153 P. 705. Whatever might have been our views, however, with relation to the effect of the foregoing decisions pro and con upon this general subject prior to the recent amendment of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we are satisfied that the immediate question here under review has been set at rest by such amendment. This section was amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 957), so as to read in part as follows:

"170. No justice, judge or justice of the peace shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding:

"1. To which he is a party; or in which he is interested other than as a holder or owner of any capital stock of a corporation, or of any bond, note or other security issued by a corporation;

"2. In which he is interested as a holder or owner of any capital stock of a corporation, or of any bond, note or other security issued by a corporation."

The foregoing amendment to this section of the Code had for its obvious purpose that of defining the relationship between the judge or justice in any action or proceeding and a corporation, whether plaintiff or defendant therein, which should constitute a disqualifying interest. It is therein expressly stated that it is the relationship of a stockholder which shall constitute the interest in the corporation amounting to a disqualification to sit or act in an action to which such corporation is a party. In these days of widespread interrelationships between one banking corporation and another it would seem that such a differentiation would be salutary, since otherwise justices and judges, who may be assumed as a rule to be depositors in some bank or other, might find themselves disqualified to hear and determine any cause in which any bank was a party plaintiff or defendant.

[4] This brings us naturally to the consideration of the second ground of disqualification which was urged before the trial court and is still insisted upon here. This other alleged disqualification was held to consist in the admitted fact that Judge Luttrell was at the time of the institution of the original action and continued to be thereafter a stockholder in a corporation known as Transamerica Corporation, which was asserted in the statement presented and filed before the trial court to be the owner of substantially all of the capital stock of the Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association. Had the Transamerica Corporation been made a party to said original action, the situation would doubtless have been one directly covered by the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure as above amended. But the fact that, whatever the relationship thus alleged to exist between Transamerica Corporation and Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association might be, the former corporation was not a party to said action and hence does not come within the intendment of said action. Neither do we think that the situation as thus presented could in any event constitute a disqualification under the well-settled rule above stated that the alleged disqualifying interest must appear to be an immediate and direct interest in the outcome of the litigation. To be a stockholder in some corporation which is not and could not be made a party to the action cannot by any stretch of reasoning be held to amount to a disqualification, and we are cited to do no authority which so holds. On the contrary, the cases not only within our own but other jurisdictions have expressly held that in such cases no disqualification exists. Central Sav. Bank of Oakland v. Lake, 201 Cal. 438, 444, 257 P. 521; Favorite v. Superior Court of Riverside County, 181 Cal. 261, 184 P.

15, 8 A. L. R. 290; Rooker v. Trust Company, 263 U. S. 413, 44 S. Ct. 149, 68 L. Ed. 362; Texas, etc., Ass'n v. Williams, 117 Tex. 218, 300 S. W. 44; Webb v. Town of Eutaw, 9 Ala. App. 474, 63 So. 687; People v. Whitridge, 144 App. Div. 493, 129 N. Y. S. 300.

Having thus arrived at the conclusion, for the reasons and upon the authorities above cited, that Judge Luttrell was not disqualified by reason of either of the causes set forth in the verified statement of the defendant Mary Louis Deetz presented and filed in the trial court, but that at all of the times mentioned therein and in the petition herein Judge Luttrell was qualified to sit and act as the trial judge in said action and to hear and determine the same, it follows that it has become unnecessary to decide any of the other questions presented in this proceeding and particularly those urged by the respondents in both their answer and amended answer herein. If, as above found, Judge Luttrell was at no time disqualified to hear and determine said original action, it follows of necessity not only that a writ of mandate should issue herein requiring him so to do in the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from his office, but that a writ of prohibition should also issue herein requiring his co-respondent Judge Herzinger to refrain from the further performance of any judicial action in connection with the hearing and determination of said cause.

Let these respective writs issue as prayed for.

PRESTON, J., deeming himself disqualified, does not participate in the foregoing decision.

CURTIS, J. (dissenting).

I dissent. The majority opinion holds that a judge who is the owner of stock in a corporation which in turn owns practically all of the stock of a second corporation, which second corporation is a party defendant to the action, is not disqualified from acting at the trial of said action.

Section 170, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that no judge shall act as such in any action in which he is interested as a holder of any capital stock of a corporation. To hold that a judge must hold stock in the corporation which is actually a party to the action before he comes within the terms of this section is giving to the section a narrow and technical interpretation. A judge may, as in the present action, have just as disqualifying an interest in an action by holding stock in the holding company as if he were a stockholder in the subsidiary corporation, practically all of whose stock is held by the holding company. It is the interest of the judge in the litigation before him that disqualifies him, and the Code section makes no distinction as to whether this interest is due to ownership of stock directly in the corporation, which is a party to the action, or indirectly in a holding company, the owner of the stock of the first-named corporation.

"These provisions of the Code, taken in connection with the authorities cited, indicate that section 170 is to have no technical or narrow construction, but is to be broadly applied to all litigation, where a judge is called upon to adjudicate property rights." Howell v. Budd, 91 Cal. 342, 27 P. 747, 750.

The majority opinion is directly opposed to the liberal and reasonable construction given to section 170, Code of Civil Procedure, by the following decisions of this court: Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 315, 187 P. 1056; Hall v. Superior Court, 198 Cal. 373, 245 P. 814; City of Vallejo v. Superior Court, 199 Cal. 408, 249 P. 1084. None of the authorities cited in the majority opinion bear directly upon the question involved, nor do they sustain the holding of the majority opinion.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for damages for the alleged wrongful attachments of personal property used by him in drilling an oil well. The defendants are the sheriff, his bondsman, and the attaching plaintiff. The cause was tried without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for all defendants. The plaintiff appeals on a bill of exceptions.

Behr and White entered into a contract with plaintiff wherein the latter agreed to drill a well for oil and the former agreed to furnish plaintiff a derrick, engine, and other necessary equipment to be used in the work. As a part of the agreement, Behr and White undertook to pay plaintiff $250 a day as damages for each day's delay in the drilling operations caused by them, such sum to cover the value of the use of such personal property. Suit was commenced by one Moore against Behr and White to recover the purchase price of this personal property, and out of that suit issued the writs of attachment which the sheriff served upon this plaintiff, and which are the base of this action for damages. The trial court found that the several writs of attachment were duly and regularly served; that, by reason of such attachments, the drilling operations were delayed approximately nine days; that the damages to plaintiff because of such delay were $150 a day; that the plaintiff was actually paid by Behr and White the sum of $250 for each day to cover such damage.

On this appeal the appellant's chief attack is on the attachment proceedings. In support of the judgment the respondents defend these proceedings and also insist that appellant has suffered no damage. Because of our view on the latter point, it is unnecessary to consider the questions relating to the attachment proceedings.

[1] The respondents put in evidence the written contract between appellant and Behr and White for the purpose of showing the agreement of the latter to pay appellant damages for any delay caused by them. The contract was competent evidence of this agreement, and the evidence was material to the issue respondents sought to prove. This proof was followed by the uncontradicted proof of these facts: That appellant's damages amounted to but $150 a day; that the delay was caused by the fault of Behr and White; and that they had actually paid appellant the sum of $250 for each day his operations were suspended. Upon this evidence the trial court found that the appellant was fully compensated for all loss sustained by reason of any delay caused by said attachments.

[2] The good faith of the respondents is conceded; hence compensatory damages alone were recoverable. Section 3294, Civ. Code; Maher v. Wilson, 139 Cal. 514, 518, 73 P. 418. The trial court adopted the proper measure of damages within the rule of Hurd v. Barnhart, 53 Cal. 97, and, having found that appellant was paid more than the damages suffered, the single question remains whether such payment inures to the benefit of respondents.

[3] That appellant's only damage resulted from the forced delay in the use of the property, and that this delay was caused by the fault of Behr and White, who fully compensated him for such delay, must be conceded. If these payments were merely voluntary contributions from a collateral source, they could not be used in mitigation of the damages suffered by the appellant. 8 R. C. L. p. 554. And, if they were involuntary payments made by one who stood in the relation of an insurer, but who was not himself at fault, they could not be so used. 8 R. C. L. p. 557. But, when the payment is not a mere gratuity but is an obligatory one made by a party in privity with the tort-feasor, a different rule obtains. Thus, in Drinkwater v. Dinsmore, 80 N. Y. 390, 36 Am. Rep. 624, it was held that no recovery for loss of time alone could be had if plaintiff had been paid his full wages during the period of his disability, and to the same effect is Montgomery & E. R. Co. v. Mallette, 92 Ala. 209, 9 So. 363. These cases are referred to in Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Miller, 120 Ga. 453, 47 S. E. 959, 67 L. R. A. 87, 93, 1 Ann. Cas. 210, where a distinction is made because the payments by the employer were voluntary and were made merely as a gratuity.

The rule of the New York and Alabama cases is sound and just, particularly in a case such as we have here, where the plaintiff seeks compensatory damages for time lost by reason of the alleged wrongful act of the respondents. The peculiar phase of the case is that, by reason of this alleged wrongful act, the appellant here gained a substantial benefit and did not suffer any loss.

Judgment affirmed.

HOUSER, J.

In substance, the facts necessary to a decision in the pending appeal are that, by the terms of a contract entered into between plaintiffs on the one side and defendants on the other, defendants agreed to sell to plaintiffs, and plaintiffs agreed to buy from defendants, certain real and personal property at a fixed price, to be paid partly in cash and the remainder of the purchase price by a mortgage on, or a trust deed to, the property, to be executed by plaintiffs in favor of defendants on or before a specified date. In part performance of the provisions of the contract, plaintiffs paid to defendants the sum of $3,500 in cash. About one month after the date specified in the contract for the consummation of the transaction had expired, plaintiffs offered to an attorney, who throughout the negotiations between the parties had represented defendants, to fully perform the conditions as expressed in said contract that were to be performed by plaintiffs, which offer was by said attorney on behalf of defendants refused. Whereupon plaintiffs commenced an action for damages, which resulted in the rendition of a judgment in favor of defendants, and from which judgment the appeal herein is presented.

In the complaint, among other things, plaintiffs pleaded performance and "that the time for performance was extended. * * *"

Although by the appeal herein several different legal questions are submitted by the respective parties to this court for determination, it is thought that but one of them requires consideration. It has to do with the question of whether on the trial of the action plaintiffs should have been permitted to amend their complaint by alleging the existence of facts which, if satisfactorily established, might have constituted a waiver by defendants of the provision in the contract by which it was to be performed on or before a certain date specified therein. The situation which by the trial court was acted upon adversely to the interest of plaintiffs is presented in the following résumé (found in appellants' brief herein) of the several declarations by respective counsel at the time when plaintiffs sought from, but were refused by, the trial court permission to amend their complaint in the action then on trial, to wit:

"Time is not made the essence of the contract between the plaintiffs and defendants and no demand for performance on the part of the defendants was made at any time, and these conversations and actions of the defendants are competent to show that they did not claim any breach of the contract, but waived performance on the days and dates when performance should be made. If the court thinks that the pleadings should be amended to allow evidence of such waiver, then I ask leave to amend the complaint so as to set forth the facts constituting waiver."

[1, 2] Ordinarily, it would appear to be a well-settled rule of pleading that, where a cause of action depends upon proof of waiver, it must be specially pleaded (25 Cal. Jur. 931, and authorities there cited); and, abstractly, the principle of legal procedure is equally well established that, in the matter of permitting amendments to be made to pleadings, although great liberality should be shown by the trial court, a refusal of permission so to do will be disturbed on appeal only when it is apparent that an abuse of discretion has occurred. 21 Cal. Jur. 183 et seq. However, in furtherance of justice, where it appears that a proposed amendment will not radically change the issues originally presented in the action, and will neither work great delay nor prejudice rights of the adverse party to the action, as has been judicially declared, it is clear that "it can very rarely happen that a court would be justified in refusing a party leave to amend his pleading so that he may properly present his case." Crosby v. Clark, 132 Cal. 1, 8, 63 P. 1022, 1024, and cases there cited.

From the fact that, by the allegations contained in plaintiffs' complaint, it was alleged that performance was not due as of the date specified in the agreement, but "that the time for performance was extended," and that, as extended, the plaintiffs had offered performance which had been denied or refused by defendants—it was, or at least should have been, made manifest to defendants that plaintiffs relied upon either an express or an implied extension by defendants of time within which to comply with the terms of the contract. However, it is plain that a waiver of exact time of performance might not be the equivalent of an extension of time, since at least the former might be for a definite period and the latter might be indefinite in that regard. But, in the circumstances of either situation, defendants were placed on notice that, by reason of some unspecified acts or declarations of defendants, plaintiffs asserted a right to perform the conditions provided for by the contract at a date subsequent to that specified therein as a limit for such performance; and, from their denials set forth in their answer, defendants were presumed to be ready to rebut such evidence as might be adduced by plaintiffs in support of their allegations.

[3, 4] In matters of the character of that here under consideration, the discretion with which the trial court is vested is to be guided by fixed principles of law. Wixon v. Devine, 91 Cal. 477, 27 P. 777. Nor may such court arbitrarily deny an application to amend a pleading. In the case of Norton v. Bassett, 158 Cal. 425, 427, 111 P. 253, 254, it is said that, "speaking generally, it may be said that the test as to whether or not the court has abused its discretion will depend upon whether the amendment is a permissible amendment which will perfect a cause of action otherwise imperfectly pleaded."

[5] In the instant case, the alleged cause of action depended upon a breach of contract upon the part of defendants which arose from their refusal to permit plaintiffs to perform the conditions upon them made incumbent by the terms of the agreement of the parties. Without reference to other questions either of fact or of law in the case, the liability of defendants for such alleged breach of contract was contingent upon whether such tendered performance by plaintiffs had been made within a time either expressly or impliedly agreed upon by the parties. Among the several ways of producing an extension of the time limit for the performance of conditions by plaintiffs as fixed by the original agreement may well have been an express or an implied waiver of such time limit by defendants. As a matter of pleading of the cause of action, it is clear that, if waiver of such time limit by defendants was relied upon, proper allegations of fact from which such a waiver would have resulted would have been most appropriate. However, since it is apparent that the cause of action may have been "imperfectly pleaded" (Norton v. Bassett, 158 Cal. 425, 427, 111 P. 253); that by the proposed amendment the issues in the action as originally presented would not have been radically or at all changed; that defendants could not have been taken by surprise by the proposed amendment; that, if permitted, it would have worked no delay; that, by permitting such amendment, no rights of defendants would have been jeopardized; but, to the contrary, that it would have been in furtherance of justice—it follows that, in refusing leave to plaintiffs to amend their complaint as requested, prejudicial error was committed by the trial court.

It is ordered that the judgment be, and it is, reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action of ejectment by John Trabucco and another against A. R. Sorrels. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Edward J. Lynch, of San Francisco, and Charles L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for appellant.

F. M. Ostrander, of Merced, and Louis T. Milburn, of Mariposa, for respondents.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiffs had judgment against the defendants in an action of ejectment involving the ownership of the east half of the southwest quarter of section 13, township 4 south, range 18 east, M. D. B. & M. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

At the conclusion of the trial the court made the following findings of fact:

"I. That the plaintiffs are, and ever since the 7th day of September, 1922, have been the owners in fee, and entitled to the possession of all that certain real property situate, lying and being in the County of Mariposa, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to-wit: (Here follows the description above given);

"II. That the east line of the east one-half of the southwest quarter of Section 13 Township 4 South, Range 18 East, M. D. B. & M., bears from a stone mound marked '¼', being the quarter stone between Sections 12 and 13, T. 4 S., R. 18 E., M. D. B. & M., S. 5 deg. 18 min E. to a stone mound standing on ridge running to the southwest, as said east line and said stone mound are set out as 'P. Trabucco's southeast corner, stone mound identified by John Trabucco as quarter corner between sections 13 and 24,' on that certain map introduced in evidence by plaintiff herein, and marked plaintiff's exhibit 7."

The court further found that the defendant, on or about the 10th day of July, 1927, located a certain mining claim known as, and called, "Big Pine Number 1 Quartz claim," and placed the point of discovery within the boundaries of the lands found to belong to the plaintiffs, as hereinbefore described, and that the defendant was wrongfully in possession of the premises claimed by him. Conclusions of law were drawn to the effect that the plaintiffs were the owners of the premises described, and judgment went for them as herein stated.

[1] Upon the trial of the action, and upon this appeal, the only question really presented for determination is the location of the south quarter corner of the lands described. On the part of the plaintiffs, it is contended that the original corner was found in place; that the original monument of the original United States survey was found in place, and so determined by the trial court. On the part of the defendant and appellant, the claim was and is made that the real quarter corner should be 351 feet west of the position described in the findings and judgment of the court. While there is conflicting testimony in the record as to the true location of the quarter corner referred to, if there is in the record testimony sufficient to support the findings of the trial court, then and in that case the judgment should be affirmed. If the testimony on the part of the plaintiffs, to the effect that the original corner set at the time of the original United States survey is still in place, and was in place at the time of the trial, and was the quarter corner referred to at the time the patent was issued for the lands and premises mentioned in the findings as belonging to the plaintiffs, then and in that case, irrespective of whether the original survey was or was not strictly accurate, the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment.

[2] As stated in 9 C. J. 164, original corners as established by the government surveyors, if they can be found, or places where they were originally established, if they can be definitely determined, are conclusive on all persons owning or holding with reference thereto, without regard to whether they were located correctly or not, and must remain the corners or monuments by which to determine the boundaries.

If the testimony upon which the court acted was sufficient to show the actual existence of the corner as marked when the original survey was made, then all questions and all the citation of authorities relative to locating lost corners and lost monuments become immaterial.

With these preliminary statements, the following excerpts taken from the testimony, we think, support the findings of the trial court:

[3] The witness C. A. Robinson, called on behalf of the plaintiffs, testified that he was a licensed surveyor in the state of California, and had been such since the year 1895; that at one time he was county surveyor of Mariposa county, and also of Merced county; had at different times been a United States deputy surveyor, located in California. This witness testified that he found the quarter corner in dispute; that one of the blocks of stone had chisel marks on it, to wit, "1—4," indicating the quarter corner, and from that corner, conforming to Mr. Winton's, he used the field notes more carefully. Mr. Winton, called as a witness on the part of the plaintiffs, testified that he was a licensed surveyor; was, at the time of the trial, the city engineer of the city of Merced and the deputy county surveyor of the county of Merced; that he went with Mr. Robinson to the quarter corner, and found the stone marked as "1—4," with a small mound of rocks. Mr. Bertken, a witness called on the part of the plaintiffs, testified that he acted as flagman with A. G. Herrman, United States deputy mineral surveyor, when a township plat was made of township 4 south, range 18 east, and during the survey they camped on Pete Trabucco's homestead; that, while he did not assist in locating the quarter corner of the south line of section 13, between sections 13 and 24, he was there when it was located; that he saw the men working in marking the corner, saw them establishing the monument; that they used rocks in making the monument; that he had visited the property off and on for thirty years; that he visited the place recently and pointed out where it was. This witness also described the topography of the country where the monument was located, and where it was established by the United States surveyor; that he was up there the Saturday preceding the trial, had no difficulty in locating the monument; that it was the quarter section corner on the south line of section 13. The witness Robinson, to whom we have heretofore referred, further testified as to the topography of the country; also recognized the photograph of the place where the monument is located; that he had no difficulty in finding the corner; that the monument he found there was, in his opinion, the original monument established when the Herrman survey was made. The witness Winton further testified that he used the field notes of the original survey, and that the field notes place the corner on the ridge of land theretofore described by the witness as being the place where the monument was found. This witness further testified that the corner as located and indicated on the map as the southeast corner stone mound, identified as hereinbefore stated, was the quarter corner section between sections 13 and 24.

The testimony set out in the record further shows that there was practically no dispute as to the quarter corner on the north line of the section, and that, following the field notes of the survey from the north quarter corner, the south quarter corner would be and was located at the place identified by the witnesses as hereinbefore stated, and also as found by the trial court.

As contradiction of the testimony which we have set out, the defendant called M. B. Nevins as a witness, who testified that he followed the field notes of the United States survey, and did not find them very accurate; that in going over the field notes he could not make them coincide with the ground. This witness further testified that the corner should be west of the position found by the trial court. The field notes of the original survey were introduced in evidence in relation to the corner in dispute, and read as follows: "On ridge to S. W. set ¼ sec. cor. Set oak stake 4" sq. and 4 ft. long 12" in ground, marked ¼ S. an N. Fac. Raised a md. of rocks 4 ft. in dia. at base 1½ ft. high around stake. Pits impracticable. No bearings near. Descend on N. side of ridge." This corresponds to the testimony of the witnesses as to the place where the quarter section corner monument was found.

Referring again to 9 C. J. 164, § 18, we find the following: "Original corners as established by government surveyors, if they can be found, or the places where they were originally established, if they can be definitely determined, are conclusive on all persons owning or holding with reference thereto, without regard to whether they were located correctly or not, and must remain the true corners or monuments by which to determine the boundaries. Errors of location cannot be corrected by the courts or by surveyors called on to locate government corners and lines." In the same volume, as to relocation of corners as lost corners, the rule is set forth that, so long as the original corners remain marked and the monuments can be identified, the original survey is controlling.

That the location of the corner to which we have referred was the only question in dispute satisfactorily appears from the following which we find in the record:

"Mr. Ostrander: The only corner in dispute is the southeast corner?

"Mr. Lynch: That is the only corner in dispute; this corner, the southeast corner of Mr. Trabucco's place, is the corner of dispute."

From what we have stated, it satisfactorily appears that there is sufficient testimony in the record to sustain the finding of the trial court as to the existence of the monument marking the corner in dispute, as originally located by the United States surveyor at the time of making the original location. This being true, further consideration of the cases having to do with the fixing of the boundaries, cited by the respective parties, would seem to be superfluous. We may, however, call attention to the case of Churchill Co. v. Beal, 99 Cal. App. 482, 278 P. 894, where this court used the following language, quoting from page 490 of 99 Cal. App. 278 P. 894, 897: "If the original survey * * * fixed the westerly boundary of the lands granted to the plaintiff and the plaintiff's grantors as found by the trial court, then, and in that case, whether the line as originally located was correct becomes immaterial. It is the correct line in the determination of this action, as it fixes on the grounds the lands covered by the patents, the ownership of which has passed to the plaintiff in this action." The following California cases support the rules which we have just herein set forth: Kimball v. McKee, 149 Cal. 435, 86 P. 1089; Foss v. Johnstone, 158 Cal. 119, 110 P. 294; Weaver v. Howatt, 161 Cal. 77, 118 P. 519; Weaver v. Howatt, 171 Cal. 302, 152 P. 925; Spiers v. Spiers, 176 Cal. 557, 169 P. 73; Wilmon v. Aros, 191 Cal. 80, 214 P. 962.

The judgment is affirmed.

McCANDLESS v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.*

Civ. 6442.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨646.

Sidewalk of street is part of "highway" to which sidewalk is adjacent.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Highway," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Municipal corporations ⇨269(4), 657(2).

It would be within power of constituted authorities not to provide for construction of sidewalk or to abolish existing sidewalk on street.

3. Eminent domain ⇨119(10).

Construction of pedestrian tunnel by city on part of sidewalk in front of part of plaintiff's lot held not new "taking"; hence not compensable (Const. art. 1, § 14).

It appeared that alleged taking here involved was caused by city in erection and construction of pedestrian tunnel on part only (both as to length and as to width) of sidewalk on street on which lot belonging to landowner abutted. Such construction would not be ground for action for damages, since general dedication of street or highway to public use ordinarily is all-inclusive, and embraces, not only every known use for moving, carriage, locomotion, transportation, or conveyance of persons or property, but includes any other or additional reasonable use, either of similar or dissimilar kind, that may be discovered for benefit or welfare of traveling public.

Action by Elizabeth McCandless against the City of Los Angeles. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Erwin P. Werner, City Atty., Jerrell Babb and Sam H. Erwin, Deputies City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J.

Plaintiff brought an action against the defendant by which she sought to recover a judgment for damages alleged to have been occasioned by the action of the defendant in causing the erection and construction of a pedestrian tunnel on a part only (both as to length and as to width) of a sidewalk on a street on which a certain lot belonging to plaintiff abutted. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, plaintiff has appealed to this court.

Although several different legal principles are urged by appellant as suggesting a sufficient reason or reasons for a reversal of the judgment, it is conceded that each of such reasons is, and that all of them are, finally dependent upon a determination of the ultimate question of whether the construction of the said pedestrian tunnel which occupied a part of the sidewalk of the street on which the lot of plaintiff abutted constituted the taking of any property belonging to plaintiff which would give rise to a legal claim for compensation therefor and thereby afford a basis for an action for damages.

[1, 2] At the outset, it may be well to remember that a sidewalk of a street is a part of the highway to which the sidewalk is adjacent. Martinovich v. Wooley, 128 Cal. 141, 60 P. 760; Bonnet v. San Francisco, 65 Cal. 231, 3 P. 815; Marini v. Graham, 67 Cal. 130, 7 P. 442; Ex parte Taylor, 87 Cal. 94, 25 P. 258. It is also apparent that, while ordinarily for the purpose of affording greater convenience and safety to pedestrians a sidewalk is constructed apart from that portion of the highway used for vehicular traffic, it would be within the power of the constituted authorities to depart from the usual custom, and either fail to provide for the construction of a sidewalk on a street or to abolish an existing sidewalk thereon.

From an examination of the authorities throughout the United States, it appears that, as far as may be ascertained, no decision has been made in a case wherein the facts resembled those in the instant case. But it also appears that, where the question of the right of damages by the owner of property which abutted upon a street for injuries which resulted to him by reason of a public use having been made of the street other than, or different from, that to which the street was originally intended or subjected, the decisions emanating from the several courts of last resort are not harmonious one with the other. As examples of decisions wherein the courts of one state have differed in their determination of the question from the conclusion reached thereon by tribunals of other jurisdictions, see Ryan v. Preston, 59 App. Div. 97, 69 N. Y. S. 100; Minnequa Lumber Co. v. Denver, 67 Colo. 472, 186 P. 539; Pillings v. Pottawattamie County, 188 Iowa 567, 176 N. W. 314; Town of Longmont v. Parker, 14 Colo. 386, 23 P. 443, 20 Am. St. Rep. 277; Commissioner of Highways v. Ely, 54 Mich. 173, 19 N. W. 940; Morris v. Covington County, 118 Miss. 875, 80 So. 337; Newton v. New York, etc., R. Co., 72 Conn. 420, 44 A. 813. The foregoing cases include situations such as the construction and maintenance of side paths for the use of bicycles along a public highway (Ryan v. Preston, supra); the building of a viaduct in a street (Minnequa Lumber Co. v. Denver, supra); the making of large cuts or fills in a street (Pillings v. Pottawattamie County, supra); the digging of a ditch in a street (Town of Longmont v. Parker and Commissioner of Highways v. Ely, supra); the closing of a street where it crossed railroad tracks and the construction of a tunnel at a different point in order to accommodate traffic (Newton v. New York, etc., R. Co., supra); and the vacation of a country road by which the owner of land abutting thereon was deprived of access to his property (Morris v. Covington County, supra).

The case of Genazzi v. County of Marin, 88 Cal. App. 545, 263 P. 825, concerned the asserted right of an owner of certain ranch property to an injunction by which the supervisors of the county in which such property was located would have been restrained from diverting a stream, so that, instead of the water thereof following its natural course across the highway on which the property abutted, it would be conducted by or through a "wide and deep ditch" along one side of the highway and adjacent to a part of the property in question. It was held that (syllabus):

"While, generally speaking, an abutting land owner on a public highway has a special right of easement and user in the public road for access purposes, and this is a property right of easement which cannot be damaged or taken from him without due compensation, such owner is not entitled, as against the public, to access to his land at all points in the boundary between it and the highway, although entire access cannot be cut off; if he has free and convenient access to his property, and his means of ingress and egress are not substantially interfered with by the public, he has no cause of complaint."

See, also, Lane v. San Diego Elec. Ry. Co., 208 Cal. 29, 33, 280 P. 109; Strehlow v. Mothorn, 100 Cal. App. 692, 699, 280 P. 1021.

Although in the case of Eachus v. Los Angeles, etc., Railway Co., 103 Cal. 614, 37 P. 750, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149, the constitutional provision (article 1, § 14), to the effect that, without just compensation being paid to the owner thereof, private property "shall not be taken or damaged for public use," is construed and a ruling announced in substance that an owner of a city lot which abuts on a public street is entitled to compensation for an injury to his property which results from a change of grade of such street, nevertheless, in the later case of Hayes v. Handley, 182 Cal. 273, 187 P. 952, 955, which, as far as has been pointed out, is the only case in this state where a question similar to that here under consideration was involved, it was held that the construction by a municipal corporation of a traffic tunnel in a city street was a use which might be made of such street without additional compensation being made therefor to the owner of land abutting on the street adjacent to such tunnel. The court further declared that it is well settled that the manner and extent of the public use of a street is not limited by any standards or methods of use in vogue at the time such street was dedicated; and then quoted the following excerpt from the opinion in the case of Montgomery v.

Santa Ana, etc., Co., 104 Cal. 186, 191, 37 P. 786, 25 L. R. A. 654, 43 Am. St. Rep. 89: "* * * We affirm that, when a public street in a city is dedicated to the general use of the public, it involves its use subject to municipal control and limitations for all the uses and purposes of the public as a street, including such methods for the transportation of passengers and freight as modern science and improvements may have rendered necessary, and that the application of these methods, and indeed of those yet to be discovered, must have been contemplated when the street was opened and the right of way obtained, whether by dedication, purchase, or condemnation proceedings, and hence that such a user imposes no new burden or servitude upon the owner of the abutting land."

In addition thereto, Sears v. Crocker, 184 Mass. 586, 69 N. E. 327, 100 Am. St. Rep. 577, which was said to be "a well-considered and carefully reasoned case," was largely drawn upon for reasons in support of the conclusion reached therein that (syllabus): "The construction of a subway and tunnel in the street * * * without a formal taking of land in the streets, is not illegal on the ground that it would impose an additional servitude on lands previously taken for streets, and thus deprive of their property the owners of the fee of the streets." Among other statements contained in the case to which reference has just been had, the following may be noted: "It hardly can be contended that this is an unreasonable mode of using the streets in reference either to travelers or abutters. * * * The necessary requirements of the public for travel were all paid for when the land was taken, * * * and whether the particulars of them were foreseen or not. The only limitation upon them is that they shall be of a kind which is not unreasonable. * * *"

[3] It would appear that the trend of judicial opinion in the matter under consideration is that a general dedication of a street or highway to public use ordinarily is all-inclusive in character, and, at the time such dedication becomes effective, embraces, not only any and every use then known, practiced, or even conjectured either by the general public or by private individuals for the moving, carriage, locomotion, transportation, or conveyance of either persons or property of any kind, but as well includes any other or additional reasonable use either of a similar or of a dissimilar kind, nature, or character which thereafter may be discovered for the benefit or welfare of the traveling public.

Considering the broad character of the legal principle enunciated in the authorities last cited herein, and remembering especially that in the instant case a portion only of the sidewalk in front of but a part of plaintiff's lot is used for the construction of the pedestrian tunnel in question, it would seem apparent that plaintiff had no ground upon which to maintain her action.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elias V. Rosenkranz, Judge.

Action by Emmilie Kennepohl against Cary & Co. and others and the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant last named appeals.

Reversed.

Joe Crider, Jr., and Clarence B. Runkle, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. J. Hughes, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J.

The defendant Cary & Co., a copartnership, was organized in the late fall of 1924. On January 1, 1925, pursuant to paragraph 3, section 5, Corporate Securities Act, as amended in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 90, § 2), Cary & Co., as principal, and the appellant indemnity company, as surety, executed and delivered a bond to the state of California in the penal sum of $5,000. This bond was executed in connection with the issuance by the corporation commissioner, of a license authorizing Cary & Co. to transact business as a securities broker. On June 25, 1925, the plaintiff entered into a transaction with an agent of the Cary Company, whereby she agreed to buy, through said company, seventy-five shares of Pacific Deisel Company's stock at $9.25 per share, at the same time delivering to said company, as security for payment of said stock, five shares of preferred stock and six shares of common stock of the Nicholls Grain & Milling Company. The complaint alleged that plaintiff never received the Pacific Deisel Company's stock, and, further, that the Nicholls Grain & Milling Company stock was never returned to her. The trial court gave judgment against the surety company on its bond for the sum of $785, the value of the Nicholls stock.

The bond under consideration was executed pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 3, section 5, Corporate Securities Act, as amended in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 90, § 2), to the effect that, "upon failure to comply with the provisions of law in so far as the same may apply to any and all transactions carried on by said principal as such broker, the said principal and surety shall be liable to any and all persons who may suffer loss by reason thereof."

In 1925, the Legislature enacted an amendment to paragraph 3, section 5 of the Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1925, pp. 962, 967, § 3), which added to the liabilities of the surety, upon a bond given thereunder, that of guaranteeing the honest and faithful application of all funds received, and the faithful and honest performance of all obligations and undertakings in the purchase or sale of securities by said broker, etc., and the respondent, in support of the judgment of the trial court, maintains that the transaction here involved is governed by the provisions of the said 1925 amendment.

[1] The 1925 amendment to the Corporate Securities Act was approved on May 23, 1925, and took effect ninety days after the Legislature adjourned, to wit, July 24, 1925. It would appear, therefore, that the 1925 amendment to the Corporate Securities Act does not apply to the situation now before this court, for the reason that the bond was executed and the transaction complained of took place prior to the effective date of the 1925 amendment.

[2] "The broker's bond given pursuant to the Corporate Securities Act, as it existed prior to the amendment of 1925, has been held not to cover cases of breach of contract, conversion, or misappropriation. Mitchell v. Smith, 204 Cal. 197, 267 P. 540; Blumenthal v. Larson, 79 Cal. App. 726, 251 P. 241; Anthony v. Van, 96 Cal. App. 523, 274 P. 563." Giles v. Welling, 100 Cal. App. 515, 516, 280 P. 539.

In view of the cases above cited, we are of the opinion that the amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the appellant surety company. Having reached this conclusion, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the other points raised by the appellant.

The judgment is reversed.

This is an action arising out of a transaction wherein the following are the principal items: (a) An option, by Jennie B. Doane, owner, to W. Ross Campbell Company, to purchase a two-thirds undivided interest in described real property; (b) an assignment of the option, by optionee to plaintiffs; (c) notice to defendant Doane of exercise of right to purchase under the terms of the option, and that "escrow has been made" with the Title Insurance and Trust Company; (d) delivery of check for $5,000, by plaintiffs to said title company, as a deposit on said option, but to be used in accordance with written instructions concurrently delivered and which were signed by the plaintiffs; (e) demand by plaintiffs, for return of the $5,000, and compliance refused by the title company.

Thereafter, plaintiffs having commenced this action against the Title Insurance & Trust Company to recover said sum of $5,000, the money was deposited in court by said defendant (in accordance with section 386, Code of Civil Procedure), and Jennie B. Doane was substituted as defendant. Thereafter, by answer, Mrs. Doane pleaded the facts relied upon by her to establish her claim to said money. From judgment entered in favor of plaintiffs, the defendant Doane appeals.

The findings of the court adequately cover the issues raised by the pleadings. The court found as follows:

"I. That on the 23rd day of February, 1928, plaintiffs deposited with the Title Insurance and Trust Company, a corporation, the original defendant herein, the sum of $5000.00, with instructions executed concurrently therewith, which provided that said sum of money was to be held and used by said Title Insurance and Trust Company in the manner and in accordance with instructions to be executed and delivered by the plaintiffs to said defendant; that pursuant thereto, and in furtherance thereof, and as a part of said transaction, and for the purpose of controlling the disposition of said sum and the manner in which the same could be used by the Title Insurance and Trust Company, or any other person, the plaintiffs made, executed and delivered further written instructions which provided that in the event the said Title Insurance and Trust Company was unable, by the 24th day of March, 1928, to issue and deliver its Guarantee or Policy of Title Insurance showing the title to certain property therein described to be vested in C. M. Widess and David Tierstein as to an undivided two-thirds thereof and Liberty

Mortgage Company, Henry G. Bodkin and John F. Sheran as to an undivided one-third thereof, free from encumbrances except the second installment of taxes for the fiscal year 1927–1928, that then and in such event, the said Title Insurance and Trust Company was to return to the plaintiff, on demand, said sum of $5,000.00 deposited as aforesaid.

"II. That on and prior to the 24th day of March, 1928, there existed numerous judgments against said John F. Sheran and by reason thereof, the Title Insurance and Trust Company was unable and unwilling to write or deliver its Guarantee or Policy of Title Insurance assuring to the plaintiffs herein the title as aforesaid.

"III. That thereupon and after the 24th day of March, 1928, the plaintiffs made demand upon the Title Insurance and Trust Company for a return of said sum of $5,000.00 but said Title Insurance and Trust Company did not pay said sum to the plaintiffs, or any part thereof.

"IV. That after the commencement of this action the Title Insurance and Trust Company filed its answer herein, showing conflicting claims to said fund by reason of the fact that one Jennie B. Doane made claim to said fund and thereupon, said Jennie B. Doane was substituted as party defendant herein, and pursuant to order of Court, the said Title Insurance and Trust Company caused to be deposited said sum of $5,000.00 with the County Clerk of Los Angeles County and said fund is now on deposit with the County Clerk of Los Angeles County.

"V. That on the 17th day of February, 1928 the substituted defendant, Jennie B. Doane, made, executed and delivered a certain option in writing to W. Ross Campbell Company and said W. Ross Campbell Company did on the 23rd day of February, 1928, assign said option to the plaintiffs herein; that on the said 23rd day of February, 1928, the plaintiffs herein caused to be delivered to said Jennie B. Doane, an instrument in writing wherein they stated that the option aforesaid had been assigned to them and was exercised in accordance with and subject to the terms thereof, as is more particularly in said letter, heretofore received in evidence, set forth.

"VI. That it is not true that on the said 23rd day of February, 1928, or at any other time, plaintiffs paid to the said Title Insurance and Trust Company, pursuant to the terms and conditions of said option and purchase contract, and/or for the use and benefit of said Jennie B. Doane, and/or to be applied on the purchase contract of said real estate, the said sum of $5,000.00 aforesaid and it is true that said sum of $5,000.00 aforesaid, was paid to the Title Insurance and Trust Company, pursuant to and in accordance with the escrow instructions hereinbefore referred to, and that the disposition thereof was governed and controlled by said escrow instructions and not by any other instrument whatsoever."

It may be conceded that, at the time when the plaintiffs deposited the money with the escrow holder and gave the escrow instructions, the option given by appellant to the assignor of plaintiffs had ripened into a contract of purchase and sale of the property described in the option papers. It may further be conceded that, under the terms of the agreement, the vendor had not obligated herself to see that the one-third interest of Liberty Mortgage Company et al., in said real property should be free from incumbrance. Nevertheless, the plaintiffs, in said escrow instructions, in direct terms and without including any explanation of the reason therefor, authorized the escrow holder to use the deposited money with "your escrow No. 1049125" when the escrow holder could issue its guaranty certificate showing record title vested in the plaintiffs as to an undivided two-thirds of the property and in the other parties named as to an undivided one-third, free from incumbrances (with the exception of certain tax items, etc.). It was stipulated in the instructions that time was of the essence thereof and that if on or before March 24, 1928, the title company was unable to comply with the instructions and the plaintiffs had complied therewith, then all money deposited by the plaintiffs should be returned to them on their written demand. It is an undisputed fact that the title of the owners of the one-third interest was incumbered by judgment liens and for that reason the title company was unable to comply with said escrow instructions within the time limited.

[1-5] In this case we are not concerned with any rights which appellant may have or assert against respondents by reason of any breach of their contract of purchase of appellant's interest in said real property. The only question here relates to the right of the plaintiffs to have said sum of $5,000 returned to them. And that right must be determined as of the time of the commencement of this action, when the plaintiffs filed their complaint against the Title Insurance & Trust Company. If respondents were then entitled to judgment against the title company, they are now entitled to such judgment against the substituted defendant. Money deposited by a vendee with an escrow holder, under such instructions as were given by respondents in this case, was not deposited with the escrow holder for the account of the vendor at the time when the deposit was made, but was only to be so applied when the title company could secure for the vendee the described guaranty certificate. Pending the procurement of the title guaranty, the escrow holder held the money in trust for the vendee and the vendor had no claim to it. Hildebrand v. Beck, 196 Cal. 141, 145, 236 P. 301, 39 A. L. R. 1076.

In substance, the grounds of appeal relied upon by appellant are all presented on the assumption that the money claimed by appellant was paid into escrow for her benefit, under a contract which entitled her to payment of the purchase price for her interest in the land; and it is contended that, since she had a good and unencumbered title to an undivided two-thirds interest in said land and had complied with her agreement, she was entitled to have paid over to her the said $5,000 deposit. But as we have shown, the money paid into the hands of the escrow holder could not be deemed to be paid in "for her benefit" until the conditions for payment to her, as set forth in the escrow instructions, were fulfilled. Those conditions never were fulfilled. It has not been alleged or proved that the requirements written into the escrow instructions by the respondents were fraudulently placed therein, or concealed from appellant. If she did not read said instructions at the time when she deposited her deed with the escrow holder, that omission was the result of her own negligence, and does not change the controlling fact that, so far as the deposit of money in escrow is concerned, the depositors had the right to withdraw said money in accordance with the terms of said escrow instructions.

The judgment is affirmed.

Percy Napton, of Woodland, for appellant.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment and order of life imprisonment imposed on the defendant upon conviction of two felonies and three prior convictions of felonies formerly committed by him.

By means of an information filed in Yolo county the defendant was charged with four separate felonies, together with three prior convictions of other felonies. To each of these charges of prior convictions of felonies he pleaded guilty. To each of the major felonies charged in the information he pleaded not guilty. To each of these last-mentioned charges he also pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity. The second and third alleged offenses charged in the information were dismissed for lack of evidence. Upon trial the jury rendered separate verdicts finding the defendant guilty, (1) of lewd and lascivious conduct in violation of section 288 of the Penal Code, and (2) guilty of the infamous crime against nature in violation of section 286 of the same Code. The jury also rendered separate verdicts finding the defendant sane at the times of the commission of the two last-mentioned offenses. The defendant was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison at Folsom for the term of his natural life without the benefit of parole. From this judgment the defendant has appealed.

The appellant contends that section 644 of the Penal Code, pursuant to the terms of which he was sentenced, is ex post facto and unconstitutional since it purports to increase the penalty by depriving the accused of the benefit of prison credits for good behavior and by denying him the right of parole on account of the three former convictions of felonies. This challenged statute reads, in part: "Every person convicted in this state of any felony who shall have been previously three times convicted, either in this state or elsewhere, of any felony, shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than life and shall not be eligible to parole."

The defendant also contends that these added penalties to the punishment of an habitual criminal are in conflict with article 1, section 6, of the Constitution of California, which provides, in part: "Nor shall cruel or unusual punishment be inflicted."

The appellant argues that depriving an habitual criminal of the benefit of prison credits for good behavior and denying him the right of parole are contrary to the spirit of modern legislation and that this innovation strikes a death blow to the spirit of prison reform. No other points are raised on this appeal.

[1-3] There is no merit in these contentions. Section 644 of the Penal Code is not ex post facto in its application nor unconstitutional on account of its alleged increase of punishment prescribed for an habitual criminal because of former convictions. Ex parte Gutierrez, 45 Cal. 429; People v. Rosencrantz, 95 Cal. App. 92, 272 P. 786; People v. James, 71 Cal. App. 374, 235 P. 81; Cooley's Cons. Lim. (7th Ed.) 382. Nor is this provision of the statute in violation of the inhibition of the Constitution prohibiting the inflicting of cruel and unusual punishment. In re Rosencrantz, 205 Cal. 534, 271 P. 902, 904. This last-cited authority is a complete answer to every contention made by the appellant on this appeal. The opinion reads: "Neither can it be said that the deprival of petitioner of the right to parole is either cruel or unusual. It has only been at a comparatively recent date in the history of our state that any prisoner has been granted the favor of parole. The right to parole is simply a favor granted by the people of the state to those committed to our penal institutions as punishment for crime. The withholding of this favor by the Legislature from any particular class of criminals cannot be said to inflict upon those from whom the privilege has been denied a punishment either cruel or unusual. The granting or withholding of the privilege of parole to any particular class of prisoners is largely a matter of expediency which is left to the lawmaking branch of our government, and the courts will not interfere with the Legislature in the exercise of such power."

The parole and credit systems were enacted to encourage the reformation of criminals. There is good reason to assume the reformation of habitual criminals is comparatively hopeless. Having been thrice previously convicted of felonies, it is probable the criminal habit of one is so firmly fixed that he is likely to follow a life of crime. Under such circumstances, greater care is necessary to protect society against the criminal tendencies of such a lawless individual. The chief purpose of imposing a penalty for crime is to deter the accused and others from the commission of similar offenses. Habitual criminals require more stringent means of restraining them from their criminal tendencies than first offenders. There is sound reason for the enforcement of added penalties for the perpetration of felonies by habitual criminals. The law is not unconstitutional.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Robert B. Lambert, Judge.

Action by James I. Graves and another against the Kern County Transportation Corporation and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, Theodore Hale, of San Francisco, and Siemon & Garber, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Rowen Irwin and Aldrich & Mack, all of Bakersfield, for respondents.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an action in which the plaintiffs seek to recover damages for the death of their son, caused by a motor vehicle accident. The accident occurred in the city of Bakersfield, in a subway under the Santa Fé Railroad tracks, on Union avenue, a paved street which runs north and south. The bottom of the subway is flat for eighty feet, and the ascent on either side is 300 feet long from the level of the bottom to the street level above, the grade on these ascents being about 5 per cent. At a point on the east side of the north incline, about one hundred feet up the slope from the beginning of the ascent and twelve feet east of the east edge of the pavement, on the night here in question, there was a hole about four feet long, north and south, three feet wide, and one and one-half feet deep. The twelve feet from the pavement to this hole was a gradual rise, and from the hole on, the slope of the bank sharply ascended to the ground level. The hole was, in fact, one in the bank, having been made by the water washing part of the bank away at that point. This accident occurred about 8 o'clock in the evening of September 8, 1929, while the pavement was wet from a recent rain. One Walter L. Lawrence, an automobile salesman, was demonstrating a Hudson automobile to plaintiffs' son, and they were accompanied by five mutual friends. The Hudson car was proceeding north on Union avenue, and the testimony shows it stalled about five blocks south of the subway, but was again started in some manner not appearing from the evidence. About the time it reached the entrance to the subway, the car again stalled. Five of the men, including Graves and Lawrence, alighted. Lawrence testified that he

---

⇒For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes told the driver that they would give the car a push and if it started to run, to pull up on the hill on the other side and wait for them. The car was given a push and the motor started. One witness testified that the motor started before the car reached the entrance to the subway, and that it entered the subway on its own power. Another witness thought the engine may not have started until the car was ten or twelve feet along the descending slope. The car stalled again in the bottom of the subway, and the five men walked down to it and attempted to push it on through. However, one of the men, McBride, went back about thirty feet for the purpose of flagging approaching cars. He succeded in flagging three cars, one of which came to a stop and the other two slowed down and went around the stalled car. Subsequently a stage, owned by one of the defendants and driven by the other, entered the subway from the south. McBride tried to flag this stage, but when he saw it was not going to stop, he shouted a warning to the others that they were going to be hit. Two cars with bright headlights were entering the north incline of the subway, so that the stage could not pass to the left of the Hudson. By this time the Hudson, which was being pushed, had reached a point on the pavement directly opposite the hole above referred to. The driver of the stage, in attempting to pass on the dirt to the right of the Hudson, ran into the hole and the stage tipped over against the Hudson. The Hudson was hit about fifteen feet back from the front of the stage, which was twenty-five feet long. The son of the plaintiffs was killed, and this action resulted. The jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiffs for $15,000. A motion for a new trial was denied upon the condition that $8,000 of this be remitted, which was done, and this appeal is from a judgment for $7,000, which followed.

[1, 2] Appellants' first point is that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict of the jury as to negligence upon their part which proximately caused the injuries complained of. It is argued that there is no evidence to show excessive speed or other negligence; that the driver of the stage testified that he entered the subway at twenty miles an hour; that he did not see the Hudson until within twenty feet of it; that he was then going about fifteen miles per hour; that he was unable to pass to the left of the Hudson because of approaching automobiles; and that he thought there was room to pass to the right of the Hudson, between that machine and the bank. On the other hand, McBride, who had gone back to flag approaching cars, testified that other approaching cars either stopped or slowed down sufficiently to pass, and that he tried to stop the stage, without success; and that the stage was traveling forty-five or fifty miles an hour when it passed him. Appellants point out that he was not a good judge of speed, as he testified at the coroner's inquest, "No; I'm not what you would call a good judge of speed but it was going very fast." While this might affect the weight of his evidence, that argument is one for the jury. One of appellants' witnesses (Keck) testified that just as he was entering the south slope of the subway in a Ford coupe, at about twenty-five miles an hour, the stage passed him and proceeded down the incline. The driver of the stage testified that he did not apply his brakes as he descended the slope, but that when he first saw the Hudson, when about twenty feet therefrom, he put his car in second speed and set his brakes. If McBride's testimony could be disregarded, it still appears from the evidence that a stage, twenty-five feet in length, traveling at a rate of speed sufficient to pass another car going twenty-five miles an hour, entered a decline of 5 per cent grade which was 300 feet long, passed down the same without its brakes being applied, and crossed over a level strip eighty feet in length; that it then proceeded up more than 100 feet of ascending 5 per cent grade; that during the last thirty-five feet of this (the front of the car having passed fifteen feet beyond the Hudson) the car was in second gear with its brakes set; that it then stopped because its wheels dropped in a hole a foot and a half deep; and that it then struck the Hudson with sufficient force to knock it fifteen feet farther up the grade. With such evidence in the record it can hardly be said, as a matter of law, that the stage was running through a subway, over a wet pavement, at a moderate and lawful speed, and that there is no evidence to sustain a different conclusion reached by a jury. In Davis v. Brown, 92 Cal. App. 20, 267 P. 754, 757, the court said: "A wet pavement downgrade in a tunnel certainly calls for the exercise of a degree of care that must be measured only by the circumstances and conditions presented, and not by any limited mileage per hour set forth in the Motor Vehicle Act. * * *" The driver testified that he was hindered from seeing by the wet weather; that the lights are always bad in wet weather; that the reflection of the lights on the pavement is always bad in wet weather; and that he was blinded by approaching lights and did not see the Hudson until within twenty feet of it. Whether this constituted negligence, under the circumstances, was a question for the jury. Skaggs v. Willhour (Cal. Sup.) 292 P. 649. The witness Keck, who was riding with his brother-in-law in a Ford coupé, at the south entrance to the subway, testified that they slowed down after the stage passed them, and also: "I told my brother-in-law, 'hold 'er.' I seen the other car up on ahead and I says, 'hold 'er.' I figured he could not get by because it looked like the other car was standing still there." While the driver of the stage testified that he did not see the Hudson in time to stop, this evidence of Keck, who apparently was in a less favorable position to see than was the driver of the stage, was sufficient to enable the jury to conclude that the driver of the stage was negligent in not seeing the Hudson before he did. At another time, the driver testified that he saw the Hudson just as he left the flat bottom of the subway and began to ascend the incline, which would have placed him about one hundred feet from the Hudson. He also testified that he could have stopped his car in from thirty-five to thirty-seven feet. Whether he should have stopped his car, after he saw the Hudson, was another question for the jury. We are unable to agree with appellants' contention that there is no substantial evidence from which a jury could have inferred negligence upon their part, and we think the facts pointed out and relied upon by them show no more than a conflict in the evidence.

[3-8] Appellants next contend that the evidence, in three different aspects, shows contributory negligence upon the part of the deceased. It is first argued that since the deceased and his companions knew that the Hudson car had stalled twice within five blocks of the entrance to the subway, it was contributory negligence, as a matter of law, for them to have started the car down into the subway. It is only where the deduction to be drawn from the evidence is inevitably one way or the other, that the question of contributory negligence is to be withdrawn from the jury. Wise v. Maxwell Hardware Co., 94 Cal. App. 765, 271 P. 918. In this point, appellants infer that the car was pushed into the subway while the engine was not running. While the car was pushed to start the engine, one of the party, Fred P. Thaddeus, testified that the engine started before it reached the descent and that the car entered the subway on its own power. Be that as it may, the car was in charge of the automobile salesman, who was demonstrating it, and another man who was driving it. They may have known the car stopped on these two occasions because of the way it was adjusted, or because of some defect which caused it to stop when it was slowed down too much, but which never appeared when the car was being given the gas. Such an experience is not unknown to automobile drivers. They may have had reason to believe that the trouble was not to be expected to repeat itself in the next seven hundred feet, even though they had to pass over an incline with a grade of 5 per cent. It could hardly be held as a matter of law that they were guilty of negligence. Even if it could be so held, there is nothing in the evidence to attribute this negligence to the deceased, as a matter of law. He was neither driving the car nor in charge of it. He is neither shown to have suggested proceeding through the tunnel, nor conclusively shown to have taken part in conveying the car into the tunnel. In fact, we think there is no evidence to show that he actually took part in pushing the car in order to start it. Whether, as a passenger, he did anything that a reasonable man would not have done, is a question of fact and not of law. Moreover, if negligence in connection with starting the car into the subway could be imputed to him, as a matter of law, whether this was the proximate cause of the accident presents another question of fact. After the car again stalled in the bottom of the subway and the party again attempted to push it along the highway, a flagman was sent back to warn approaching cars. So far as shown by the evidence, this was successfully done in the case of every car approaching except the stage in question, and the question whether the driver of the stage was guilty of negligence in passing the flagman and in his manner of operating the stage through the subway, and the question whether such actions on his part were or were not the proximate cause of the accident, were questions of fact for the jury.

[9] It is next argued that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, in standing behind the Hudson without taking adequate precaution for his own safety. The evidence shows that some of the party were at the side of the Hudson while pushing it and there is no evidence in the record to show that the deceased was in the rear of the car. A flagman had been sent back, who succeeded in stopping other cars, and who tried to stop the stage. Some precaution being shown, the question of whether or not it was adequate under the conditions shown, was for the jury.

[10] A third argument is that contributory negligence on the part of the deceased is conclusively shown by the fact that no lights on the rear of the Hudson were visible. In the first place, the evidence on this point is conflicting. While there was testimony that the lights were not seen, there is other testimony that they were burning, and the stage driver's statement that the bodies of men behind the Hudson obscured the light, is contradicted by the testimony of McBride, who testified as follows:

> "A. Well, there were some on the right side pushing and some of them on the rear of the car pushing and about the middle.
> "Q. Were any of them in such a position as to obscure the tail light? A. No, the tail light was not obscured."

Even if it were true that the tail-light was obstructed by some person, there is no evidence that this was done by the deceased, or that he had anything to do with causing it to be obstructed.

Not only does a conflict in the evidence appear, as to each of these contentions, but we find no evidence in the record to show that the deceased, as a passenger, did anything that could be conclusively held to be other than would have been done by a reasonable man, under the circumstances. Under the facts shown, the question of contributory negligence was one for the jury.

[11] Appellants next complain of the refusal of the court to give the following instruction on contributory negligence: "Negligence in any degree on the part of the deceased, Howard W. Graves, amounting to a want of ordinary care, which operating concurrently with the negligence of the defendants, if any, contributed proximately to the accident in question, bars a recovery in this action by the plaintiffs, and this is so whether or not the defendants or either of them could have guarded against it by the exercise of ordinary care." It is first contended that this was not otherwise covered, as there was no clear and adequate definition of contributory negligence in the other instructions. In Metcalfe v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 63 Cal. App. 331, 218 P. 486, 487, the court said: "Taking all the instructions together, it was not necessary specifically to define the term 'contributory negligence.' The sum total of the instructions gave to the members of the jury everything that a specific definition could have conveyed to their minds." An instruction practically the same as that quoted in the case just cited, was given in the instant case, in which, after defining negligence and the rules to be followed in determining the issue of negligence, the court instructed the jury that if they found that the greater weight of all the evidence was in favor of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, they should accept such contributory negligence as a proved fact; otherwise, they should find that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence. The court then went on to instruct the jury that in order to find a verdict for the plaintiff, they must not only find from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was negligent, but that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury; and must further find that the evidence fails to show by a preponderance thereof, that the deceased was guilty of negligence contributing proximately to the injury. In this and three other instructions, the jury was plainly told that if they found that the deceased was guilty of any negligence which proximately contributed to the injury, the plaintiffs could not recover. Taking all of the instructions together, it fully appears that contributory negligence was as plainly defined as if a formal definition had been given, and so far as constituting a definition thereof, the requested instruction is no better or clearer than the instructions given. In the second place, the appellants insist that the jury was not otherwise instructed that negligence "in any degree" on the part of the deceased would constitute contributory negligence. The jury was adequately instructed in that regard in an instruction which contained the following: "* * * Before you will be justified in finding a verdict against the defendant * * * you should also be convinced by a preponderance of the evidence * * * that the deceased was not guilty of any negligence proximately contributing to said accident."

This sufficiently covered that portion of the requested instruction and was sufficient in connection with the other instructions given. Sinclair v. Pioneer Truck Co., 51 Cal. App. 174, 196 P. 281; Power v. Crown Stage Co., 82 Cal. App. 660, 256 P. 457.

[12] Appellants next complain of the refusal of the trial court to give the following instruction: "I charge you that a person when suddenly confronted with danger is not to be held to the strict degree of accountability for their acts that they would be under ordinary circumstances, and in judging whether or not the driver of the stage exercised ordinary care as required of him his actions were to be measured by the facts and circumstances as they would have appeared to a reasonably prudent man in the exercise of the highest degree of care; and the fact that he might have taken some other course and thus avoided the accident, when viewed from the circumstances discovered later, would not be negligence on his part, simply because he chose the wrong course to avoid a danger then open and apparent to him."

This instruction left out of consideration the fact that the rule therein set forth applies where a person, without his own fault, finds himself in a position of apparent and sudden peril. Offerdahl v. Motor Transit Co., 80 Cal. App. 667, 252 P. 773; Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066. Appellants argue that this instruction should have been given in the instant case because the defendant driver was proved to have been proceeding at a moderate rate of speed, and without negligence. As we have heretofore pointed out, there was ample evidence to the contrary and that fact cannot be taken to have been established. There being evidence tending to show that the driver's perilous position was due to his own negligence, the omission from the instruction of the element of freedom from fault on the part of appellants was alone sufficient ground for its rejection. Brooks v. City of Monterey (Cal. App.) 290 P. 540. In the form given, the instruction was not proper, because one of the questions before the jury, under the evidence, was whether or not the driver of the stage was negligent prior to the time he saw the Hudson car, and the issue was not entirely the question of his conduct thereafter. Vedder v. Bireley, 92 Cal. App. 52, 267 P. 724. A further consideration is that the jury was repeatedly instructed that appellants were not liable unless they themselves had been guilty of negligence and had done what no prudent or reasonable man would have done, under the circumstances.

[13-16] Error is next claimed because of three instructions which the trial court refused to give, which were as follows:

"(a) If you find that the injury to Howard W. Graves was unavoidable on the part of the defendant Haworth, then you must find for the defendants. In other words, if the accident happened without negligence on the part of defendant Haworth, then the plaintiff cannot recover in this action."

"(b) If from the evidence you believe that at any time before the accident in question, by the exercise of ordinary care the deceased, Howard W. Graves, could have remained or placed himself in a position of safety had he known of the approaching automobile of defendants, and if you further believe that he could have known of the approaching of said automobile by exercising his sense of sight or hearing, then I charge you that the plaintiffs in this case cannot recover damages from the defendants."

"(c) If you believe from the evidence in this case that the deceased, Howard W. Graves, was not exercising ordinary care at the time and place in question, and that but for this failure to use ordinary care on the part of the deceased the accident would have been avoided, then the plaintiff in this action cannot recover and your verdict must be in favor of the defendants."

Not only does the evidence in this case fail to warrant such an instruction as the first of these, but the main purport thereof is covered by two instructions in which the jury were told that in order to find a verdict for the plaintiff, they must find from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was negligent; that this negligence was the proximate cause of the injury; that this negligence could not be presumed but must be proved; and that unless they were satisfied from the evidence that the defendants were negligent, and that the deceased was free from contributory negligence, then their verdict must be for the defendants. The second of these instructions overlooks the fact that the deceased was a pedestrian at the time he was injured, and that the law did not necessarily compel him to look behind him for approaching cars. Devecchio v. Ricketts, 66 Cal. App. 334, 226 P. 11. It also ignores the duty of the driver of the stage to have avoided the accident if he could. Furtado v. Bird, 26 Cal. App. 152, 146 P. 58. In addition, this was covered by other instructions by which the jury was told that if the deceased was negligent in any respect which contributed to his injury, the plaintiffs could not recover. The third of these instructions merely restates the matter of contributory negligence, and was covered by at least three other instructions, two of which were given at the request of appellants. In our opinion, the jury was fully and fairly instructed as to all issues submitted to them.

The judgment is affirmed.

YORK, J.

The appellant raises two points: First, that the evidence is insufficient to sustain or justify the conviction; and, second, that the court erred in matters of law in instructing the jury.

Eliminating the evidence of the admitted accomplices, there is ample and sufficient evidence to sustain the conviction. The court by its instructions left to the jury the question as to whether or not certain of the witnesses were accomplices, and properly instructed the jury in defining an accomplice, and properly gave to the jury the limitations affecting the evidence of an accomplice.

We can find no error in the given instructions, and the principal objections raised by appellant as to the refusal of the court to give the instructions offered by him are fully met by the fact that such instructions, as requested, were given to the jury in so far as they were proper or applicable to the evidence introduced.

The judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

CLUTTER v. SAME.

1. Contracts ⚷129(2).

Contract to pay witness for testifying, contingent on success of litigation, is against public policy.

> Such contracts are against public policy, since they offer inducement to perjury, and tend to prevent administration of justice.

2. Contracts ⚷129(1).

Contract of class tending to prevent administration of justice will be declared void, although in particular instance no injury to public resulted.

> Test of validity is evil tendency of contract, not its actual injury to public in particular instance, that is, its validity is determined by general tendency at time it was made, regardless of good intent of parties and absence of injury to public in particular case.

3. Contracts ⚷129(2).

Contract, made while jury in will contest were deliberating, to pay witnesses stated sum if contracting litigants won their case, held invalid as against public policy.

> Although contract was entered into after testimony had been given and jury had retired, payment was contingent on litigants winning their case and receiving money from estate, and, in event of granting of new trial or reversal, witnesses would be called on again to testify, thus exposing them to temptation of perjury, against which rule declaring such contracts to be against public policy is directed.

Affirmed.

Lewis & Lehman and Walter L. Case, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Redwine & Redwine, Anderson & Anderson, and Edward K. Sheahan, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem.

These two cases have been consolidated on appeal because they involve complaints based upon identical facts and contain identical allegations. Demurrers were sustained to the amended complaints in each case, and appeals are prosecuted from the judgments which followed.

The complaints in substance allege that plaintiffs and appellants were witnesses to a certain will, and were called as witnesses at the trial of the contest of such will before a jury, at which trial they were in attendance for about three weeks, that they had not received their witness' fees, and that, after the case had gone to the jury, and while the jury was deliberating, they demanded their witness' fees, and that defendants then stated to plaintiffs "that if they would waive all claim against defendants for their fees while attending court at said trial, if the verdict of the jury then out would be returned favorable to defendants, and if they won their case, that defendants would upon receiving their money from the estate pay to" plaintiffs the sum of $10,000 each. It is further alleged that this offer was accepted and the witness' fees waived, that the jury returned a verdict favorable to defendants herein, and that the will was accordingly admitted to probate and the defendants received from the estate a sum in excess of $200,000, and that they paid to each plaintiff the sum of $2,000 and no more.

[1-3] The sole question presented on appeal is whether the contract as alleged is against public policy and therefore void. It is well settled that a contract to pay a witness for testifying where the payment is made contingent upon the success of the litigation is against public policy, since such a contract offers an inducement to perjury and tends to prevent the administration of justice. Dawkins v. Gill, 10 Ala. 206; Laffin v. Billington (Sup.) 86 N. Y. S. 267; Bowling v. Blum (Tex. Civ. App.) 52 S. W. 97; Davis v. Smoot, 176 N. C. 538, 97 S. E. 488; Keown & McEvoy v. Verlin, 253 Mass. 374, 149 N. E. 115, 41 A. L. R. 1319; Sherman v. Burton, 165 Mich. 293, 130 N. W. 667, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 87; 13 C. J. pp. 448, 449; 6 R. C. L. p. 756. Appellants contend that the foregoing rule has no application to the contract here because the contract was entered into after their testimony had been given and the jury had retired, and hence the evil against which the rule is invoked did not exist. The payment, however, was made contingent upon defendants winning their case and receiving the money from the estate, and, in the event of the granting of a motion for new trial or a reversal on appeal, appellants would be called upon to testify again, in which event the temptation to perjury against which the rule is directed would exist. "Where a contract belongs to this class, it will be declared void, although in the particular instance no injury to the public may have resulted. In other words its validity is determined by its general tendency at the time it is made, and if this is opposed to the interests of the public it will be invalid, even though the intent of the parties was good and no injury to the public would result in the particular case. The test is the evil tendency of the contract and not its actual injury to the public in a particular instance." 13 C. J. p. 425. Measured by this standard, we must hold the contract set out in the complaints invalid.

Judgments affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

The issues presented by the first cause of action of defendant's amended cross-complaint and plaintiff's answer thereto were tried before a jury pursuant to stipulation of the parties. By his cross-complaint defendant sought to recover from plaintiff damages for breach of a certain "Land Lease and Agreement" hereinafter set forth. The trial resulted in a judgment in favor of defendant and cross-complainant for approximately $36,000, from which judgment plaintiff and cross-defendant appeals.

The instrument above referred to was executed by the parties on August 20, 1921, and reads as follows:

"Land Lease and Agreement

"August 20, 1921.

"This agreement made this 20th day of August, 1921, between Peter Barnes, party of the first part, and R. V. Cocke, party of the second part, both of Los Angeles, State of California, Witnesseth: that in consideration of one-third (1/3) of the crop completely harvested and marketed the party of the first part agrees to rent to the party of the second part for five years (5) commencing from date and the party of the second part agrees to rent the following described land: the west forty (40) acres more or less of his ranch near Downey known as the Barnes ranch for consideration of two-thirds (2/3) of the crop.

"The party of the second part agrees to plant the entire tract in trees before March 1st, 1922, and put the land in good shape before planting the trees, keep the trees in good shape and growing for five (5) years.

"The land can be sold at any time during the life of this contract upon the mutual agreement of both parties, the price not to be less than eight hundred dollars ($800.) per acre. If a sale of the land is made during the life of this contract the party of the first part is to receive five hundred dollars (500) per acre and additional to this amount is to receive the full amount of the cost of the pipe and the trees with seven (7) per cent interest to start from date of purchase of pipe and trees. The remainder of the profits to be divided equally between the parties.

"The party of the second part shall not sublease, let, or underlease the land described within this contract, without the written consent of the party of the first part, and at the termination of five (5) years if the land is not sold the parties will have the land appraised by disinterested parties. The party of the first part will select his own appraiser and the party of the second part will select his own appraiser. These two appraisers will select a third appraiser jointly.

"If the land herein described is not sold during the life of this contract a settlement may be made between the parties by the party of the second part taking his profits in land adjoining his ranch now owned by him. This adjoining land to be taken by the party of the second part as his profits shall be appraised separate from the remainder of the land.

"If the party of the second part fails to comply with all the provisions in the above contract it becomes void and the party of the first part can enter into and take possession of the land described within this contract. This contract binds their heirs and assigns.

"Peter Barnes,
"Party of the First Part.
"R. V. Cocke,
"Party of the Second Part.
"Witness: Margaret J. Cocke."

The premises referred to adjoined other land belonging to plaintiff and also adjoined land belonging to defendant. Under the foregoing agreement, defendant entered into possession. The land had not been cultivated for some time and defendant proceeded "to put the land in good shape before planting the trees," as provided. Plaintiff furnished the trees which were planted by defendant. Crops were grown upon the land each year and from time to time the parties adjusted their accounts under the provisions of the agreement relating to crops. Many difficulties were encountered. The testimony showed that the trees furnished by plaintiff were not in good condition when delivered to defendant for planting; shortage of water made it impossible to obtain sufficient water at the time required; various pests, such as Johnson grass, nematodes, and crown gall were present. Defendant, nevertheless, continued caring for the orchard, replanting trees where necessary and growing crops as directed by plaintiff. The parties were frequently together and discussed the existing conditions which were of mutual concern to both of them. Defendant appears to have worked the land industriously and no objection was voiced to his performance of the terms of the agreement until shortly before the expiration of the lease. Some time prior thereto plaintiff had advised defendant that he had sold the land for $2,000 per acre and that defendant's share in the profits would be $45,000. This sale was never consummated. On February 5, 1926, six months prior to the expiration of the five years, plaintiff wrote to defendant advising him that he declared "said agreement null and void and terminated on account of your failure to keep and perform the terms thereof," specifying certain alleged failures on the part of defendant to perform under the agreement. Thereafter on July 23, 1926, and prior to the expiration of the five years, plaintiff filed his complaint for cancellation and rescission of the agreement. Plaintiff refused to appoint an appraiser or otherwise recognize any further rights of defendant under the agreement. After the expiration of the five years, defendant filed his cross-complaint alleging performance on his part, plaintiff's failure to perform, and sought damages for the alleged breach of the agreement on the part of plaintiff, alleging that the value of the land at the termination of the lease was $3,000 per acre. By his answer to the cross-complaint plaintiff denied performance on the part of defendant, denied any breach on the part of plaintiff and denied that the land was worth in excess of $1,000 per acre. There were other allegations in the cross-complaint and answer thereto, some of which allegations will be hereinafter referred to.

It may be observed that the agreement above set forth is incomplete and is obviously vague and indefinite in many respects. A casual reading of its terms can lead to no other conclusion. In the cross-complaint respondent alleged that the written agreement was incomplete and respondent set forth what he claimed to be the entire agreement of the parties including the agreement by appellant to furnish the trees, pipe line and water for irrigating all crops and trees on the premises. It was further alleged that the tract of "40 acres more or less" was in fact a tract of 50 acres. Some of the allegations of the cross-complaint were admitted and others denied. Evidence was admitted by the court in support of these allegations, and much of this evidence was admitted without objection.

Appellant contends: First, that the verdict was contrary to the uncontradicted evidence; second, that the court erred in the giving and refusing of instructions to the jury; and, third, that the court erred in its rulings on evidence.

[1-5] Under the first contention appellant argues that as the evidence failed to show a sale of the land during the five years covered by the agreement, respondent was not entitled to recover any profit from the increased value of the land at the end of the five years. We cannot agree with appellant in this construction of the agreement. It clearly appears that the parties intended that respondent should share not only in the crops raised, but also in the increased value of the land. If sold during the life of the agreement, it was provided that the parties should share the profits over a certain amount; if not sold during the life of the agreement, it was provided that a settlement be made by respondent taking his profits in land adjoining his ranch. For this purpose it was agreed that the parties should appoint appraisers to appraise the land involved in the agreement and also to separately appraise the portion of the land to be taken by respondent as his share of the profits. Appellant further urges that the phrase "keep the trees in good shape and growing for five (5) years" should be so construed as to make respondent an insurer and guarantor that the trees would all be "growing and in fine shape five years after planting." The court instructed the jury that under the agreement respondent was not an insurer or guarantor that the trees would grow for five years and that the agreement only placed upon respondent the "obligation to cultivate and care for said trees in a reasonable and ordinary husbandry manner and to do so in the same manner as would be expected to be done under the same conditions by a reasonable and ordinary rancher and farmer." The jury was further instructed that the agreement covered the period of five years from its date and that the obligations of respondent did not continue until five years after the planting of the trees in February, 1922. We are of the opinion that the court's instructions placed the proper construction on the agreement. The construction contended for by appellant is entirely unreasonable. It is a matter of common knowledge that not every tree planted will survive even under the most favorable conditions. In the present case appellant furnished the trees and his position is wholly untenable as the choice of the type and the quality of the trees furnished was left to appellant. We are further of the opinion that the period covered by the agreement was five years from the date thereof and not five years from the planting of the trees as contended by appellant. No definite time was fixed for the planting except that it should be done "before March 1, 1922." A reading of the entire agreement shows that the five years referred to in the paragraph relating to planting and caring for the trees was the same five years covered by the lease. It is further contended that respondent is not entitled to recover as it was admitted that respondent remained in possession after the termination of the lease. It is argued that this affirmatively shows a violation of the implied promise of respondent as lessee to surrender possession at the termination of the lease and that his proof of performance therefore fails. Whatever rule may be generally applicable to the ordinary case involving the rights of the lessor and lessee, it can have no application here. It was admitted by the pleadings and on the trial that the land had increased in value. Under the rather unusual agreement between the parties, respondent was entitled to an undetermined interest in the land as his share of the profits resulting from the increased value of the land. The exact amount of this interest and the particular portion of the land to be taken by respondent could only be determined following an appraisement as provided in the agreement. Appellant failed and refused to appoint an appraiser and under these circumstances we find no merit in appellant's claim that respondent's continued possession of the premises defeated his right of recovery.

[6] In our opinion the second and third main contentions of appellant relating to the giving and refusing of instructions and the rulings upon evidence are likewise without merit. Some of appellant's specifications of error under these headings involve the questions hereinbefore discussed. We have examined the entire charge given to the jury and are satisfied that the instructions were fully as favorable to appellant as he was entitled to have them. Neither in the instructions to the jury nor in the rulings upon evidence do we find any prejudicial error which would warrant a reversal. The record discloses that respondent spent a great amount of time and money in carrying out the terms of the agreement and that he worked the land continuously in order to produce the best results under the adverse conditions encountered. Appellant took no exception to respondent's performance until shortly before the termination of the lease. The evidence of the condition of the land and orchard at the end of the five years amply sustained the implied finding that respondent had performed and he was therefore entitled under the agreement to his share in the increased value of the land.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIDLER v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF ROSEVILLE UNION HIGH SCHOOL et al.

Civ. 4154.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

March 2, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 1, 1931.

1. Schools and school districts 🔑135(1).

Statute respecting powers of school authorities expressly authorized employment by contract made between teacher and school district (School Code, §§ 5.530, 5.731, and § 5.734, pars. 1, 2).

2. Schools and school districts 🔑135(1).

Status of teacher as permanent teacher is conferred upon him by statute and is not dependent upon contract, but right to compensation is proper subject of contract (School Code, §§ 5.530, 5.731, and § 5.734, pars. 1, 2).

3. Schools and school districts 🔑144(4).

Under statute authorizing board of trustees to fix compensation, board, acting in good faith in reclassifying duties to be performed in department, could reduce permanent teacher's compensation (School Code, §§ 4.540, 4.700, 4.870, 5.530, 5.731, and § 5.734, pars. 1, 2).

4. Schools and school districts 🔑144(4).

Trustees did not abuse discretion in rearranging duties of permanent teacher and reducing salary from $2,900 to $2,500 (School Code §§ 5.530, 5.731).

Stipulated facts showed that during previous year teacher had taught classes in forenoon and devoted entire afternoon to administrative functions in position of vice principal, but that, in place of performing these duties, it was intended for ensuing year that teacher would be available for classes during afternoon as well as forenoon.

5. Evidence 🔑129(6).

Where school board rearranged teacher's duties and reduced salary, evidence of what was done and construction placed on meaning of previous contract by parties thereto was admissible (Civ. Code, § 1647).

The evidence admitted showed teacher to have occupied office of vice principal of high school during year when he received higher salary and was admitted to show primarily that school board acted with reasonable discretion in rearranging work to be done by teacher during ensuing year under School Code, §§ 3.800, 3.805, relating to courses of study.

6. Evidence 🔑460(2).

Parol evidence is admissible to identify subject-matter to which writing refers (Civ. Code, § 1647).

7. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1).

Trial court's finding upon conflicting evidence that teacher seeking to compel board to permit him to teach had resigned was binding upon appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action by J. L. Fidler against the Board of Trustees of Roseville Union High School, E. J. Schellhous and others, as Trustees of Roseville Union High School. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Butler, Van Dyke, Desmond & Harris, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Orrin J. Lowell, of Auburn, for respondents.

Mr. Justice Pro Tem. McDANIEL delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a judgment in mandate proceedings. The appellant was petitioner in the trial court, seeking by mandate to compel the respondent board of trustees of the Roseville Union high school district, and the members thereof, to admit him to the use and occupation of his right as a permanent teacher, to teach in the respondent Union high school and to pay him the salary to which he claimed to be entitled, under the law, as such teacher. An alternative writ was issued, and the respondents and defendants therein filed their answer, which not only met and traversed material averments in the petition, but affirmatively set up certain facts.

The findings and judgment were in favor of the respondents; a motion for a new trial was duly made and denied. At the trial, no witnesses were sworn, and certain facts, documentary exhibits, and proposed testimony of witnesses were admitted upon stipulation; the oral objections to the introduction of testimony were reserved by appellant, and motions were made to strike out certain portions of the answer. The motions to strike portions were denied, and all objections to testimony were overruled.

The following statement of facts, contained in appellant's opening brief, are conceded by respondents to be correct:

"The facts show that the appellant was employed in the Roseville Union High School in 1923 under a written contract, his status being that of a probationary teacher. His salary was fixed at that time at $2400 a year. It was stipulated that the form of the contract for 1923 was the same as the contract for 1924, except as to the amount of salary. In 1924 he was re-employed as probationary teacher, at a salary of $2700 a year. In 1925, on June 25, he was again employed under a written contract, and, according to law, having served as a probationary teacher for two years, was classed as a permanent teacher at a salary of $2700 a year. On June 9, 1926, another contract was entered into between the appellant and the respondent in which appellant was employed to serve as permanent teacher at a salary of $2,800 a year. On June 1, 1927, another contract was entered into in writing between the parties, in which appellant was classed as a permanent teacher, at a salary of $2900 a year. On July 31, 1928, he was again employed under a written contract as a permanent teacher at a salary of $2,900 a year.

"On May 16, 1929, the Board of Trustees of Roseville Union High School addressed a letter to appellant, in which they stated:

" 'At a special meeting of the trustees of the Roseville Union High School, called for the purpose of electing teachers, it was decided to make a change in the vice-principalship.

" 'You are herewith offered a teacher's contract for the year 1929–1930. Kindly notify the Board of your acceptance, or rejection, on or before June 8th, 1929.'

"With that letter was submitted a form of contract similar to the contracts previously submitted, except that the salary indicated therein was fixed at $2,500 per year instead of $2900 per year. Appellant signed the contract submitted after changing the figures from $2500 to $2900, and returned it to the Board, with a letter stating that as a permanent teacher with his salary having been previously fixed and determined, he was entitled to receive a salary of $2900 a year. Following this, there was various correspondence between the Board and appellant, the Board maintaining its right to reduce the salary, and appellant insisting upon his right to teach, and presenting himself each day at the school and offering to serve, and demanding that classes be assigned to him.

"On September 14, 1929, a letter was addressed to appellant by respondent, in which was stated, among other things:

" 'The teaching job is open to you and you may teach at once. The salary which the Board have fixed and which they believe is a legal salary under the circumstances and which they are willing to pay is the sum of $2500. If you fail to commence teaching forthwith, the Board will be forced to the conclusion that you refuse employment.'

"In answer to this letter appellant replied, saying, among other things:

" 'I am ready, as I have been since the opening of the term, to teach, and to perform my part of the contract of employment. No teaching work has been assigned to me. * * * I shall expect to be paid the sum to which I am legally entitled, whether it be twenty-five hundred dollars or twenty-nine hundred dollars.' * * *

"At the beginning of the school year, the appellant presented himself at the school, offered to teach, and demanded that he be assigned to classroom work. The principal of the high school, acting under the direction of the Board of Trustees, respondent herein, refused to permit appellant to teach, and refused to assign him to any classes or to any duties as a teacher, or to pay him any salary for any period of the current school year. The appellant continued to present himself at the school each morning thereafter with a similar demand, and met with a similar refusal.

"The respondent Board offered evidence over the objection of appellant that the reason for the increase in the salary of appellant prior to the current school year was that the appellant had been assigned to and had performed the duties of vice-principal in the school, and that the reason for the decrease in appellant's salary from $2900 to $2500 was that he was to be relieved from his duties as vice-principal during the current year; that it was intended that appellant should devote his entire time to classroom teaching; and it has been stipulated that he would have been assigned more classroom teaching than he had theretofore performed. It is conceded by all parties that no attempt has ever been made to discharge the appellant under the provisions of the Teacher's Tenure Act, and the evidence discloses that appellant is a thoroughly capable teacher."

The questions of law involved in this appeal are as follows: Is it true that—

(1) The decision and judgment is against law, in that there is no express statutory authority for a board of trustees of a union high school district to reduce the salary of a permanent teacher?

(2) The evidence is insufficient to support the verdict (judgment) for if, under given circumstances, for cause, the board of trustees should have the power to reduce the salary of a permanent teacher, no justifying circumstances exist in this case?

(3) The court erred in admitting in evidence over objection of petitioner testimony showing the petitioner to have occupied the position of vice principal of the Roseville union high school, for the reason that no such office or position is known to the law, and for the further reason that the written contracts of employment of the petitioner constitute the best evidence as to the nature of his employment?

[1-3] The principal point relied upon in this appeal is presented by the first of the above questions suggested by appellant. At the time the controversy arose in May, 1929, the act of the Legislature known as the Teacher's Tenure Act existed, as set out in section 1609 of the Political Code of California (St. 1927, p. 1913). The Legislature of 1929 codified that law, and references to it will now be found in the School Code of California, which went into effect on August 14, 1929. The annual school term, the subject of the controversy herein, began September 10, 1929. The final disagreement between the appellant and respondents, as shown by the letters herein set out, occurred in September, 1929. All references to the law of this case, therefore, will indicate the School Code of California.

The contention of the appellant appears to be that, when a teacher in the public schools has once attained the status of a permanent teacher, and his salary as such teacher has been fixed by the board of trustees, such board thereafter shall have no power to reduce the salary; that there is a total lack of statutory authority permitting the school board to reduce the salary of a permanent teacher, and no judicial authority for said board so to do.

Section 5.530 is as follows: "Boards of school trustees, and city, and city and county boards of education shall have power and it shall be their duty to fix and prescribe the duties to be performed by all persons in public school service in the school district."

Section 5.731 is as follows: "Boards of school trustees, and city, and city and county boards of education shall have power and it shall be their duty to fix and order paid the compensation of persons in public school service requiring certification qualifications, employed by such boards, unless the same be otherwise prescribed by law."

The first two paragraphs of section 5.734 are as follows:

"In cities teachers of beginners shall be ranked in the salary schedule with the highest salaried teachers in the elementary grades of equal training and experience.

"Uniform allowance may be made in any schedule of salaries for years of training and for years of service."

The second paragraph is especially referred to in the argument.

Appellant contends that an analysis of these several sections will show that, while it was the intention of the Legislature to empower boards of trustees to raise and thus to fix the salary of teachers, the power to reduce is withheld by implication, and that in no other provisions of the School Code, or the Political Code, is there to be found any provision, directly or inferentially, giving the school board the right to reduce the salary of a permanent teacher.

Respondents, of course, contend that correct interpretation of the same sections indicates that boards of trustees have a wide range of discretion, including not only the prescribing, fixing, and assigning of duties to teachers, with power to relieve them of duties previously assigned to them, but, before contracts for the school year are actually made, may fix salaries, in the exercise of a sound discretion, according to the duties to be performed, keeping in mind the years of training and experience teachers may have had, and may either raise or lower salaries at the times and in the manner provided by law. Respondents do not contend, however, that there can be any arbitrary or unreasonable exercise by the board of the power to reduce the salary of a permanent teacher. If the board, in a given case, comes to the conclusion that a reapportionment of duties and a change in appellant's salary is essential to accord with the change of duties, it would be valid to make the change in the legal exercise of authority.

Appellant contends that the teacher, once having attained a permanent status, is not subject to the board except as to those matters governed by statute. Respondents contend: "That under the law the Board of Trustees has full and complete control over all teachers and employees employed by the School District, except as such control may be limited by statute"—citing Grigsby v. King, 202 Cal. 299, 260 P. 789.

Considerable argument is devoted to the consideration of the proper definition of the word "fix," as used in the statute with reference to the compensation of teachers. As shown in the foregoing statement, the appellant for years past had successive contracts with the board of trustees fixing and regulating his compensation in each year of his employment. He received successive increases of salary, so that appellant, while contending that the word "fix" as used in the statute, considered in conjunction with the second paragraph of section 5.734, which says, "Uniform allowance may be made in any schedule of salaries for years of training and for years of service," necessarily imports by implication that the trustees may raise salaries but may not lower them.

Appellant argues that the respondents "endeavor to convince the court that to 'fix' means to 'change.' Logically, the conception of fixity and of change are mutually exclusive. Etymologically, the word 'fix' is derived from the Latin 'figo,' meaning 'to fasten.' (Standard Dictionary of the English Language.) In ordinary parlance the word 'fix' excludes the idea of change. In this instance the power to fix, coupled with the power to raise, excludes the power to lower salaries."

The last sentence just quoted, while terse, if not sententious, and though syllogistic in form, appears to us illogical in conclusion. If the word "fix" excludes the idea of "change," how can it be coupled with the power to raise? If it be so coupled, however, why does it exclude the power to lower salaries?

The entire argument of appellant is well met and appears to be overthrown by the well-considered case, under a statute similar to the permanent tenure law for teachers under the School Code of California, entitled Buckbee v. Board of Education, 115 App. Div. 366, 100 N. Y. S. 943. It was held in that case that the statute requiring a board of education to fix the compensation of permanent teachers conferred upon the board the right, in the exercise of its discretion, from time to time, to regulate such compensation, whether the result was to increase or decrease the salaries of teachers. That case has been frequently cited with approval in a number of other New York cases, and it has been affirmed by the Court of Appeals in 187 N. Y. 544, 80 N. E. 1106.

In Brigham v. City of New York, 191 App. Div. 866, 182 N. Y. S. 145, 146, which cites Buckbee v. Board of Education Case, supra, it is said: "The provision that a civil service employee shall not be removed or reduced to a lower grade without charges and upon a hearing was intended to protect individual employees from arbitrary and unjust action on the part of their superiors. It was not intended thereby to limit the power of the proper officials of the city, so that, having fixed the salary of a position at a certain figure, which, under the classification of the civil service commission was placed in a certain grade, they could not reduce it to an amount which would carry that position into a lower grade, providing the reduction was not unjust, made in good faith, and not for the purpose of discriminating against any single employee. * * * The power to fix salaries does not mean that, where the board of aldermen have designated a salary to be paid to an employee of the city, it cannot thereafter change the salary. As was said by Mr. Justice Clarke: 'When we consider the legislative character of these bodies, no other conclusion can be arrived at but that in the exercise of their governmental functions the power to fix was merely the power to regulate, and was continuous.' "

Rudd v. Cropsey, 159 App. Div. 275, 144 N. Y. S. 198, holds that, where there is no positive law against reduction in salaries, "In such case, power to fix a salary carries power to reduce it"—citing Sauerbrunn v. Bd. of Education, 150 App. Div. 407, 135 N. Y. S. 85, affirmed on opinion below, 208 N. Y. 550, 101 N. E. 1120; Buckbee v. Board of Education, supra.

It is unnecessary to follow the argument based upon appellant's theory that boards of education and boards of trustees, etc., being creatures of statutes, have only the powers expressly conferred and have no implied powers, for the reason that we think that the statute in this case does expressly authorize employment by contract made between the teacher and the district. The entire argument of appellant is based upon this view that appellant had acquired the status as far back as 1925, of a permanent teacher; that the board of trustees entered into a contract with him, whereby his compensation was fixed at a certain figure; that a contractual relationship was created, which would continue from year to year, unless changed by consent, and changed by increases in salary only.

An examination of each contract made between the board of trustees and appellant demonstrates that it was a contract for one year only, in so far as compensation was concerned. A distinction must be kept in mind at all times in consideration of the instant case between the right to permanent tenure of the office and the right to compensation during each year. Appellant is perfectly aware of that distinction, for he says in his closing brief: "The distinction between appellant's right to his status as a permanent teacher and his right to a salary as such teacher must be kept clearly in mind." It is an important distinction, for his status as a permanent teacher is conferred upon him by the statute, and is not dependent upon contract; while his right to compensation is a proper subject of contract. Appellant has recognized this by making his successive contracts with the trustees, and even in this controversy, as shown by his letter of September 17th, above quoted, in fact, was requesting the said board of trustees again to contract with him as to his compensation, at the rate of $2,900 per year for the school year of 1929–30.

In this connection, the concurring opinion of Judge Laughlin, found on page 950 of 100 N. Y. S., of Buckbee v. Board of Education, supra, is pertinent and illuminating: "I am of opinion that, after the school year commences, the salaries for that year of teachers accepting employment on the faith of the salary as then fixed cannot be affected during that school year by any change of salary subsequently made. There is an obligation until the Legislature sees fit to change the law, but not a contract, for the permanent employment of teachers so long as their services are required, and so long as they have not forfeited the right to continue as teachers. The obligation, however, in that respect is not mutual, and therefore is not, strictly speaking, a contract. The teacher only contracts for the single year, and may or may not continue thereafter. The duty of the municipality, erroneously, I think, called a contract, to continue the employment of the teacher for life or good behavior, is in the nature of a civil service regulation. The obligation is to re-employ the teacher from year to year, as if taken from an eligible list of the civil service. The salaries sought to be recovered here, as I understand the facts, embrace a period beyond the school year during which the change in salary was made. A teacher entering upon the service for the school year after the change in salary was made accepts the employment, subject to the salary then prescribed for the position."

The erroneous hypothesis upon which appellant's entire argument rests as to his right to the salary of $2,900 for the school year of 1929–30, is that, when that figure was fixed and agreed to in the contract of 1928–29, it continued beyond that last-named school year. By an inspection of the contract itself, it will be seen that the school year begins September 10, 1928, and consists of not less than 170 days of actual teaching, and has printed upon it, "each contract shall be renewed annually."

The entire system of support and maintenance of the public schools of California, as shown by the School Code, contemplates that each year's expenditures shall be paid out of the income and revenue of that year. Section 4.540 of the School Code, for instance, requires an estimate to be made by every high school board of the amount of money requisite for maintaining the high school in the ensuing school year, which estimate must be filed with the county superintendent at least 15 days before the 1st day of the month in which the board of supervisors must levy taxes for county purposes.

Section 4.700 provides as follows: "Boards of school trustees and city boards of education must use the school moneys received from the state and county apportionments exclusively for the support of schools for that school year, until at least an eight months' school has been maintained." And all of the provisions relating to the expenditure of moneys by governmental agencies seem to contemplate and require that the expenditures be kept within the amount required for governmental purposes for the current year. Under section 4.870, the state superintendent of schools makes his annual apportionment of moneys to the various high school districts of the state.

If these views are correct, then, at the time the present controversy arose, there was actually in existence no contract relating to the compensation of appellant as a permanent teacher, for 1929–1930.

We quote from Martin v. Fisher (Cal. App.) 291 P. 276, 278: "The position of a teacher in the public schools of California is not an office. It is an employment by contract made between the teacher and the district. Leymel v. Johnson (Cal. App.) 288 P. 858. The becoming a permanent teacher, and the continuation of this employment, is a right given by statute, which right can be terminated or forfeited in the manner provided by law. Grigsby v. King, 202 Cal. 299, 260 P. 789; Saxton v. Bd. of Education, 206 Cal. 758, 276 P. 998. The relation between the district and the teacher is that of employer and employee and is created by contract which must be dependent, for its terms and conditions, upon the authority granted the district by law and the limitations placed by law upon its power to contract."

If the board, in reclassifying the duties to be performed in the grade or particular school department, acted in good faith, and then fixed the compensation at $2,500 instead of $2,900, it was acting within the limits of expressly conferred power.

The appellant had the unquestioned and admitted right to continue in his status as a permanent teacher and to accept the offer at a reduced salary or reject it, as he pleased.

[4] It is argued under the second question of law by appellant, however, that no circumstances existed in this case justifying the board of trustees in their action, whereby they reduced the salary of his position. The one obvious answer to that proposition is, as shown, at the time the change was made, which change was for the succeeding year's salary, appellant's existing contract was not affected nor impaired. For the succeeding year, no contract with fixed salary existed. However, if the board must prove that, in reclassifying the duties of the position, it acted with sound discretion, it appears from the evidence admitted and the facts found by the court in support of respondents' affirmative defense, that the trustees for the fiscal year 1929–30 discontinued the horticultural exhibits, by reason of the lack of attendance in said subjects, and the said Roseville union high school lost thereby the federal state aid it had theretofore received under the statute, known as the Smith-Hughes bill. It further appears that, when appellant carried out his contract for the year 1928–29, in addition to his classroom work as teacher therein, he had performed duties of an administrative or executive character, under the designation or title of vice principal.

At the trial in the superior court, the following stipulation was made:

"It is stipulated that the correct figure for the increase in the salary of the teacher appointed as vice-principal, as mentioned on page 2 of the Reporter's Transcript, is the sum of $600 and not the sum of $100.

"It is stipulated that, subject to the objections of petitioner specified in the Reporter's Transcript, witnesses for respondents would testify: That petitioner, during the past year's service for respondents, taught classes in the forenoon and devoted the entire afternoon to administrative functions. During the afternoon of the school days the principal visited classrooms, etc., and petitioner occupied the office rooms of the principal and performed the executive and administrative functions usually performed by the principal. This performance by him of the usual functions of the principal was by virtue of his assignment to the position as vice-principal and the said executive and administrative functions were the duties from which petitioner was relieved at the end of the past school year. In place of performing these duties, it was intended for the ensuing year that petitioner would be available for class teaching during the afternoon of each day as well as the forenoon."

Subject to the objections of appellant, there was admitted on the trial testimony that the salary of $2,500 per year, as fixed by respondent board, was in all respects a reasonable salary and was ample and sufficient compensation for the services to be performed by petitioner as teacher during the school year 1929–30.

Accepting the foregoing as showing the considerations influencing the trustees to rearrange the duties of the position formerly held by appellant and as properly before the court, we are unable to see that there was any abuse of discretion or any improper conduct on the part of the trustees in readjusting the salary of the position. We are therefore of the opinion that the circumstances explain and justify the reduction and that it was not arbitrary nor discriminatory, nor a violation of the Teachers' Tenure Act.

[5, 6] We come now to the third question of law presented by this appeal: Whether or not the court erred in admitting evidence over the objection of petitioner, showing the petitioner to have occupied the office of vice-principal of the Roseville Union High School, for the reason that no such office or position is known to the law, and for the further reason that the recent contract of employment of the petitioner constituted the best evidence of the nature of his employment. We think the court correctly ruled.

The contract of 1928–29 and the preceding contracts of employment each set out that appellant was employed as a permanent teacher, naming the compensation for the year, the monthly installments of salary, the minimum number of days to be taught for the year, and does not specifically undertake to enumerate any particular duties. It is true the statute provides that the high school boards shall prepare and control the course of study. Section 3.800, School Code.

Section 3.805 sets out what may be included in such high school course of study. All these subjects named in the courses of study provided are not taught by one teacher, but, naturally, are assigned to and divided among many different teachers. Other duties are defined by statute. The evidence was offered and admitted, not for the purpose of altering or modifying any contract, but to show primarily and principally that the board of trustees acted with reasonable discretion in rearranging the work to be done in the year 1929–30. Whether or not the board had the legal right to pay appellant for any services he may have rendered as vice principal, we need not at this time decide. He voluntarily performed such services; in fact, it seems to have been by mutual consent of the parties herein, though the strict purview of the contract of employment did not state that appellant should act as such vice principal, if he had been so acting under his previous contract as a permanent teacher. Under these circumstances, evidence of what actually was done and the construction placed upon the meaning of the contract by the above parties thereto, in our judgment, was admissible. Section 1647, Civil Code, provides: "A contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates." "Although parol evidence is not admissible to supply omissions or introduce terms, or to contradict, alter or vary a written instrument, it is admissible for the purpose of identifying the subject matter to which the writing refers." 6 Cal. Jur. 258, citations and note 8.

Appellant has cited no authority in support of his objections, and we, therefore, need not extend consideration on this point.

[7] There is another question which appears to us to be merely a question of fact.

presented by appellant in his closing brief. It is contended that appellant can be deprived of his status as a permanent teacher by discharge only in the manner provided by law or by resignation. It is conceded that a refusal to teach is, of course, tantamount to a resignation. It is conceded that he has never been formally discharged. Appellant contends that it is also conceded that he never refused to teach, but, in fact, has always been ready, able, and anxious to teach. This last statement that he "never refused to teach" seems to us to be actually in dispute under the evidence, and is disputed in the evidence as well as in the argument. It is in fact an important question in the case.

It is strongly urged by appellant that, in his letter of September 17, 1929, appellant indicated no change in his position with reference to the controversy. With respect to this matter, whether the said letter represented any change of position on the part of appellant or not, it, by its own terms, does show it was not an unqualified or unlimited acceptance of the offer to renew the contract at the $2,500 salary.

On May 16, 1929, the board of trustees wrote appellant that it had decided to make a change in the vice principalship. He was offered a teacher's contract for the year 1929–30; a copy being inclosed with the letter. He was asked to notify the board of his acceptance or rejection on or before June 8, 1929. He replied on June 7, 1929, returning the contract, the form of which had been sent to him, stating:

"June 7, 1929.

"To the Board of Trustees of Roseville Union High School, Roseville, California.

"Attention: E. C. Bedell, Clerk.

"Gentlemen: I acknowledge receipt of your letter of May 16th, enclosing form of contract for my employment as permanent teacher in the Roseville Union High School for the coming year, noting from your letter that my acceptance or rejection of the contract was required on or before June 8, 1929.

"The contract as submitted to me contains an error in the amount of salary to be paid. My status in the school is that of a permanent teacher, and my salary, as previously established by your Board, is $2900 per year and not $2500. I have, therefore, taken the liberty of amending the contract, and I call your attention to the change made by me in the offer of employment, where I have corrected the salary from $2500 to be paid in ten payments of $250 each, to $2900, to be paid in ten payments of $290 each. The offer as thus corrected is accepted by me, and you will find my acceptance endorsed on the contract which I return to you herewith for your verification.

"You will please understand my position to be, that, having been classified by your Board as a permanent teacher under the teacher's tenure act, at a definite salary fixed by your Board in previous contracts, that your Board is now without power to reduce that salary arbitrarily. I trust you will find my suggestions in order, and that the contract as amended will be accepted.

"Very truly yours,

"J. L. Fidler."

On June 10, 1929, the board wrote him as follows:

"Mr. J. L. Fidler, Roseville, California.

"Dear Sir: This will inform you that your offer of June 7th is not acceptable to the Board, and has been rejected. We understand that you have rejected our offer of contract.

"Yours truly,

"E. C. Bedell, Clerk."

On June 17, 1929, appellant wrote the following:

"To the Board of Trustees of Roseville Union High School, Roseville, California.

"Gentlemen: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of June 10, 1929, regarding my employment as a teacher in the Roseville Union High School for the coming year. In your letter you state as follows: 'We understand that you have rejected our offer of contract.' I have refused your offer of contract, the grounds of my refusal being set forth in my previous letter to you. But, however, I do not reject my right to continue as a teacher in the Roseville Union High School under my privileges and status as a permanent teacher in that school. I am a permanent teacher in the Roseville Union High School under the teacher's tenure act. My standing as such, and my salary or rate of compensation, has become fixed. You are without power to change that status or that rate of compensation except for cause shown, and under the procedure indicated by subdivision 5 of Section 1609 of the Political Code of the State of California.

"Therefore, you are advised that I am holding myself in readiness to continue to teach in the Roseville Union High School this coming term, upon the same terms and at the same salary and pay as last year, and shall be present on the opening of the school term, prepared to take up my duties, as heretofore.

"Yours very truly,

"J. L. Fidler."

We think these letters manifest a refusal on the part of appellant to accept the offered contract. Conceding, however, only for the purpose of discussion, appellant's contention that he was willing to work for $2,500 per year, leaving the amount of his compensation to be determined later by litigation, or otherwise, to be meritorious, it is met and overcome by conflicting evidence, for it was stipulated that witness would testify that by reason of the refusal of petitioner to accept the precise terms of the offer of respondents, and by reason of the position and demands of petitioner respondents did on September 27th make final arrangements for the performance of the teaching duties to have been assigned to petitioner, and from that date the offer of respondents to employ petitioner at an agreed salary of $2,500 per year was deemed finally and conclusively rejected by petitioner, and thereafter was no longer subject to acceptance.

This shows a sharp conflict in the evidence, if appellant's interpretation of the appellant's offer to continue teaching be correct. That conflict was resolved against appellant by the trial court's finding that appellant refused to continue teaching. As expressed by appellant, "a refusal to teach is, of course, tantamount to a resignation." The finding upon conflicting evidence is binding upon this court.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Coast Coal Company, a corporation, against the Lindsay Co-operative Citrus Association, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. E. Perkins, of Visalia, for appellant.

Jas. R. McBride, of Lindsay, and H. B. McClure, of Visalia, for respondent.

BARNARD, P. J.

In this action, the plaintiff seeks to hold the defendant as an acceptor of a bill of exchange. The defendant is engaged in conducting a packing house for oranges and other citrus fruits at Lindsay, Cal. The plaintiff is engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling briquets or solid fuel for orchard heaters, and in the fall of 1925 one C. A. Bishop was its agent in the vicinity of Lindsay. At the same time, in the same vicinity, one J. W. Irwin, as the agent of the Phillips Orchard Heater Company, was selling orchard heaters designed to use solid fuel. Because of their common interest, these two salesmen worked together in soliciting business, and occasionally each would take orders for the other, but without compensation. Late in October, 1925, as the two agents were passing the property of one Ivan McIndoo, Irwin remarked that they could sell some heaters and fuel to him. Bishop replied that "we couldn't accept Mr. McIndoo's business without a packing house order." Later, Bishop went to Los Angeles, leaving with Irwin an order book on which he could take orders for briquets. Irwin secured an order from McIndoo for heaters, and also one for a hundred tons of briquets which are involved in this action. On November 20, 1925, Irwin wired Bishop as follows: "Ivan McIndoo offers packing house acceptance out of Valencia crop next May hundred tons briquets buying seven hundred fifty heaters asking same terms on five hundred dollars of heater order paying three hundred twenty five dollars cash on heaters communicate with Phillips wiring reply quick when would briquets arrive."

The same day Bishop replied by wire: "Phillips will accept McIndoo order but wants acceptance accompanied by seven per cent personal note stop I will accept acceptance from Mr. McIndoo packing house to read May fifteenth with six per cent per annum from January first stop if this is satisfactory have packing house wire me authorizing terms and I will wire order immediately and send order for signature."

Irwin and McIndoo visited this defendant and secured and sent to Bishop a telegram reading:

"Lindsay, Calif. 1106 A Nov 21, 1925.

"C. A. Bishop 700 W. 30th Street, Los Angeles, Calif.

"We agree sign packing house acceptance in payment of heaters and briquets for Ivan McIndoos requirements payments for above to be made by May fifteenth twenty seven. Lindsay Cooperative Citrus Assn 1202 P."

He replied to Irwin as follows: "I am in receipt of telegram from Lindsay Cooperative referring to Ivan McIndoo order which reads payment for above to be made May 15 27 stop I am very glad to extend the courtesy to Mr. McIndoo of May 15, 1926, as per my telegram kindly interview Lindsay Cooperative and see if that is satisfactory stop immediately on receipt of your wire I will telegraph the order to Seattle."

Upon receipt thereof, Irwin prepared another telegram and, with McIndoo, went to defendant's packing house, procured defendant's signature thereto, and forwarded it to Bishop. This read:

"Lindsay Calif 1045 A Nov 23 1925.

"C A Bishop Answer NL 2—700 West 30 St Los Angeles Calif

"Correct our telegram of twenty first regarding Ivan McIndoos acceptance to read payment May 15 1926 instead of 1927."

Upon receipt of that telegram, Bishop forwarded an order to plaintiff, and the briquets were shipped to McIndoo. Plaintiff wrote to defendant under date of November 24, 1925, as follows:

"Lindsay Co-operative Citrus Association, Lindsay, California.

"Gentlemen: This will acknowledge receipt of and confirm your order given our Mr. Bishop directing 100 tons of Diamond Briquets, sacked, to be shipped Ivan McIndoo at Lindsay. It is understood that we are to prepay the freight and that payment will be due May 15, 1926, with interest from January 1, 1926.

"We thank you for this order and it is being given our immediate attention.

"Yours very truly,

"Pacific Coast Coal Company."

The following trade acceptance was also sent:

$1,669.44 Seattle, Wash. Nov. 30, 1925.

"On May 15, 1926, pay to the order of Pacific Coast Coal Company, 563 R. R. Ave., So., Seattle, Wash. One Thousand Six Hundred Sixty Nine 44-100 Dollars. The obligation of the acceptor hereof arises out of the purchase of goods from the drawer. To Lindsay Cooperative Citrus Assn., Lindsay, Calif.

Under date of December 10, 1925, defendant wrote to plaintiff as follows:

"We have received your letter of Nov. 24th, accompanied by freight bills and invoices covering 100 tons of Diamond briquets shipped to Ivan McIndoo at Lindsay, also trade acceptance which you desire this association to execute in your favor.

"In order that this matter may be handled by us under the same conditions as other such transactions for our other growers have been handled we would suggest that you make out the trade acceptance covering this purchase designating Ivan McIndoo as the acceptor, with this Association as endorser of such acceptance.

"Will you kindly arrange to handle this transaction in this manner."

To this letter the plaintiff replied as follows:

"Replying to your letter of December 10th, we made our trade acceptance in line with your order, as received by telegraph from our Mr. Bishop. To this date we have never received a written confirmation of this order.

"In conformity with your request we are attaching our trade acceptance No. 106 for $1669.44, made out to Ivan McIndoo, and will ask you to kindly have this accepted by him, with your indorsement."

Inclosed with this reply was a second trade acceptance, reading thus:

"Seattle, Wash., Nov. 30, 1925.

"To Ivan McIndoo, Lindsay, Calif."

This was forwarded by defendant to McIndoo, together with a similar one in favor of the Phillips Orchard Heater Company, for his acceptance. McIndoo signed and returned the one in favor of the Phillips Orchard Heater Company, but refused to sign the one in favor of this plaintiff, because of the misunderstanding in regard to the date of maturity. The defendant never accepted or returned to the plaintiff either of said bills of exchange or trade acceptances. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff has appealed.

The appellant first contends that this transaction discloses a written promise upon the part of the respondent to accept a bill of exchange for goods sold and delivered to McIndoo, one of respondent's customers, within the meaning of section 3216 of the Civil Code. This section reads as follows: "Promise to Accept. An unconditional promise in writing to accept a bill before it is drawn is deemed an actual acceptance in favor of every person who, upon the faith thereof, receives the bill for value."

[1] Appellant also relies upon the case of James v. E. G. Lyons Co., 134 Cal. 189, 66 P. 210. In that case it was held that a certain letter, "read and interpreted in the light of what had preceded it, as well as what followed it," contained an unconditional promise to accept a certain instrument. It can hardly be doubted that, where an unconditional promise in writing to accept a bill of exchange is shown, the promisor will be bound thereby. However, the language used must be such as to import an absolute promise to accept, and, unless the words used import a clear and unequivocal acceptance, no recovery may be had. First National Bank v. Commercial Savings Bank, 74 Kan. 606, 87 P. 746, 747, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1148, 118 Am. St. Rep. 340, 11 Ann. Cas. 281. In that case, in which it was sought to hold a bank as having accepted, through certain telegrams, a bill of exchange in the form of a check, the court said: "A request upon a bank that it accept a check is a request for the creation of a legal relation between the holder and the bank, wholly without and beyond the purview of the paper. If such relation be established, it imposes upon the bank a liability to a party to whom it was not before bound at all, and it converts the privilege of the bank to pay if in funds into an absolute and unconditional duty to pay, no matter what may be the state of the depositor's account. Any one claiming to be the beneficiary of a contract of this kind independent of and collateral to the check must clearly show that the bank intended to make it. Neither law nor custom binds parties to the use of any set formula in arranging an acceptance. They may choose their own words. Brevity is not simply allowable, it is commendable; but in all cases there must be no doubt that an absolute promise to pay was made."

[2] In Myers v. Union National Bank, 27 Ill. App. 254, it is said: "One relying on a telegram as an acceptance, should see to it that the language used will, at least, fairly bear the meaning." We think that the transaction before us does not disclose an intention to bind the respondent to pay in any event and regardless of any signing by McIndoo. No specific or unconditional promise to accept a draft is shown. The respondent did not agree to "accept," but to "sign packing house acceptance." The word "sign" can hardly be said to be synonymous with the word "accept." It cannot be certainly said that the agreement was to sign as acceptor. From the face of the agreement it is just as plausible to say that the contract was to sign as indorser, which entails a very different responsibility, and this is much more plausible when the surrounding circumstances are considered. Upon the face of the instrument, the words "sign packing house acceptance" indicate something different from the ordinary agreement to accept unconditionally. The reference to McIndoo's requirements indicates that McIndoo is to order the goods. It would naturally appear that the acceptance they agree to sign is one tied up with the packing house business, and the natural inference is that the respondent agrees to sign some sort of an order given by McIndoo; or in other words, that respondent will sign something as surety for him.

[3] In accordance with the rule laid down in James v. E. G. Lyons Co., supra, the telegram here in question should be interpreted in the light of what preceded and what followed it. In examining the entire transaction, we find throughout the idea of suretyship or liability as an indorser, rather than direct primary liability, on the part of the respondent. In the first conversation with Irwin, in reference to the possibility of an order from McIndoo, Bishop, appellant's agent, stated that they "couldn't accept Mr. McIndoo's business without a packing house order," thus expressing the idea of obtaining security. In the first telegram of November 20, from Irwin to Bishop, it is stated that "McIndoo offers packing house acceptance payable out of Valencia crop next May," which not only carries on the idea of security but indicates a particular fund from which it is to be paid. In replying, Bishop says that Phillips will accept the McIndoo order but wants acceptance, and that he himself will "accept acceptance from McIndoo packing house," which seems to refer to the same sort of acceptance McIndoo had offered, and he goes on to request a wire from the packing house authorizing such terms. This further indicates that the order is to come from McIndoo and that security is wanted. The respondent's manager testified that, at the time the next telegram, the one upon which this action is largely based, was sent, McIndoo and Irwin came to the packing house and told him they wanted to see if the packing house would indorse Mr. McIndoo's order for some briquets and heaters, and Irwin then prepared the telegram. As has been said, the language then used indicates something different from "accept." The word "sign" is qualified by the words "packing house acceptance"; both together imply something other than the usual absolute acceptance; and the surrounding circumstances indicate that the transaction was based upon the fact that respondent would handle McIndoo's crop, and would sign a packing house acceptance rather than an "acceptance." Whether this takes the form of accepting an order from McIndoo, or of indorsing an acceptance made by McIndoo, the reference to a different kind of acceptance and to McIndoo's requirements seems to carry on the idea of some form of security for McIndoo, and points to secondary, rather than primary, liability. In his reply telegram, Bishop says he is glad to extend the courtesy of a different credit to McIndoo, but wants to be sure the change in date is satisfactory to this respondent. This indicates not only the giving of credit to McIndoo, but proper care to have the consent of a surety. McIndoo and Irwin together then went to respondent and secured the telegram correcting the date; Bishop then sent in the order to his company; and the goods were shipped direct to McIndoo. The first expression to be found anywhere in the transaction, indicating anything to the effect of a primary obligation on the part of the respondent, appears in the letter dated November 24, 1925, sent to respondent by appellant, with a trade acceptance addressed to respondent, as drawee. The respondent replied with a request that the matter be handled in the manner other transactions of that sort for other growers had been handled, suggesting that appellant send a trade acceptance designating McIndoo as acceptor, with the respondent as indorser of such acceptance. The appellant replied that in conformity with this request they were sending trade acceptance made out to McIndoo, and they ask respondent to have this accepted by him, with its indorsement, inclosing a trade acceptance addressed to McIndoo, as payee. This not only indicates that the intention of respondent was to sign as indorser, which, as we have pointed out, is the idea of suretyship indicated throughout the transaction, but shows that the appellant either concurred in or accepted such intention. If it could be held that the original promise of respondent was a definite one to accept this bill of exchange, these subsequent letters show a changed agreement, and show that then, if not before, the minds of the parties met in an agreement that the respondent should indorse a trade acceptance. However, we think this final arrangement explains the promise and intention originally made and had by the respondent, which the evidence shows to have been at all times concurred in by appellant's agent, Bishop, and finally, if not originally, concurred in by the respondent directly. We conclude that such an unconditional promise as is contemplated by section 3216 of the Civil Code does not here appear, both because the language used is not sufficient to show a definite promise to accept a bill of exchange, and because the surrounding circumstances and the interpretation placed upon the agreement by the parties themselves show that a conditional signing or a form of suretyship was intended, it being intended that the bill of exchange should be signed by respondent as indorser, after the same had been accepted by McIndoo. This is borne out by the fact that the other part of the deal, that with the Phillips Heater Company, was put through on that basis; there being every indication that both deals were alike and that the same intentions prevailed and the same promises were made in both sales.

[4] The appellant further contends that the respondent is liable under the provisions of section 3218 of the Civil Code, because the trade acceptance was not, within twenty-four hours, returned to the appellant by the respondent, either accepted or nonaccepted, and that the respondent must therefore be deemed to have accepted the same. That section has no application to the respondent as to the last trade acceptance, because the respondent was not named as drawee therein. Neither does it bind the respondent upon the first trade acceptance sent by appellant, because of the subsequent action of the parties in agreeing upon a different procedure.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

KNIGHT, J.

For a period of three months, commencing December 17, 1928, the defendant Contra Costa Building & Loan Association occupied and paid rent for certain offices in a building in Richmond, belonging to plaintiffs; and thereafter plaintiffs brought this action to recover the rental thereof for the succeeding five months, claiming that the same was due under a five-year written lease theretofore executed on behalf of said association by one E. B. Moore. The trial court held that the lease was not binding on the association, and accordingly entered judgment in its favor, from which this appeal is taken by plaintiffs.

Section 15c of the Building and Loan Commission Act (St. 1925, p. 253) provides in part as follows: "Before the articles of incorporation of any building and loan association, hereafter desiring to incorporate, under the laws of this state, shall be filed in the office of the secretary of state of the state of California, there must be attached thereto, the certificate of approval of the building and loan commissioner. * * *" And section 15 of said act (St. 1911, pp. 607, 614) provides: "It shall be the duty of the commissioner to require every such association, corporation or society coming under his supervision, to procure from him, prior to the transaction of any business, a certificate of authority or license to transact business in this state; and it is hereby made the duty of every association, corporation or society to comply with such requirement. * * *" (Italics ours.)

[1] The articles of incorporation of the defendant association, with the certificate of approval of the building and loan commissioner attached, were filed with the secretary of state on October 30, 1928, and on December 15, 1928, Moore signed the lease in question on behalf of said association; but the license which the association was required to obtain before it was authorized to transact "any" business was not issued until January 9, 1929. It would appear therefore, that under the law as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of McCormick v. Market Nat. Bank, 165 U. S. 538, 17 S. Ct. 433, 435, 41 L. Ed. 817, the lease was void. That case involved the validity of a lease executed on behalf of a national bank prior to the issuance to the bank of an authorization by the Comptroller of Currency "to commence the business of banking," and is similar in principle therefore to the case at bar; and it was held that the lease was ultra vires, and consequently void. The decision therein goes on to point out that, by the National Bank Act, a national banking association "'upon duly making and filing articles of association, and an organization certificate,' with the comptroller of the currency, 'shall become, as from the date of the execution of its organization certificate, a body corporate, and as such, and in the name designated in the organization certificate, shall have power' 'to adopt and use a corporate seal,' 'to have succession for the period of twenty years from its organization,' 'to make contracts,' 'to sue and be sued, as fully as natural persons,' to elect and dismiss officers, to make by-laws, and to exercise 'all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking.' 'But no such association shall transact any business, except such as is incidental and necessarily preliminary to its organization, until it has been authorized by the comptroller of the currency to commence the business of banking.'" Continuing, the court said: "The question upon which this case turned was whether a national banking association which, after having duly made and filed its articles of association and organization certificate with the comptroller of the currency, but not having received from him a certificate authorizing it to do banking business, enters with the owner of real estate into a contract of lease, for a term of five years, determinable at the end of any year by either party, of an office to be occupied by the association as a banking office, is bound by the lease, according to its provisions." And in declaring the lease to be void the court said: "Until the association has been authorized by the comptroller to commence the business of banking, section 5136 peremptorily forbids the corporation to 'transact any business' whatever, whether appertaining or not to the business of banking, 'except such as is incidental and necessarily preliminary to its organization.' The only business which it is permitted to transact is 'such as is incidental and necessarily preliminary,' not to carrying on, or even to commencing, the business of banking, but 'to its organization'; that is to say, such as is requisite to complete its organization as a corporation, which might doubtless include electing directors and officers, receiving subscriptions and payments for shares, procuring a corporate seal, and a book for recording its proceedings, temporarily hiring a room, and contracting any small debts incidental to the completion of its organization. To take a lease is certainly to 'transact business,' within the meaning of the statute; and a lease for a term of years, at a large rent, of offices to be occupied by the bank 'as a banking office, and for no other purpose,' however necessary it might be for the transacting, or even for the commencing of banking business by a corporation whose organization had been completed, and which had been lawfully authorized to commence the business of banking, is in no sense incidental or necessarily preliminary to the organization of the corporation. * * * The lease sued on, therefore, was clearly prohibited by the very terms of the statute from which the association assumed to derive its power to execute the lease."

[2] In the present case said section 15 of the Building and Loan Commission Act doubtless contemplates the transaction of certain preliminary organization business prior to the issuance of the license by the building and loan commissioner, because the section provides that, in order "to procure such license, there must be filed with and approved by the commissioner, a certified copy of its * * * constitution and by-laws and all subsequent amendments thereto" (italics ours), which obviously cannot be adopted until after the association is organized. But, as held in McCormick v. Market Nat. Bank, supra, the execution of a lease extending over a period of years for offices to be occupied by the association for the transaction of its permanent business "is in no sense incidental or necessarily preliminary" to the organization of the association; and therefore, since it was executed prior to the date on which the association was authorized by law to transact any business, it is void.

Plaintiffs further contend, however, that the association subsequently ratified the lease, and consequently is bound by its terms. In this regard the record discloses the following facts: Moore, who was instrumental in promoting the organization of the defendant association and one of its five incorporators, negotiated with plaintiffs for the lease soon after the articles of incorporation were filed with the secretary of state; and, as stated, on December 15, 1928, he executed the same on behalf of the association. Up to that time there had been no meeting of the stockholders, nor any permanent organization effected, and consequently there had been no constitution or by-laws adopted nor any offices of the corporation created. Evidence was adduced to show, however, that the building and loan commissioner and two of the incorporators had requested Moore to act as secretary, and, furthermore, that said two incorporators had authorized him to "contract" for the premises in question. On December 18, 1928, the day after the association went into possession of the premises, the stockholders met and effected a permanent organization, including the election of a board of directors and the officers of the association, the personnel of which did not include any of the five original incorporators; and immediately following such permanent organization Moore turned over to the newly elected officers all of the records and documents in his possession, including the lease in question. But in this connection the trial court found that neither the directors nor the officers had any actual knowledge of the execution of the lease until just prior to the time the premises were vacated; and there is evidence to support such finding.

[3] Even assuming that, in the case of an ordinary private corporation, the foregoing circumstances would be legally sufficient to constitute a ratification of the lease on the part of the corporation, it is evident that in the present case it cannot be so held, because, as held in McCormick v. Market Nat. Bank, supra, "The lease sued on having been executed by the defendant, contrary to the express prohibition of the statute, which peremptorily forbade the corporation to transact any business, unless to perfect its organization, and thus denied it the capacity of entering into any contract whatever, except in perfecting its organization, the lease is void, cannot be made good by estoppel, and will not support an action to recover anything beyond the value of what the defendant has actually received and enjoyed. Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Car Co., 139 U. S. 24, 54–61, 11 S. Ct. 478 [35 L. Ed. 55]; Logan County Bank v. Townsend, 139 U. S. 67, 11 S. Ct. 496 [35 L. Ed. 107]." "The doctrine of ultra vires," says the court, "by which a contract made by a corporation beyond the scope of its corporate powers is unlawful and void, and will not support an action, rests as this court has often recognized and affirmed upon three distinct grounds: The obligation of any one contracting with a corporation to take notice of the legal limits of its powers; the interest of the stockholders, not to be subject to risks which they have never undertaken; and, above all, the interest of the public, that the corporation shall not transcend the powers conferred upon it by law. Pearce v. Madison & Indianapolis Railroad, 21 How. 441 [16 L. Ed. 184]; Pittsburgh, etc., Railway v. Keokuk & Hamilton Bridge Co., 131 U. S. 371, 384, 9 S. Ct. 770 [33 L. Ed. 157]; Central Transp. Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Helen L. Fleming against the Board of Trustees of the Oakville School District of Napa County and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for appellant.

Wallace T. Rutherford, of Napa, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from an order denying a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel a school board to permit the petitioner to teach in the public school of that district and to require the payment of her salary therefor.

The board of trustees of Oakville school district in Napa county consists of H. H. Carpenter, the duly elected clerk thereof; A. L. Lincoln; and Peter Del Bondio. All of the members of the board met at the office of the clerk on May 4, 1929, to pass upon the election of teachers for the ensuing year. The petitioner, Helen L. Fleming, had been previously elected and served as a probationary teacher in that district for the school year of 1928–1929. At the meeting of the board on May 4th, it was decided by a majority of the members of the board not to employ the petitioner for the following year. No minutes of this meeting were kept. No formal motion or vote of the members was taken or registered with respect to the employment of the petitioner. That particular subject was, however, discussed orally, and at least two of the members declared their opposition to her re-election. Following this determination of the board, the clerk then stated in their presence that he would notify the petitioner to that effect. On June 10, 1929, pursuant to the provisions of section 1609, subd. 5 (i), of the Political Code, a written notice, signed by the clerk and one other member of the board of trustees, was served on the petitioner, notifying her that her services as a teacher in that school district were no longer desired. This notice is dated June 8, 1929, and reads, in part: "Please be advised that at the conclusion of the present school term your services as teacher in the Oakville school will not be wanted any more."

The appellant asserts there was no formal decision on the part of the school board to terminate the petitioner's employment as a probationary teacher, and that she was therefore automatically re-elected as such teacher pursuant to the statute. Section 1609, subd. 2, supra, provides: "Teachers may be elected on or after May second for the next ensuing school year and each teacher so elected shall be deemed re-elected from year to year except as hereinafter specified."

The petitioner held herself in readiness to continue her services as a teacher in Oakville school district, and so notified the trustees. She was not permitted to resume her duties as teacher. This petition for mandamus was then instituted in Napa county to compel her reinstatement and the payment of her salary. The court adopted findings adverse to the petitioner on all material issues in the case and rendered judgment accordingly. From that judgment this appeal was perfected.

[1] The sole question for determination on this appeal is whether the action of the board of trustees with relation to the termination of the employment of the petitioner was sufficiently formal to bind her. We think the proceedings of the board were adequate. At a timely meeting of the board, which was attended by all of its members, the question of the re-election of Miss Fleming was formally discussed. At least a majority of the members orally declared they were opposed to her re-election. In the presence of all the members of the board the clerk then stated he would formally notify the petitioner to that effect. There was no objection to this procedure on the part of any member of the board. The clerk thereafter formally notified her in writing, as required by law, that her services were no longer desired. This notice was signed by a majority of the members of the board, to wit, the clerk and Mr. Lincoln. It was served within the time required by the statute. Subdivision 5 (i) of section 1609, supra, provides: "On or before the tenth day of June in any year the governing board may give notice in writing to a probationary teacher that his services will not be required for the ensuing school year."

We are of the opinion these proceedings were sufficiently formal to bind the petitioner.

There is no statutory provision of law requiring the meetings of school boards to be held at any specific time or place. There is no provision requiring the board to formally decide school matters by a vote of aye or nay. There is no provision requiring the minutes of its proceedings to be recorded. Construing a statute similar to that of California involving the validity of meetings held by school trustees, in upholding a contract of the board, it is said in Brown v. School District, 1 Kan. App. 530, 40 P. 826, 827: "The statute prescribes no special form or manner by which, and no particular place at which, the district board shall be convened, nor do we think it was intended or necessary that any formal call should be made for the purpose of legally convening a school district board. It is sufficient if all are present, * * * and that at least two of them agreed to make the contract in dispute."

The due determination of a board of school trustees to dispense with future services of a teacher is not invalid merely because the action of the board in that regard was omitted from the records of the meeting. 35 Cyc. 906 (c).

[2] It is true that the statute authorizes only "boards of school trustees" to employ or discharge teachers and transact the business of the school district. It follows that members of a school board acting separately as individuals may not legally bind the district to the obligations of a contract. This principle is determined in Cloverdale Union High School District of Sonoma County v. Peters, 88 Cal. App. 731, 264 P. 273, 276, where it is said: "Where power to employ a teacher is in a school board, a valid contract with a teacher cannot be made by members of the board without a meeting and formal action."

[3] This formal action, however, has never been held to require strict adherence to the technical procedure approved by "Roberts' Rules of Order." Nowhere has it been held that a business proposition must necessarily be decided by a school board by means of the formal vote of the members indicated by the signs aye or nay. Any other method of securing the definite decisions of the respective members is sufficient so long as it enables them to determine whether a majority of the members of the board favor or oppose the proposition. Nowhere has it been held the proceedings of a school board are invalid unless they are formally recorded. In the absence of a statute requiring this to be done, it is unnecessary. If all of the members of a school board are present, or have knowledge of the meeting and have an opportunity to attend, and a majority of the members of the board, after a formal discussion as to the advisability of employing or discharging a teacher, definitely, separately, and finally declare themselves as opposed to the election or discharge of the particular teacher under discussion, in the absence of subsequent action of the board to the contrary, their decision will amount to a valid binding determination of the board just as conclusively as though they had formally voted by means of the ordinary signs of aye or nay. The result is just as definite and certain. 43 C. J. 505, § 773.

This is precisely what occurred at the meeting of the board regarding the matter which is here in controversy. There can be no question in the present case that a majority of the members of the board separately, deliberately, and unequivocally decided, at a meeting in which the subject was formally discussed, that they did not desire to re-elect the petitioner for the ensuing year. Mr. Carpenter, the clerk, testified in this regard:

"Q. You are clerk of the Oakville School Board? A. I am.

"Q. Did the three trustees of the Oakville board meet * * * in your office on the 4th day of May of this year [1929]? A. Yes, they did. * * *

"Q. And at that time the three trustees were present. A. They were.

"Q. And you discussed several matters? A. Yes sir, including * * * the discussion of Miss Fleming's employment. * * * The question was brought about [regarding the election of] a teacher for the ensuing year and Mr. Del Bondio stated that he had quite a good deal of complaint about Miss Fleming * * * I also stated that I had complaints. I think it was Mr. Lincoln who said he thought that we should get a new teacher, a different teacher, for the next year, for Miss Fleming's room, in her place, and I stated I thought so, too. I agreed to it. There wasn't any objection raised to it. It was my understanding that it was unanimous and after the discussion had been completed I stated that I would notify Miss Fleming that she wasn't wanted for the next year as a teacher for the school. * * *

"Q. Were regular motions made and voted upon at the meeting? * * * A. No, not a regular vote. Matters were discussed and each one would give his opinion and we would agree. * * *

"Q. When the three trustees had expressed their opinion, why, a decision was made, is that the idea? A. Yes sir."

[4-6] The appellant asserts that the employment of the petitioner was not legally terminated for the reason that the clerk was not formally authorized to notify her of the action of the board to that effect. We are of the opinion the proceedings of the board amounted to a legal authorization for the clerk to notify the petitioner her services as a teacher of Oakville school were no longer desired. After the termination of her employment had been agreed upon at the trustees' meeting, the clerk then stated he would notify the petitioner her services were no longer desired. No member of the board dissented from this proposal. This statement was a natural suggestion of the clerk prompted by the decision to terminate her employment. It was a proposal to perform his duty and to fulfill the requirement of the statute. Silence on the part of the members of the board regarding this definite statement as to what the clerk proposed to do amounted to acquiescence and authorization on their part to send the notice. The board had definitely decided to dispense with her services. Moreover the names of two of the trustees were actually signed to the notice. This was itself evidence of an acquiescence and authorization to give the notice. Notifying the petitioner of this action of the board was a mere ministerial duty of the clerk. It required no definite authorization. The law requires it to be done as a part of the act terminating the employment. The delivery of this written notice to the petitioner on June 10th is conceded.

Regarding the authorization of the board for the clerk to serve this notice, Mr. Carpenter testified:

"Will you please state just what was stated at the end of the discussion as to the advisability of hiring Miss Fleming for the ensuing year? A. I said I would have to notify her that her services were not wanted for the ensuing year.

"Q. You stated that to the other two members of the board? A. I did.

"Q. That you would do that? A. I did.

"Q. Was there any objection made by either one of them? A. No objection at all."

From the foregoing evidence it seems clear the services of the petitioner as a probationary teacher in Oakville school district were formally terminated by decision of the board of trustees. The clerk duly notified Miss Fleming of such action by tacit authority of the board.

The judgment is affirmed.

MORTENSEN v. LOS ANGELES EXAMINER.

RICHARDSON v. SAME.

Civ. 4252, 4253.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Feb. 25, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 27, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 23, 1931.

1. Libel and slander 🔑42(1).

Truth and privilege of alleged libelous publication reporting judicial proceeding are not measured by legal sufficiency of charge made in the judicial proceeding (Civ. Code, §§ 45, 47, subd. 4).

2. Libel and slander 🔑19.

In determining whether publication is libelous, resort is first had to publication itself.

3. Libel and slander 🔑123(2).

Question whether publication is libelous is primarily for court to determine.

4. Libel and slander 🔑81, 86(1).

If publication is not libelous, neither inducement nor innuendo can make it so.

5. Libel and slander 🔑87.

In action for libel, allegations of falsity of charge must be as broad as charge itself.

6. Libel and slander 🔑42(1).

If report of divorce proceeding was truthful, in that it simply stated that person referred to had been designated as "co-respondent," statutory privilege against liability for libel in publishing report of judicial proceeding applied (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4).

In such circumstances the publication would be privileged under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4, since it is a well-known fact that, when a woman is referred to as a "co-respondent" in an action prosecuted by a wife against her husband, the general inference and the common and accepted meaning of the word is that the woman so named has been guilty of illicit relations, and that this is true, irrespective of whether the woman so named has in fact been made a co-respondent under the strict meaning of the language found in Code Civ. Proc. § 1019, and brought into action as a party thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Co-Respondent," see Words and Phrases.]

7. Libel and slander 🔑42(1).

If publication reporting judicial proceeding is substantially true and is inaccurate only as to details, it is not libelous (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4).

8. Libel and slander 🔑42(1).

Publication reporting judicial proceeding would not be excluded from statutory privilege by reason of inaccuracy or error in naming paper or writing in which allegation alleged to be libelous appears (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4).

9. Libel and slander 🔑42(1), 54.

No action for libel lies if gist of alleged libelous matter is established, or if alleged libelous matter is truthful statement of judicial proceeding (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4).

10. Libel and slander 🔑80.

Complaint in action for libel for publishing report of divorce proceeding, stating that plaintiff was charged as co-respondent therein, held demurrable (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4).

The complaint in the libel action limited the action to the technical fact that no complaint, cross-complaint, or answer was filed in the divorce action, naming the plaintiff as a co-respondent, and that no summons or pleading was ever served on the plaintiff, making her a party to the divorce action, but the complaint did not allege that there was not an instrument in writing filed in the divorce action, charging the plaintiff with all the acts which the public would generally assume one to have committed in order to become a co-respondent.

11. Libel and slander 🔑97.

Sustaining demurrer without leave to amend to complaint in libel action not stating facts sufficient to constitute cause of action held not abuse of discretion.

There was no abuse of discretion, since the whole complaint was framed on the theory of the insufficiency of the form of the charge in the divorce proceeding to show that plaintiff was a co-respondent as stated by defendant in publishing report of the divorce proceeding, and not upon the untruthfulness of the substance thereof.

12. Libel and slander 🔑7(16).

False charge of being co-respondent in divorce action is libelous per se.

13. Libel and slander 🔑42(1).

Publication of truthful report that charge of being co-respondent had been made during trial of divorce action is within statutory protection against liability for libel (Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 4).

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon R. Yankwich, Judge.

Separate actions by Lucille Mortensen and Athalie Richardson against the Los Angeles Examiner. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. The cases were presented on appeal on one set of briefs and were considered as one case.

Judgments affirmed.

Randall J. Hood, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lawler & Degnan and Alexander T. Sokolow, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The above-entitled actions are based upon the same publications made by the defendant, involve precisely the same points, are presented to us upon this appeal on one set of briefs, and are considered as one case. For convenience, however, we shall follow the procedure adopted in the briefs and consider by name only the case of Lucille Mortensen v. The Los Angeles Examiner, a corporation, it being understood, however, that whatever is said as to this case applies equally to the case of Athalie Richardson v. The Los Angeles Examiner.

At the time of the occurrences hereinafter referred to, the plaintiff was then Miss Lucille Johnsonbaugh, and thereafter married, and prior to the beginning of this action became known as Lucille Mortensen.

This appeal is taken from a judgment of dismissal entered upon an order sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend, interposed by the defendant to the plaintiff's complaint. The action is for damages on account of alleged libelous articles published in The Los Angeles Examiner, of and respecting the plaintiff.

The record shows that some time during the months of July and August, 1927, a certain action was being tried in the superior court of Los Angeles county, wherein Mrs. Madeline Irvine was asking a judgment for separate maintenance, and in which action James Irvine, Jr., had filed a cross-complaint asking for a divorce. In reporting the proceedings of this trial the Los Angeles Examiner, being a newspaper published in the city and county of Los Angeles, on the 29th day of July, 1927, published, among other things, the following: "Five Women Accused. Before the Irvine divorce suit got under way, following the completion of Mrs. Irvine's testimony, an additional pleading was filed in which the wife named five women as co-respondents. These women were: Mrs. Schylor, Miss Ruth Robinson, Miss Lucille Johnsonbaugh, Miss Ruth Baldwin and Miss Athalie Richardson." The account as to what was stated in Mr. Irvine's cross-complaint not being material here, it is omitted. This publication is set forth in count 1 of the complaint, and made the basis for the first cause of action. The complaint, as a separate cause of action, alleges that on or about the 1st day of August, 1927, the defendant published the following alleged defamatory and libelous matter:

"$500 a month alimony for wife granted. Four women rancher accused of associating with cleared by Judge Guerin's decision.

"James Irvine, Jr., millionaire Orange County rancher, was yesterday granted a divorce from Madeline Irvine as a climax to a bitterly fought and sensational trial. The decision was handed down by Superior Judge Walter Guerin. Briefly and tersely the judgment of the court found that Mrs. Irvine was guilty of cruel treatment toward her husband and that his charge that she associated with other men was true. At the same time the court held that Mrs. Irvine had failed to prove her charges of misconduct against Irvine. Thus was the good name of four women cleared.

"$500 a month alimony. Mrs. Irvine, the court stated, shall receive from Irvine $500 a month alimony for a period of five years beginning January 1, 1928. In the event that she remarries alimony shall be reduced to $250 a month. Mrs. Irvine was also allowed additional attorney's fees at $2500, making a total of $7500, paid to her counsel, Lewis Pink.

"Mrs. Irvine sued for separate maintenance, asking $5000 a month alimony, and alleging that her husband was possessed of many millions. She made a general charge of misconduct against him and at the opening of the trial she filed an affidavit setting forth the names of these women. Irvine, represented by attorneys Scarborough and Bowen, filed a cross-complaint for divorce. He charged that his wife caused him mental suffering by getting drunk and dancing in public places. He also charged that she had been indiscreet.

"'Charges Unproven.' Judge Guerin said in his judgment: 'I have carefully considered the evidence and there is a sharp conflict in the testimony. I find that the plaintiff wholly failed to establish any allegations in her complaint.'"

And for a third and distinct cause of action the complaint sets forth an alleged libelous publication which appeared in the Los Angeles Examiner on the 28th day of July, 1927, as follows, to wit:

"Four women accused by Mrs. Irvine. Millionaire husband attracted away from home, declares wife, asking $1000 a month.

"'Love ended.' Mrs. Madeline Irvine, who yesterday (in) court (said) four women caused husband to break marriage vows. Picture.

"Mrs. Madeline Irvine yesterday told the story of domestic unhappiness with James Irvine, millionaire son of the famous Irvine ranch land baron, and asked Superior Judge Walter Guerin to grant her separate maintenance with $1000 a month allowance.

"In her recital of marital storms, Mrs. Irvine named four young women, who, she charged, were responsible for her husband's asserted straying from his home hearth.

"Week-end party. Although the allegations were based for the most part upon suspicious circumstances, Mrs. Irvine produced a witness who made a direct accusation against Miss Lucille Johnsonbaugh. This episode, something like motion-picture comedy, occurred during a week-end party at the Irvine ranch and took place on the second floor of the house after all the guests supposedly had retired in the rooms to which they had been assigned.

"The witness, Mrs. F. Turley, said that she had been lingering in the hallway, having a chat with a companion, when she heard voices that indicated to her that Miss Johnsonbaugh was not in her own room.

"Stood in hallway. While standing in the hallway, the witness said, she discovered that her suspicions were well founded and gave testimony tending to show that a love-making episode had been carried on. Mrs.

Irvine's part in the legal row will be concluded this morning when she is cross-examined by attorney Scarborough, representing her husband, Attorney Lewis Pink, representing the wife, then will rest the separate maintenance suit."

By reference, the first, second, third, fourth, seventh, and eighth paragraphs of the first count set forth in the complaint were made parts of both the second and third counts contained in the complaint. The fifth and sixth paragraphs in the first count of the complaint contained all that is really vital to a determination of the correctness of the order of the trial court. These paragraphs are as follows:

"V. That said defendant, by said article, meant to state, publish and declare, and did publish, state and declare that this plaintiff had been named as a co-respondent in the action at that time pending in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, wherein one Madeline Irvine was the plaintiff and James Irvine, Jr., was the defendant, in a separate maintenance suit in which action said defendant had filed a cross-complaint against said plaintiff for divorce, and further intended by the terms of said article so published, to state, publish and declare that this plaintiff was accused of being one of the five co-respondents in said article declared to have been named by said plaintiff in said proceedings; that the term 'co-respondent,' so used in said article, as aforesaid, does now, and at all times herein mentioned has had and possessed a well defined and well understood meaning, in that the same is understood to mean a woman or a man charged with adultery in a divorce suit or in a separate maintenance action, and as such proceeded against together with the defendant therein; that by thus designating this plaintiff in said article as being one of the co-respondents so named by said plaintiff Madeline Irvine in said proceedings, it was understood to mean, by those persons reading the said article, that this plaintiff was at that time being proceeded against by the said Madeline Irvine in said proceedings as a co-respondent of and with the said James Irvine, Jr., and that this plaintiff was by virtue thereof charged in said proceedings by said Madeline Irvine with having committed adultery with the said James Irvine, Jr., defendant in said proceedings.

"VI. That said article so published, as aforesaid, was false, untrue and defamatory; that said Madeline Irvine, plaintiff in said proceedings, at no time in said proceedings named this plaintiff as a co-respondent; that no copy of the complaint and summons in said action was ever at any time served upon this plaintiff; that this plaintiff was not a party to said proceedings; that the complaint in said action filed by said Madeline Irvine does not and did not name this plaintiff as a co-respondent; that no amendment to said complaint so charging this plaintiff with having committed adultery with the defendant therein was ever filed in said action; that in truth and in fact the said action instituted by Madeline Irvine was based and grounded upon the charge of cruelty and the acts of cruelty committed by the said James Irvine, Jr., defendant therein, to and toward the said Madeline Irvine."

The paragraphs of the complaint relative to the defamatory character of the publications, the injury suffered, etc., need not be set forth herein, as they appear to be in the usual form found in complaints based upon alleged libelous publications.

Two sections of the Civil Code are involved in this proceeding, section 45 thereof specifying that libel is a false and untruthful publication which has a tendency to expose any one to hatred, contempt, ridicule, etc.; and subdivision 4 of section 47 relative to privileged communications. This subdivision eliminates from the law of libel a fair and true report without malice, of a judicial, legislative, or other public official proceeding. Much learning and industry have been displayed by counsel in discussing the meaning of the word "co-respondent." In this particular, section 1019, Code of Civil Procedure, is mentioned as being the legal definition of the word. This section, however, does not contain the word "co-respondent"; it simply provides that when, in an action for divorce, adultery is charged against either party, and the person with whom such adultery is alleged to have been committed by such party is named in any of the pleadings, a copy of such pleading must be personally served on such named person, etc., and that the person so served shall have the right to appear and plead and be heard in the cause. About the most succinct definition of the word which we have found is that given in 13 C. J. 1236, to wit: "A person summoned to answer a bill, petition or libel, together with another respondent. This term is now chiefly used to designate the person charged with adultery with the respondent in a suit for divorce for that cause, and joined as a defendant with such party." Supporting the text a number of authorities are cited in the footnotes.

[1] Irrespective of the legal and technical definition of the word "co-respondent," it is a well-known fact that the general acceptation of the meaning of the word now is that a woman, when named as co-respondent, has been guilty of illicit relations with the man named in the action for divorce, and while technically the word relates to, and its more general use in pleadings means, a person named as a third party in an action for divorce, the general meaning of the word, and the general inference to be drawn from the use thereof, is that the person named or referred to has been guilty of acts of unchastity, irrespective of whether such person has or has not, in the strict legal sense of the word, been made a party in an action prosecuted to obtain a divorce on the grounds of adultery. In other words, when a woman is referred to as a "co-respondent" in an action prosecuted by a wife against her husband, the general inference, and the common and accepted meaning of the word, is that the woman so named has been guilty of illicit relations, and that this is true irrespective of whether the woman so named has in fact been made a co-respondent under the strict meaning of the language found in section 1019 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and brought into the action as a party thereto. Thus, if a woman is named in any of the pleadings, or in any of the papers filed in an action, whether for divorce or for separate maintenance, as a co-respondent, the natural and usual conclusion to be drawn from such naming is that such person is of questionable character. We think the result is exactly the same, whether a person is named as a co-respondent in a complaint and answer, or an affidavit or a deposition, or any other instrument in writing which may become a part of the proceeding or record of the proceedings in an action pending between husband and wife, whether for divorce or for separate maintenance. The legal sufficiency of the instrument in writing to constitute the person a co-respondent in which the charge appears is wholly immaterial as to the effect thereof if it appears in such a manner as to give to the general public the impression that the person named is guilty of any of the acts above named. It is the fact of the charge, and not of the sufficiency thereof, that reflects upon the character of the person assailed. We make this preliminary statement because it goes to the very heart of the controversy involved in this action. If, in any of the papers, whether denominated a complaint, an answer, a cross-complaint, an affidavit or a deposition, filed in the action of Irvine v. Irvine, appears a charge against the woman named as being co-respondent, and the defendant, in its report thereof, stated that such a charge had been made, then and in that case the publication was privileged under the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 47, Civil Code. In other words, the truth of the publication, and its being privileged, are not measured by the legal sufficiency of the charge, if the charge is made.

[2-4] In determining whether the publication is libelous, resort is first had to the publication itself. If it is not libelous, the fact that it is unpleasant is of no moment, and the question of libel or no libel is primarily for the court to determine. If the publication is not libelous, neither inducement nor innuendo can make it so. The inducement may state the facts so as to disclose to the court the person intended, and the innuendo, to explain what is intended, and the usual intendment of the language. In the case at bar there is no need for inducement; the article itself states the names of the women. The innuendo sets forth the meaning and application of the word "co-respondent." From what we have stated it is apparent that the innuendo is of little moment in this case, save and except as coupled with the further pleading, which we will later consider, relative to the sufficiency of the charge of libel in this action.

[5, 6] Before considering further the sufficiency of the counts of the complaint which we have set forth in full, we may state that the law appears to be well settled that the allegations of the falsity of the charge must be as broad as the charge itself. In other words, it is not sufficient to allege that a charge of being a co-respondent is false and untrue, and then limit the meaning of this allegation by setting forth that in no complaint or answer filed in the action the charge of being a co-respondent does not appear, or that the person alleged to be libeled has not been made a co-respondent by reason of not having been served with any summons or complaint in the action, or brought into the action as a party thereto, as it might very well be true that the party alleged to be libeled by being named as a co-respondent has not been made a party to the action, has not been served with summons, but has been so characterized in some paper filed in the action, or even in the testimony adduced at the trial of an action. If named at all as a co-respondent in the action and publication thereof, if truthful in that it simply states that the person referred to has been so designated, the privilege accorded by subdivision 4 of section 47 of the Civil Code applies. The principles which we have laid down find support in the following cases: Bathrick v. Detroit Post, 50 Mich. 629, 16 N. W. 172, 45 Am. Rep. 63; Hearne v. De Young, 119 Cal. 670, 52 P. 150, 499; Snively v. Record Publishing Co., 185 Cal. 565, 198 P. 1; Chavez v. Times-Mirror Co., 185 Cal. 20, 195 P. 666; Newby v. Times Mirror Co., 173 Cal. 387, 160 P. 233, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 186; Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 116 P. 530.

[7-9] Again, if the article published is substantially true and is inaccurate only as to details which it relates, it is not libelous, nor would the publication be excluded from the protection afforded it by subdivision 4 of section 47 of the Civil Code by reason of any inaccuracy or error in naming the paper or characterizing the writing in which the allegation alleged to be libelous appears. Hearne v. De Young, supra; Skrocki v. Stahl, 14 Cal. App. 1, 110 P. 957. If the gist or the sting of the alleged libelous matter is shown to be true, or a truthful statement of the proceedings, no action lies. A restatement of the charge is pertinent here. It is as follows: "Before the Irvine divorce suit got under way, following the completion of Mrs. Irvine's testimony, an additional pleading was filed in which the wife named five women as co-respondents." The gist of the alleged libel or the sting of the charge lies in the naming of the five women as co-respondents, not in whether the written instrument filed in the action was or was not correctly denominated as a pleading, or whether the five women were or were not technically named as co-respondents. If so named in any instrument filed, as we have stated, the mere inaccuracy or error as to naming of the written instrument becomes wholly immaterial. Likewise, if the five women were named as having illicit relations with the husband, then the characterizing of those having such relations as being co-respondents would constitute no inaccuracy or variation from a correct report of the proceedings sufficient to lay the basis of an action for libel.

[10] In the light of what we have said, we may now examine the sixth paragraph of the plaintiff's complaint, to-wit: "That said article so published, as aforesaid, was false, untrue and defamatory; that said Madeline Irvine, plaintiff in said proceedings, at no time in said proceedings named this plaintiff as a co-respondent; that no copy of the complaint and summons in said action was ever at any time served upon this plaintiff; that this plaintiff was not a party to said proceedings; that the complaint in said action filed by said Madeline Irvine, does not, and did not name this plaintiff as a co-respondent; that no amendment to said complaint, so charging this plaintiff with having committed adultery with the defendant therein, was ever filed in said action; that in truth and in fact the said action instituted by Madeline Irvine was based and grounded upon the charge of cruelty, and the acts of cruelty committed by the said James Irvine, Jr., defendant therein, to and toward the said Madeline Irvine." Here, the gravamen of the charge is limited to the fact that no complaint filed by the plaintiff charged the women named as co-respondents. That no summons in said action was ever served, and that the plaintiff here was not made a party in the action of Irvine v. Irvine. That no amendment to the complaint in the Irvine action was filed charging this plaintiff with having committed adultery, etc., the whole action being limited to the technical fact that no complaint, cross-complaint, or answer was filed in the action of Irvine v. Irvine, naming this plaintiff as a co-respondent, and that no summons or pleading was ever served upon this plaintiff making her a party to the action of Irvine v. Irvine. It does not appear, nor is it alleged that there was not an instrument in writing filed in the action of Irvine v. Irvine, charging the plaintiff with all the acts which the public would generally assume one to have committed in order to become a co-respondent. The whole complaint is based upon the narrow, technical, and circumscribed basis that the plaintiff in this action was not so denominated in particular pleadings filed in the Irvine action. And here, again, a narrow, limited, and technical meaning is given to the word "pleading," in order to lay the basis for an action of damages, and likewise prevent the truth of the publication to be shown, because, forsooth, the charge may have only appeared in an affidavit or a deposition, and not in such a manner as to bring it within the definition and meaning which counsel have attached to section 1019 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But little attention need be given to the second and third alleged causes of action; what we have heretofore said applies to them, but a reading of the second and third causes of action shows clearly that they are not libelous. All they do show in relation to the women charged, without naming them, is that the court held that the charges were unproven and were untrue. Nor does it appear from either count that the proceedings, a report of which was published, did not take place, and, the language being clearly not libelous, it is not possible, either by inducement or innuendo, to give the articles a sinister meaning which does not appear upon the face thereof. The whole case appears to be based, not upon the falsity of the imputation, but upon the untruthfulness of the publication of the form in which it was made, which led, we think, to the order of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend.

[11] From what we have stated, the conclusion is unescapable that the demurrer was properly sustained. The question then occurs: Has there been any abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court? Upon this question nothing further appears in the record than the simple order.

In the case of Philbrook v. Randall, 195 Cal. 95, on page 105, 231 P. 739, 742, we find the following: "It is the rule that the granting of permission to amend pleadings is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court (Doolittle v. McConnell, 178 Cal. 697, 174 P. 305), and courts should allow amendment liberally (Gould v. Stafford, 101 Cal. 32, 35 P. 429; San Joaquin Valley Bank v. Gate City Oil Co., 170 Cal. 250, 149 P. 557), but, where the record does not show that leave to amend was asked for (Butler v. Burt, 6 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 917, 68 P. 973; Duvall v. White, 46 Cal. App. 305, 189 P. 324), there is no abuse of discretion nor ground for reversal especially where the record shows that several attempts at amendment had been made. [Citing a number of cases.] Where an order sustaining a demurrer is silent as to leave to amend, judgment may nevertheless be affirmed (citing cases) nor will error be presumed where the record fails to show that leave to amend was asked for and refused." Citing Aalwyn v. Cobe, 168 Cal. 165, 142 P. 79. See, also, Stewart v. Douglass, 148 Cal. 511, 83 P. 699.

In Hansen v. Carr, 73 Cal. App. 511, 238 P. 1048, 1051, we find the following: "The granting of leave to amend after a demurrer is sustained is, of course, a matter resting primarily in the discretion of the trial court. The refusal to grant such permission will not be disturbed upon appeal in the absence of a showing of abuse of that discretion. Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 252, 81 P. 516; Stewart v. Douglass, supra. Where, therefore, the record fails to disclose that leave to amend was requested, and that the application was denied by the trial court, we must assume that no offer of an amendment was made, or otherwise we would be asked to hold that there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in denying something that was never sought until after the appeal was taken." (Citing a number of authorities.)

In Whyte v. City of Sacramento, 65 Cal. App. 534, 224 P. 1008, 1012, this court had before it the same question, and there said: "The privilege of amending, after trial of the issue of law raised by demurrer is not one of right, but one resting in the discretion of the trial court. * * * If the plaintiff desired again to amend, she should have applied to the court below, and if refused, exception should have been taken. It is too late to make the point for the first time in this court, when nothing appears on the record to show an abuse of discretion"—citing a number of cases.

We do not need to review the cases cited by appellant relative to amendments further than to state that an examination of them shows that they are readily distinguishable from the case at bar. There, in each case, the complaint was held to have stated a cause of action. Here, the complaint as filed and presented to us upon appeal is subject to a general demurrer as not stating facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, for the reasons which we have hereinbefore set forth, which may be succinctly stated as follows: It does not appear that the plaintiff was not charged with being a co-respondent in an instrument in writing filed in the case of Irvine v. Irvine, nor does it appear that the imputation of being such is alleged to be untrue. The whole complaint is framed upon the theory of the insufficiency of the form of the charge, and not upon the untruthfulness of the substance thereof.

[12, 13] In addition to the authorities which we have cited showing the absolute insufficiency of such allegations, we may refer to 36 C. J. 1273, where the subject of immaterial inaccuracies is treated. That a false charge of being a co-respondent in a divorce action is libelous per se may be admitted, but the publication of a truthful report that such a charge has been made during the trial of an action is clearly within the protection afforded by subdivision 4 of section 47 of the Civil Code.

The judgments are affirmed.

Mutual water company stockholder's right to water need not be appurtenant to particular lands (Civ. Code, § 324).

3. Constitutional law ⚷121(2).

Waters and water courses ⚷216.

Amendments permitting irrigation districts to acquire stock of water companies apply to irrigation districts organized prior to amendments and do not impair obligation of contract (St. 1897, p. 258, § 15, as amended by St. 1927, p. 23; Const. Cal. art. 4, § 31, as amended in 1926; Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, and Amend. 14, § 1).

St. 1897, p. 258, § 15, as amended by St. 1927, p. 23, provided that irrigation districts could acquire and hold stock of corporations owning water and water rights, for the purpose of acquiring water and water rights and other property necessary for their uses. Const. Cal. art. 4, § 31, as amended in 1926, was a constitutional provision to the same effect preceding the enactment of the statute.

4. Constitutional law ⚷121(2).

Legislature, in enacting amendments or statutes relative to organization, powers, and administration of municipal or other public corporations, does not make contract with individuals embraced within corporation, within federal Constitution (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, and Amend. 14, § 1).

5. Waters and water courses ⚷228.

Powers of irrigation district, regarding management, are not limited to law existing when district is organized.

6. Waters and water courses ⚷228.

Irrigation district may construct irrigation system, buy existing water system, enlarge its system, and increase its assessments to acquire and operate such additions.

7. Constitutional law ⚷42.

Water company, without showing injury, could not complain that allowing irrigation district to hold stock in mutual water company impaired obligation of contract between landowners of district and district (St. 1897, p. 258, § 15, as amended by St. 1927, p. 23; Const. Cal. art. 4, § 31, as amended in 1926; Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, and Amend. 14, § 1).

8. Mandamus ⚷133.

Mandamus to enforce rights of irrigation district as shareholder in mutual water company held properly granted, notwithstanding that when contract resulting in purchase of shares was entered into such purchase was not legal (St. 1919, p. 661; St. 1897, p. 258, § 15, as amended by St. 1927, p. 23; Const. Cal. art. 4, § 31, as amended in 1926).

> In December, 1924, irrigation district contracted to buy shares of the capital stock of certain mutual water companies; it being agreed that until such water rights were purchased the district should lease from seller the right to use the water at an agreed rental. St. 1897, p. 258, § 15, as amended by St. 1927, p. 23, and Const. Cal. art. 4, § 31, as amended in 1926, providing that irrigation districts could acquire stock in water companies, were not passed until after contract was executed; but St. 1919, p. 661, was in effect at the time, and expressly authorized an irrigation district to acquire water rights by lease. Only that part of the contract relating to the lease of the rights was carried out prior to the time the law was changed.

9. Waters and water courses ⚷252.

Articles of incorporation of mutual water company restricting use of water to land "owned or possessed" by stockholders did not exclude owners of land in irrigation district which was stockholder in water company.

> The amended articles of incorporation of the water company provided that no water of the company should be used on any other land than such as may at the time be "owned or possessed" by its stockholders. The irrigation district owned no land, but claimed the water rights on behalf of the owners of land in the irrigation district.

10. Waters and water courses ⚷224.

Irrigation district owning stock in water company has legal title to stock, but landowners within district are beneficial and equitable owners thereof.

11. Waters and water courses ⚷252.

Resolution of water company's board of directors restricting use of water so as to discriminate against irrigation district, a shareholder, held void as effecting discrimination.

> The resolution was adopted more than two months after the stock was issued to the irrigation district. The resolution restricted the use of the water of the mutual water company to certain land, but provided that such rule should not apply to the use of such water by stockholders on land on which the water was then used or had been used in the past which would deprive the irrigation district of its rights as a stockholder. Had the resolution been effective, it would have worked a complete change in the purpose for which the corporation was formed.

12. Corporations ⚷54.

Corporate by-laws must be reasonable.

13. Corporations ⚷54.

Corporate by-laws must operate equally upon all persons of same class.

14. Mandamus ⚷178.

Mandamus judgment in water rights dispute specifying proper proportion of water due irrigation district, held not void for uncertainty, although details of method of distributing water were omitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Mandamus by the Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District against the Wutchumna Water Company and another. Judgment for petitioner, and Wutchumna Water Company appeals.

Affirmed.

Walter M. Gleason, of Oakland, for appellant.

Sloss & Ackerman, of San Francisco, W. G. Irving, of Riverside, and Power, McFadzean & Crowe, of Visalia, for respondents.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an appeal from an order and judgment of the superior court of Tulare county in a proceeding brought by the Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District, seeking the issuance of a writ of mandate to compel the Wutchumna Water Company to deliver to the petitioner, certain water from the main canal of said water company. It appears that the Kaweah river, shortly after it emerges from the foothills of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, divides into two channels at a point known as "McKay Point." Below that point the northerly channel is known as the St. Johns river and the southerly channel is known as the Kaweah river. Both of these channels run approximately parallel with each other in a general westerly direction, through the county of Tulare. These two channels traverse a large comparatively level delta area, comprising thousands of acres of land, which is known as the Kaweah Delta. The Wutchumna Water Company is a corporation of the type familiarly known as a mutual water company, although it is not strictly such a company, as its water is not appurtenant to any particular land. It was incorporated in 1872, its articles of incorporation beginning as follows: "We, the undersigned, being desirous of forming a corporation for the purpose of Agriculture and Irrigating and the construction and maintaining of ditches or canals to convey water to Visalia and other places in Tulare County, for the purpose of using the water conveyed therein, do hereby certify and declare as follows, viz.:"

The entire outstanding stock of this company is 91 shares, and its principal purpose is to distribute among its stockholders water diverted by it from the Kaweah river, pursuant to two distinct and long-standing rights of appropriation. By the first of these, a considerable portion of the flow of the Kaweah river is diverted into a large canal owned by the company and known as the Wutchumna ditch, which leads out of the northerly bank of the Kaweah river a short distance upstream from McKay point. This ditch runs in a westerly direction for several miles to a large storage reservoir, known as Bravo lake. Upon leaving this reservoir, said ditch flows in a southwesterly direction for about seven miles, when it crosses the St. Johns river and then continues in a westerly direction for approximately ten miles. The lands of the company's stockholders are scattered along the entire course of the ditch and are served by laterals and side ditches from the main canal. A short distance downstream from the point where this ditch crosses the St. Johns river, the company has a second diversion, known as Barton cut, where water is taken from the St. Johns river and added to the water flowing in the ditch just described. About a mile and a half southwesterly from Bravo lake and about six miles northeasterly from Barton cut is a point in the Wutchumna ditch, known as "Lee Drop."

The Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District is, and since 1915 has been, an irrigation district organized under the Irrigation District Act of California (St. 1897, p. 254), and amendments thereto. The district, which is entirely within the county of Tulare, embraces an area of about 16,000 acres, 9,000 acres thereof being planted to permanent crops, such as "oranges, citrus trees and deciduous fruit," which require irrigation during the irrigating season. Not having sufficient water to irrigate the land already in cultivation, and also for the purposes of securing additional water for the irrigation of lands within its boundaries, in December, 1924, the district made a contract with one H. R. Huebert whereby Huebert agreed to buy shares of the capital stock of certain mutual water companies, including the Wutchumna Ditch Company, and to sell and convey to the district the water and water rights represented by said shares. It was further agreed that until such water and water rights were purchased from Huebert by the district, the district should lease from him the right to use this water at an agreed rental, including the payment of all sums that Huebert should be required to pay as assessments to the several water companies. Pursuant to this agreement, Huebert acquired 18⅓ shares of stock in the Wutchumna Water Company. The purchase price of these shares was $93,921.96, and the irrigation district also paid to the water company $12,084.60 in assessments thereon. Since June 1, 1928, 16.33 shares of this stock have been issued in the name of the Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District. In order to receive its proportion of the water diverted from the Kaweah river by the water company, the irrigation district, at an expense of $62,000, constructed a pipe line and conduit from a point near Lee Drop to a tract of land owned by the district, known as the Rancho de Kaweah. While this construction work was under way, the Wutchumna Water Company on October 6, 1928, served upon the district a written notice stating that it was the established policy of the company "that none of its waters shall be diverted for non-riparian uses," and that it was not the intention of the water company to permit the district to divert any water from their ditches for use on nonriparian lands and any efforts to so divert water would be resisted to the utmost. On November 20, 1928, the district served on the water company a written demand that it deliver to the district at the point known as Lee Drop, 16.33/91sts of the water diverted by it from the Kaweah river, and that it construct a suitable headgate at the expense of the district for the diversion of such water.

On December 3, 1928, the irrigation district commenced this proceeding, seeking a writ of mandate to enforce its right to receive its proportion of water as a stockholder in the Wutchumna Water Company. Certain lower riparian owners asked permission to intervene in the action, in opposition to the claims of the district, and permission being denied, have taken another appeal, which is now pending. After a trial, judgment was entered declaring the irrigation district to be the owner of 16.33 shares of stock in the water company, and as such stockholder, entitled to receive at Lee Drop, $^{16.33}/_{91}$sts of the water flowing in the main canal from time to time. From this judgment, this appeal is taken.

[1] Mandamus is a proper remedy where a stockholder in such a corporation as the Wutchumna Water Company is improperly denied its proportionate share of water. Miller v. Imperial Water Co., 156 Cal. 27, 103 P. 227, 228, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 372. In that case the court said: "We have the case of a member of a corporation who is improperly precluded by the corporation from participating in the only practical right resulting from such membership, that of having water available for the purpose furnished at cost upon his land, in proportion to the amount of stock held by him. He is seeking to enforce a plain right based entirely upon his membership in a mutual water company, deprivation of which right would practically exclude him for the time from all privileges of membership, in a case where it must be held under the decisions, there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, in the ordinary course of law. It is one of the well-recognized offices of the remedy by mandamus to enforce the plain rights of stockholders or members of corporations in the absence of any other adequate remedy. * * * In the case at bar, the stockholder's right to have water furnished on his land is not based on any special contract entered into by him with the corporation, but is an inseparable adjunct of his membership, and it is a plain duty resting on the corporation in the exercise of its corporate functions to furnish him such water."

The right of a stockholder in such a corporation as the appellant is clearly described in the following quotation from 2 Weil on Water Rights (3d Ed.) § 1266: "Mutual companies are usually such that shares of stock represent rights to specific quantities of water, and the stockholder's right to a supply rests upon his stock and not upon his status as a member of the public, the company being formed to supply water to its stockholders only."

[2] Such rights are well recognized in California. Barton v. Riverside Water Co., 155 Cal. 509, 101 P. 790, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331; Thayer v. California Development Co., 164 Cal. 117, 128 P. 21. While such a stockholder's right to water may be made appurtenant to certain lands (Civ. Code, § 324), not only is this not essential (Bank of Visalia v. Smith, 146 Cal. 398, 81 P. 542), but in the instant case, appellant concedes in its brief that the water it is diverting "is not appurtenant to any particular land."

[3-8] The appellant makes a general argument that for a number of reasons the respondent is not entitled to a writ of mandate, and then more specifically argues that the particular judgment entered in this case is void. It is first contended that the respondent is not a stockholder in the appellant corporation. On November 2, 1926, the following provision was added to section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution of this state: "Provided, further, that irrigation districts for the purpose of acquiring water and water rights and other property necessary for their uses and purposes, may acquire and hold the stock of corporations, domestic or foreign, owning waters, water rights, canals, waterworks, franchises or concessions subject to the same obligations and liabilities as are imposed by law upon all other stockholders in such corporations."

Thereafter, the Irrigation District Act (section 15) was amended to permit irrigation districts to acquire such stock (Stats. 1927, p. 23). Appellant contends that these amendments do not apply to any irrigation district organized prior thereto, because if they were construed to apply to such prior existing districts, they would be repugnant to section 10, article 1, and to section 1 of Amendment 14 of the Constitution of the United States, as impairing the obligation of a contract. Reliance is placed upon the case of Merchants' Bank v. Escondido Irr. Dist., 144 Cal. 329, 77 P. 937. In that case, the court was considering an amendment to section 17 of the Wright Act which attempted to give to the board of directors of an irrigation district, power to hypothecate all of the property of the district as additional security for bonds to be issued. Because the legal title only of such property is vested in the district and this legal title is held in trust for the landowners, who are the real beneficial owners of the property, it was held that the Legislature could not authorize the directors of a district to thus dispose of that property, without impairing the constitutional rights of the landowners. However, in referring to the case just mentioned, the Supreme Court in the later case of La Mesa, etc., Irr. Dist. v. Halley, 197 Cal. 50, 239 P. 719, 723, used the following language: "While the conclusion was, we think, correct as applied to the facts of that particular case, it is being attempted by the respondents herein to give to its language an application far beyond the intendment of the court in that decision. It was not our intention in that case to hold that, as to the general powers of irrigation districts, or as to the methods of their management and conduct, or as to the method or manner of issuing bonds for the purpose of carrying on the work of said districts or fulfilling the purposes of their organization, such districts were to be limited or the people or property owners within the same confined to the precise terms of the statutes in force at the time of the organization thereof. Indeed, in later cases, and with respect to public agencies and utilities of the same general character as irrigation districts, the courts of this state have laid down a different rule."

Appellant contends that the La Mesa Case merely distinguishes between public rights and private rights, and that where private rights are involved, any such amendment impairs the obligation of a contract. It is argued that this constitutional provision against impairing the obligation of a contract had the effect of protecting the landowners in the respondent district from the obligations and liabilities which ownership of stock in such a corporation as the Wutchumna Water Company might impose upon them; and that, therefore, the amendments here in question, if construed to apply to irrigation districts established prior to their enactment, would be void. We are unable to agree with this contention. The amendments we are considering do not affect any vested rights, and go no farther than to enlarge the powers of irrigation districts along the line of one of the most important purposes of such a district, which is, to secure an adequate supply of water. Not only is the Legislature, in enacting amendments or statutes relative to the organization, powers, and administration of municipal or other public corporations, exercising powers of government and not making a contract with the individuals embraced within the territory covered by such a corporation (La Mesa, etc., Irr. Dist. v. Halley, supra), but this particular change in the law affected only the management of an irrigation district and the manner in which it might carry out the purposes for which it was organized. In such matters, an irrigation district is not limited to the law existing at the time the district is organized. The argument that this particular amendment might result in an increased expense to a landowner in the district over that contemplated when the district was formed, is by no means conclusive. It is well settled that an irrigation district has the power to construct an irrigation system, to buy an existing water system, or in various ways to enlarge its system, and to increase its assessments for the purpose of acquiring and operating such additions. More adequate service may well result in increased expense. To permit an irrigation district to acquire increased facilities through the purchase of stock in water companies, the equivalent of purchasing additional water rights or water systems, is no different in principle. Nor do we find any warrant in the authorities for the proposition that in thus dealing with one of the state's political subdivisions, a statutory amendment enlarging or limiting the powers of such a subdivision, is intended to apply only to subdivisions thereafter created, in the absence of a direct provision to that effect. A further consideration is that, in any event, no obligation of any contract with the appellant has been impaired, and in the absence of a showing of injury on its part, it may not be heard. Hooker v. Burr, 137 Cal. 663, 70 P. 778, 99 Am. St. Rep. 17; Hooker v. Burr, 194 U. S. 415, 24 S. Ct. 706, 48 L. Ed. 1046; Scheerer & Co. v. Deming, 154 Cal. 138, 97 P. 155. In this connection, appellant further argues that at the time the original contract was made by the irrigation district with H. R. Huebert, as above referred to, it was illegal for the district to acquire stock in the appellant company; and that this contract was such a fraud upon the landowners in the district that, under the familiar rule that a court will not issue a writ of mandate to assist in carrying out an illegal purpose, the writ must be denied—citing 38 Cor. Jur. 556; 16 Cal. Jur. 769. At the time this contract was entered into, section 15 of the Irrigation District Act expressly authorized such a district to acquire water rights by lease (Stats. 1919, p. 661). That portion of this contract was then legal, and that was the only part carried out prior to the time the law was changed. Conceding that such a writ of mandate as is here prayed for would not have been issued prior to the change in the law, it fully appears that at the time this writ was applied for, the acts sought to be coerced were not forbidden by law, and that they did not tend to aid an unlawful purpose.

[9, 10] The appellant next urges that the respondent irrigation district intends to furnish the water claimed to various landowners within the district, and that the district does not itself own or possess the lands on which the water claimed is to be used. It therefore justifies its refusal to furnish water to respondent by a clause in its amended articles of incorporation, which reads as follows: "No water of this company shall be used on any other land than such as may at the time be owned or possessed by its stockholders, or one or more of them. * * *"

The articles of incorporation of appellant were amended in February, 1914, by eliminating all reference in the original articles to "selling" water, and by adding a provision relative to furnishing water to its stockholders, which included the clause above quoted with a further provision, the whole of this part reading as follows: "* * * Provided, however, that no water of this company shall be used on any other land than such as may at the time be owned or possessed by its stockholders, or one or more of them, and provided further, that this corporation shall not use such water or its property as a public utility company, but solely for the use and benefit of its stockholders for the irrigation of their respective lands, and for watering their stock, domestic uses and other useful purposes for their benefit as a private use."

It seemes clear that these changes were made for the purpose of rendering it less likely that the corporation would be placed under the restrictions of the Public Utilities Act and subject to the regulation of the railroad commission. All of the changes are so worded as to make it clear that the corporation is merely distributing water to its stockholders, and is not in the business of selling water to the public. Not only is it apparent that this proviso was put into the amended articles for a purpose other than for the strict interpretation attributed to it by the appellant, but the words used, "owned or possessed," should be liberally construed. These words indicate no more than a limiting of the obligation to furnish water to those entitled to it through ownership of stock in the company, rather than an obligation to furnish water to the general public. It would be unreasonable to hold that they apply, in a highly technical sense, to land owned by the party holding the stock, rather than to land owned or possessed by the party who really owns such stock and who is entitled to the rights and benefits represented thereby. If a landowner entitled to a certain proportion of the water distributed by appellant should borrow money, giving a deed of trust upon his land as security therefor, and as further security should transfer his stock in appellant corporation to the trustee, it could hardly be held that he would be no longer entitled to receive the water represented by the stock. The same thing would apply if a minor should happen to own land entitled to such water, but the stock should actually stand in the name of his guardian. As was said by the Supreme Court in the case of Miller v. Imperial Water Co., 156 Cal. 27, 103 P. 227, 229, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 372: "The terms 'owning,' 'owner,' and 'owned' depend somewhat for their signification upon the connection in which they are used. They are not technical, but general terms, and are therefore liberally construed; 'the precise meaning depending upon the nature of the subject-matter and the connection in which' they are used."

While the legal title to the stock here in question rests in the respondent irrigation district, the beneficial and equitable owners thereof are the landowners within that district, whose funds have purchased the stock. Merchants' Bank v. Escondido Irr. Dist., supra; Tulare Irrigation District v. Collins, 154 Cal. 440, 97 P. 1124; Hall v. Superior Court, 198 Cal. 373, 245 P. 814; California Irrigation District Act, § 29. In distributing the water to the landowners within its boundaries, the respondent will be applying the water upon lands owned by the real owners of the stock in question. Under these circumstances, we think that such lands are owned or possessed by the "stockholders" of appellant "or one or more of them," within the meaning of the clause referred to.

[11-13] Appellant's main contention, in connection with its claim that the respondent is not entitled to any writ of mandate, is that, notwithstanding any stock it may own in the appellant corporation, the respondent is prohibited by a resolution adopted by appellant's board of directors from receiving any of the water claimed, since the respondent intends to put such water to a use prohibited thereby. This resolution was adopted on August 4, 1928, more than two months after the stock in question was issued to respondent by the appellant. This resolution recites that whereas, under the by-laws of the company, the board has the right to make rules and regulations governing the use of the water furnished, and whereas, it has been the long established policy of the company that the water it takes from the Kaweah and St. Johns rivers shall be used only on lands in the Kaweah delta or lands within the watershed of said rivers, it is therefore resolved that from and after this date, none of the water controlled by the company may or shall be used for any purpose whatever on any land situated outside of the Kaweah delta and not within the watershed of the St. Johns or Kaweah rivers. It is then further resolved that this rule shall not apply to the use of such water by a stockholder on any land on which such water is now being used, or on which at any time in the past, a present stockholder shall have used said water; and shall apply only to lands which have never been theretofore supplied with such water or on which a present stockholder has not in the past used said water.

Not only is there no evidence in the record to show that the lands within the respondent district are outside of the Kaweah delta and not within the watershed of the St. Johns or Kaweah rivers, but such evidence would not be conclusive, if it existed. Another phase of the controversy between the parties to this action was before the Supreme Court in the case of Consol. Peoples D. Co. v. Foothill D. Co., 205 Cal. 54, 269 P. 915. That case refers to shares of stock purchased by this respondent in several corporations, including this appellant, and the court there points out that this appellant is not a corporation organized for the purpose of furnishing water only to a particular district. The question then arises whether a change to such a purpose was accomplished by this resolution of the board of directors passed on August 4, 1928. It is appellant's theory that this board had authority to pass such a resolution because of the general powers in regard to the management of appellant's business, which was vested in the board by the by-laws of the corporation. The pertinent parts of these by-laws as they had existed for more than twenty years prior to the adoption of this resolution read as follows:

"Article V.—Powers of Directors. The Board of Directors shall have power to do all things which this corporation is empowered to do by law and to make all rules and regulations which they deem necessary for the government of this Company, and the use of its waters and ditches not inconsistent with the laws of the State of California * * *"

"Article VI.—Duties of Directors. It shall be the duty of the Board of Directors * * * to direct and provide means for distribution of waters, and to regulate and control the same and all canals, ditches and headgates belonging to this Company. * * *"

During all of that twenty years, article VII of these by-laws provided for the appointment of a general superintendent and then provided as follows: "It shall be the duty of said superintendent to take charge of and care for all the ditches, canals and structures and headgates of this Company, and to attend to all diversion of waters and the distribution thereof * * * and to turn out into the side ditch or ditches of the respective stockholders such portion of the waters flowing in the main canal of this Company as the number of shares of capital stock owned or leased by such stockholder bears a ratio to the whole number of shares of capital stock issued by this Company, unless otherwise directed by said Board, and to do all things in his power to promote the equitable distribution of the waters flowing through said main canal, among said stockholders."

The resolution of August 4, 1928, attempting to limit the use of water furnished to a certain area, if valid, works a complete change from the purpose for which the corporation was formed. Neither the original articles of incorporation, the amended article, nor the by-laws as they existed for more than twenty years, disclose any such purpose. While the by-laws conferred on the board of directors authority to make rules and regulations for the government of the company and the use of its waters, this authority is subject to general laws governing corporations, and it was beyond the power of the board to make arbitrary discriminations between different stockholders, or to so change its rules as to take away the beneficial interest of one stockholder by a new regulation which did not affect all other stockholders. While a corporation could have been organized for the purpose expressed in the resolution, as pointed out in Consol. Peoples D. Co. v. Foothill D. Co., supra, this corporation is not one of that kind. Moreover, as shown by the evidence and as indicated in this resolution itself, the practice of the corporation had been to the contrary. The uncontradicted evidence shows that more than one-third of such waters had for many years been used on lands which were not within the watershed named, and the resolution itself provided as follows: "Be it further resolved, that this said rule and regulation shall not apply to or govern the use of waters of this Company by a stockholder of this Company on any land or lands on which waters from the ditches of this Company is now being used in irrigation season, or, on which, at any time in the past, said present stockholders have used said waters, and shall apply only to lands which have never been supplied heretofore by the Wutchumna ditch or ditches or on which a present stockholder of this Company has not in the past used said waters."

Not only is a different previous policy here admitted, but a discrimination is thus made between a stockholder who at some previous time used water in a certain manner, or one now using it that way, and another stockholder, who, relying on the articles of incorporation and the by-laws and conditions as they always have existed, has purchased stock and at great expense made preparation to use the water in the same manner. Not only must by-laws be reasonable (2 Thomp. Corp. [3d Ed.] §§ 1099, 1100 and 1103; 14 C. J. 368), but they must also operate equally upon all persons of the same class (2 Thomp. Corp. [3d Ed.] § 1104; 14 C. J. 366). It would appear that the resolution in question was adopted by the board of directors for the sole purpose of excluding this respondent from the enjoyment of the rights represented by the stock already acquired, but whether or not this is true, the resolution is void so far as it attempts to interfere with the right of respondent to receive the proportion of water to which it was entitled by virtue of its shares of stock in the appellant corporation.

[14] In addition to its various arguments why respondent is not entitled to any writ of mandate, appellant directs its main attack against the judgment that was entered in this case, upon the ground that it is void for uncertainty. The vital portion of this judgment, as set forth by appellant, is as follows: "That said petitioner, Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District, as owner of said shares of said capital stock, is entitled to receive of and from said respondents Wutchumna Water Company and James B. Rivers, and to have delivered to it by them * * * into its * * * conduit leading from a point on the main canal of said respondent Wutchumna Water Company known as Lee Drop, situate in Section 2 in Township 18 South, Range 26 East * * * and that said petitioners do have and receive of and from said respondents, from time to time, and that said respondents deliver to said petitioner at said Lee Drop, 16.33 ninety-firsts (16.33/91sts) of all of the water from time to time flowing in the main canal of the said respondent, Wutchumna Water Company."

Appellant relies particularly upon two cases. In Wallace v. Farmers' Ditch Co., 130 Cal. 578, 62 P. 1078, a case involving a diversion from the Kaweah river, the court held that the judgment was invalid for uncertainty. In effect, the court held that it was impossible to tell from the findings or judgment how much each party was to get, and that no facts had been found which would enable the share of the respective parties to be computed. Also, in the case of Riverside Water Co. v. Sargent, 112 Cal. 230, 44 P. 560, a case involving the rights of two appropriators of water, the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to take all of the water, except what the defendant was entitled to take. And, further, that the defendant had theretofore diverted all of the water that a certain ditch would carry, during the irrigation season. Obviously, this was too uncertain and the court held that the lower court had neither fixed the quantity, nor had found facts giving the data from which the quantity could be calculated. Appellant further cites 14 Cal. Jur. 954, as follows: "A judgment or decree must be sufficiently definite and certain that it may be enforced and constitute an estoppel between the parties. It should contain a definite statement of the rights of the parties or a definite means of ascertaining them."

After stating this rule, California Jurisprudence continues as follows: "In a water rights suit involving the rights of several parties, the judgment should fix their respective rights as to quantity, time and manner of use, as definitely as the circumstances and conditions permit." Appellant then argues that the requirement of certainty and definiteness is especially necessary in mandamus cases, quoting the following from 16 Cal. Jur. 877: "The judgment, as well as the preliminary demand, should be for specific and certain relief, such as clearly defines the rights of the plaintiff, and distinctly fixes the obligation imposed upon the defendant."

In this same paragraph, this authority goes on to set forth the rule that where the duty sought to be compelled is defined by a particular statute, the rights of the petitioner are measured by such statute, and in case the statute specifies that officers shall have some discretion as to the method of carrying out the acts enjoined upon them, the judgment should merely direct the officers to perform the acts in accordance with the provisions of the law, and should not specify in what manner the acts are to be done. We think a similar rule applies in the instant case, and that since the board of directors of appellant had a discretion as to the method and manner of distributing water to the various stockholders of the corporation, the trial court was correct in not specifying the exact manner in which the water to which respondent is entitled should be delivered, but in merely directing that respondent's proper proportion of the water, as represented by its stock in the corporation, should be delivered to it. The court correctly left the details of the manner and method of distribution to the discretion of the directors, which, of necessity, must be exercised by this board, in accordance with the general rules of law.

Section 2 of article VII of appellant's by-laws made it the duty of the superintendent "to turn out into the side ditch or ditches of the respective stockholders, such portion of the water flowing in the main canal of this company as the number of shares of capital stock owned or leased by such stockholders bears a ratio to the whole number of shares of capital stock issued by this company." The judgment and writ of mandate in this case merely declared the right of the petitioner in accordance with that provision. The language of the judgment closely corresponds to the language of the by-laws and no reason appears why any more difficulty should be experienced now, in understanding the meaning thereof, than has existed in distributing water in accordance with this provision of the by-laws during the past two years. It will be noted that the portion of the judgment complained of merely orders that the respondent shall receive its proportionate share of the water flowing in the main canal, and specifies it is to be taken out at Lee Drop. This point is on the main canal, and it sufficiently appears that the water to be apportioned is the water that flows by that point. The discretion of the board of directors as to when the water shall be taken from the river, how long it shall be stored in Bravo lake, and when and in what amount it shall be allowed to flow past Lee Drop, is in no manner interfered with. The judgment is certain and definite as to the particular portion which respondent is entitled to receive, but it is so worded, in providing that respondent shall receive a certain proportion of all the water that from time to time passes this point, that it does not require that it shall receive its proportion continuously, as the water flows past that point, but under the double "time to time" provision it even permits the directors of the corporation, in their discretion, to rotate the water between several stockholders, providing only that respondent receive its just share; although of course this discretion on the part of the board would still be subject to the provisions of article VII of the by-laws and to the general law, which require that any such rotation be conducted on an equitable basis. Appellant argues that the phrase "all the water" might refer to water in the Wutchumna ditch which had not been diverted by the appellant, but which belonged to other parties. Not only is there no evidence of any water in this ditch not diverted by appellant, and all of the evidence points to the fact that there is no such other water, but the judgment sufficiently shows that it refers only to the water to which respondent is entitled by virtue of its ownership of shares of stock in the appellant corporation; and therefore that it applies only to such water as has been diverted by appellant for the purpose of distribution among its stockholders, in accordance with the purpose for which it was organized. The judgment herein, in referring to "all the water," means exactly what section 2 of by-law VII means in saying that each stockholder shall receive his proportion of "the waters." Appellant argues that the phrase "from time to time" leaves an uncertainty as to whether the water must be delivered continuously at Lee Drop at all times when water is flowing in the ditch, or whether it can be delivered intermittently, in accordance with a system of rotation. As we have already pointed out, the double use of this phrase clearly indicates that the judgment provides that the respondent shall receive its just share of water equitably with other stockholders, but that the details of distribution, particularly the matter of storage and proper rotation, is left to the discretion of the board of directors, which is as it should be.

Appellant also objects to the phrase "flowing in the main canal"; it being contended that the part of appellant's main ditch which is below and receives water from Barton Cut might also be considered a part of the "main canal," and that the judgment leaves it uncertain whether the proportion of water directed to be delivered to respondent at Lee Drop includes water diverted from the St. Johns river through Barton Cut, or whether it applies only to water taken from the Kaweah river through the first diversion and brought through Bravo lake. And, further, that it is uncertain as to whether or not various possible seepages above and below Lee Drop shall be taken into consideration. Irrespective of whether or not the respondent had an additional right to its proportion of water diverted by the appellant through Barton Cut, which is some miles below Lee Drop, the point where respondent's side ditch approaches appellant's main canal, we think this judgment is sufficiently clear and definite to show that it applies only to the water in appellant's main canal flowing past Lee Drop, and that it only provides that respondent shall receive its proportion of the total amount of water that flows by that point. We know of no rule of law under which respondent could be prohibited from claiming and receiving its rights as a stockholder to water taken under one diversion from a river, by the fact that it might also have additional rights, as a stockholder, to water from another diversion lower down on the same river. Not only is it not to be presumed that the court intended, by this judgment, to provide for an exchange whereby respondent, in lieu of any right it might have to water from the lower diversion, might take additional water from the upper diversion, but the "main canal" referred to is sufficiently identified by the reference to "Lee Drop." We conclude that the portion of the judgment complained of is sufficiently definite and certain to cover the purpose intended, which is, to secure for respondent that right as a stockholder which it had made preparation to receive, and that it does this without interfering with such details of management as are in the discretion of the board of directors of appellant, and that in an action involving water rights, as suggested by the rule we have quoted from California Jurisprudence, this is as definite as the circumstances and conditions permit.

While appellant raises another point, that the evidence does not support the judgment, its argument thereon goes entirely to suggested ways in which it considers the judgment uncertain, and the views we have expressed render a further consideration of the point unnecessary.

In addition to asserted errors of law which have already been covered in other connections, appellant contends that the refusal of the trial court to permit certain lower riparian owners to file a complaint in intervention in this action constitutes an error of law as against this appellant. The proposed intervention was based upon the claim that such lower owners, who claimed to be riparian to the St. Johns river, were entitled to benefits coming from an increase in the flow of said river caused by seepage from the Wutchumna ditch, below Lee Drop, into the river. It is appellant's theory that the proposed interveners were necessary parties to this action. A separate appeal from the order refusing permission to intervene was submitted with the appeal we are now considering, an opinion in which is being separately filed. If the conclusion we have reached in that appeal, to the effect that permission to intervene was properly denied, is correct, the point here raised is disposed of.

The order and judgment of the trial court are affirmed.

Civ. 113.

1. Mandamus ⚷153.

In action to enforce rights of irrigation district as stockholder in water company, intervention of lower riparian owners, upon ground that if district obtained water rights it would use them in manner injurious to lower riparian owners, held properly refused (Code Civ. Proc. § 387).

Intervention was properly refused, since interveners were not "interested" in the controversy within meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 387, providing that at any time before trial, any person having an "interest" in the matter in litigation, or in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both, may intervene.

In action to enforce rights of irrigation district as stockholder in water company, intervention which would add general issue as to title to certain water, not involved in action, held properly refused (Code Civ. Proc. § 387).

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

BARNARD, P. J.

The Lindsay-Strathmore Irrigation District filed an action in the superior court of Tulare county against the Wutchumna Water Company and James B. Rivers, seeking a writ of mandate to compel the delivery of certain water to which the irrigation district claimed to be entitled as a stockholder in the water company. The water company diverts a considerable portion of the water of the Kaweah river into what is known as the Wutchumna ditch, which runs in a general westerly direction. A short distance below the point of that diversion the Kaweah river divides into two channels, the northerly one being known as the St. Johns river, and the southerly one continuing as the Kaweah river. The St. Johns river flows in a westerly direction approximately parallel with the Wutchumna ditch, and only a short distance south of it. The complaint in this action alleges that the irrigation district is the owner of 16.33 shares of the capital stock of the water company, and that as such owner it is entitled to 16.33/91sts of all of the water from time to time flowing in the canal of said company; that it has constructed a side ditch for the purpose of receiving its share of such water, but that the water company refuses to deliver the same, and a writ of mandate is prayed for.

The Wutchumna Water Company filed its answer in this proceeding, and on the same day A. R. Cutler and L. E. Depew asked permission to be allowed to intervene in the action and filed their proposed complaint in intervention. These proposed interveners are the owners of certain lands which they claim are riparian to the St. Johns river, and which are situated between that river and the Wutchumna ditch, and below the point where the side ditch constructed by the petitioner approaches the main canal. Their proposed complaint in intervention alleges that they require the full flow of water of the St. Johns river for the irrigation of their lands; that the Wutchumna Water Company, by reason of long-standing water rights, diverts a portion of the water flowing in the Kaweah river and its branches; that when water is flowing in the Wutchumna ditch, the amount of water flowing in the St. Johns river past the lands of interveners is and has been increased by water seeping from said canal; that the irrigation district intends to take any water it may obtain as a stockholder in the water company out of the Wutchumna ditch at a point known as Lee Drop, about four miles upstream and easterly from the lands of the interveners; that if the district is permitted to take water from this ditch at said point, the quantity of water flowing in the ditch at lower points will be greatly reduced, and the seepage therefrom entering the St. Johns river will be greatly diminished, thus resulting in a diminished flow in the St. Johns river past the land of interveners; and that if the court should order the water company to deliver water to the irrigation district, such order would require the water company to violate and ignore the rights of the interveners. The prayer is that the irrigation district be enjoined and restrained from taking any water from the Wutchumna ditch above the lands of the interveners.

The trial court refused to permit the complaint in intervention to be filed, and from this order the proposed interveners have appealed. The sole question here presented is whether or not the appellants had such an interest in the controversy pending in the lower court as would entitle them to intervene therein.

[1-3] It fully appears that the original complaint herein was filed for the purpose of enforcing the rights of the irrigation district as a stockholder in the water company. It also appears that the appellants do not allege any interest in the shares of stock of the water company, but they seek to prevent an injury to their rights which they consider probable, if the water company should recognize and accord to the irrigation district its right as a stockholder. In other words, while the appellants are not directly interested in whether or not the irrigation district is fairly treated as a stockholder in the water company, they are seeking to enjoin the district from receiving its rights as such a stockholder, because of the manner in which it may use those rights when secured. Without considering the ultimate merits of the claims of appellants, we think they were properly excluded from this action.

Section 387 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads in part as follows: "At any time before trial, any person, who has an interest in the matter in litigation, or in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both, may intervene in the action or proceeding."

It has been held that the interest which will permit an intervention must be of such a direct and immediate nature that the intervener will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment. In Horn v. Volcano Water Co., 13 Cal. 62, 73 Am. Dec. 569, the court said: "The interest mentioned in the statute, which entitles a person to intervene in a suit between other parties, must be in the matter in litigation, and of such a direct and immediate character that the intervenor will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment. * * * To authorize an intervention, therefore, the interest must be that created by a claim to the demand, or some part thereof, in suit, or a claim to, or lien upon, the property, or some part thereof, which is the subject of litigation."

In addition to other considerations, it may be said that the direct effect of such a judgment as is prayed for in the original complaint in this action would be to provide for the delivery of any water to which petitioner may be found entitled, at the point known as Lee Drop. This lies above the St. Johns river and exactly where the defendant's ditch has always been located, and any seepage therefrom would continue to enhance the flow of St. Johns river, so that appellants would neither gain nor lose by the entry of any such judgment. It seems apparent that if appellants are to be affected at all, it will be not by the direct operation of the judgment, but by an indirect effect thereof, namely, in the manner in which it is feared the irrigation district will later make use of such rights as a stockholder as it secures through the judgment. We think the matter here in litigation is not the water itself, and not directly the right to take water away from a particular area, but it is the right of a stockholder to secure its rights as such, and to receive the benefits of its stock. The appellants are not interested in that matter, but the interest which they seek to set up through allegations of threatened injury in their proposed complaint is consequential, and not direct. In La Mesa, etc., Irr. Dist. v. Halley, 195 Cal. 739, 235 P. 999, 1000, the court says: "The interest in the matter in litigation, as contemplated by the Code section, must be of such a direct and immediate character that the intervener will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment. Elliott v. Superior Court, 168 Cal. 734, 145 P. 101. The interest must be direct, and not consequential, and must be such an interest as is proper to be determined in the proceeding in which the intervention is sought. Isaacs v. Jones, 121 Cal. 257, 53 P. 793, 1101. The matter in litigation in the pending proceeding is whether or not the respondents have refused, without legal justification, to do that which the law specifically requires them to do, as duties resulting from their respective offices. Section 1085, Code Civ. Proc. The court in said proceeding is not concerned with the necessity or the propriety of authorizing or issuing said bonds. Those questions are for the determination of the officers and electors of the district. Assuming that mandamus is the proper remedy, we are then only concerned with the propriety of the refusal of the president and secretary to sign and attest the bonds as required by law. It is difficult to see how the petitioning interveners can gain or lose by any judgment which may be entered in that proceeding. If the writ be granted, the enforcement of the judgment would not directly affect their property interests. The bonds, when signed and attested, would not be a lien on their property, although, if thereafter sold, they may lead to the creation of a lien. Drumhiller v. Wright, 64 Cal. App. 498, 222 P. 166. Nor would compliance with the writ, if issued, create a cloud upon their title. If the respondents sign and attest the bonds they must be sold before the lands of the proposed interveners may be taxed to pay the principal and interest thereof. The sale will be contingent on obtaining a proper price after advertising for bids. The bonds may never be sold. The present plans for the acquisition of an additional water supply and a distributing system may be abandoned. It is clear that the interest of the petitioning interveners is remote and contingent and not of the direct and immediate character required by law. Elliott v. Superior Court, supra."

The matter here in litigation is whether or not the directors of the water company "have refused, without legal justification, to do that which the law specifically requires them to do." The real issue in this action is not whether the irrigation district has a right to take water out of a certain area. Perhaps many things, not involved in this case, would prevent such taking. The real issue in this action is whether the irrigation district has such a right as between it and the water company; that is, whether the board of directors have the right to prevent such taking by refusing to accord to the district its right as a stockholder. The right the petitioner claims as against the water company and its directors is not set up in the action as against any outsiders. The situation is somewhat similar to the one that obtained in the case of San Joaquin, etc., Irr. Co. v. Stevinson, 164 Cal. 221, 128 P. 924, 930. In that case the court said: "The action was not a suit in equity to determine the title to the water, generally, or one in which a general adjudication of such title could be made. It was a special proceeding for a particular purpose, namely, to condemn the Stevinson right for the benefit of the plaintiff as the purveyor of the public use. In such a controversy, third persons not interested in the land in subordination to or in common with the person whose right was sought to be taken, but claiming adversely, have no right to intervene under section 387 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

It is a general rule that interveners are not to be permitted to enlarge the scope of the action. McNeil v. Morgan, 157 Cal. 373, 108 P. 69; Wright v. Jordan, 192 Cal. 704, 221 P. 915; La Mesa, etc., Irr. Dist. v. Halley, supra. The proposed complaint in intervention, if allowed to be filed, would enlarge the scope of this action by adding to the domestic issue as to the right of a stockholder in a corporation, a general issue as to the title to certain water, and even this added issue is based upon what the stockholder might later do with the benefits accruing from its rights as such stockholder, if secured, while its actual right to receive such benefits is not attacked. The appellant particularly relies upon the case of Cache La Poudre Irrigating Ditch Co. et al. v. Hawley, 43 Colo. 32, 95 P. 317, 319. In that case the court held that the petition in intervention did not change the question before the court in any respect. In that regard the court said: "The issue between the plaintiffs and defendants, that is, the question to be determined, as presented by their pleadings, was the right of the plaintiffs to have turned into the canal of the ditch company a certain volume of water from the river. The petition of intervention did not change this question in any respect. True the intervener pleaded facts upon which it predicated a right to the subject-matter of controversy which are not stated in the original pleadings, and which, if established, would prevent the judgment which the plaintiffs seek, but that has not changed the original issue. It still remains as it was, i. e., are or are not the plaintiffs entitled to divert the water from the stream which they claim? In other words, although intervener predicates its right to the subject-matter of controversy upon which it relies for a judgment in its favor, and to defeat a recovery in favor of plaintiffs upon facts not stated in either of the pleadings of the original parties, yet the ultimate issue to be determined, the right to divert water from the stream, remains the same, and this appears to be the general rule by which to determine whether or not the intervener has injected a new issue into the case in which he is allowed to intervene."

While, in the case just cited, the ultimate issue remained the same, we find a different situation in the case before us. In the instant case, the appellants do not deny that the water company has a full right to divert its water from the river; and they do not deny that the irrigation district has a right, as a stockholder, to its proportionate share of that water, which, in fact, is the only issue involved in this action. The only claim of appellants is that if the irrigation district is granted its rights as a stockholder in the water company, it is then its intention to use the water thus obtained in a manner that would be injurious to appellants, and an indirect effect and an indirect interest is thus alleged.

We conclude that the appellants are not interested in the particular litigation between the original parties to this action, because the result thereof will not directly affect them. If they are correct in their contention, they cannot be disturbed by any process which may be issued upon a judgment in favor of the original petitioner, and against the original respondent. Porter v. Garrissino, 51 Cal. 559. If, in exercising any rights it may establish as a stockholder in the water company, the irrigation district should later impair any rights of the appellants, a separate and distinct controversy would then be presented.

For the reasons given, the order appealed from is affirmed.

MARKS, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Superior Court enjoining the appellants from proceeding to collect assessments levied under proceedings instituted under the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730 as amended), and from issuing any bonds under the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1441). These proceedings were instituted by the city council of the city of Bakersfield by passing its resolution of intention, No. 503, whereby it declared its intention to improve Twenty-Fourth street between "M" street and Union avenue. The cost of the improvement was to be paid by an assessment levied upon the property within a district. This resolution of intention was passed on October 27, 1924. The respondents, who are owners of property within the district to be assessed to pay the cost of the improvement, filed written protests to the improvement, and vigorously protested at all other stages of the proceedings, and appealed to the city council from the assessment levied. All protests were overruled by the city council, and, while a few minor modifications in the assessment were made, it was confirmed in so far as the questions presented on the appeal were concerned.

After a trial lasting over two weeks, the court found in favor of the contentions of respondents, and issued a permanent restraining order against appellants enjoining them from issuing any bond or bonds in payment of the assessments on the properties of respondents, from levying or collecting any part of such assessments, and from asserting any claim in, or to, or upon, any of the property of the respondents, or any of them, by reason of the proceedings taken under and following resolution of intention No. 503.

The court found, among other things, that the owners of a majority of the property to be assessed had filed written protests against the proposed improvement, and against the area of the district to be assessed to pay for the same, which had not been overruled by a four-fifths vote of the city council; that the city council arbitrarily refused to allow respondents, or any of the other protestants, to introduce testimony to show that protests in writing were made and filed by the owners of more than one-half of the area of the property to be assessed, or in support of the grounds of such protests; and that the city council fraudulently and arbitrarily, and without due process of law, disallowed and overruled and denied such protests, all with the knowledge, approval and acquiescence of the Union Paving Company, which was the contractor which performed the work; that, upon the appeal from the assessment, the city council refused to give respondents, or any of them, a hearing upon such appeal, and refused to hear and consider any evidence in support thereof, and fraudulently, arbitrarily, and without due process of law, and with the knowledge and consent of the contractor, confirmed the assessments; that the assessments were arbitrary and confiscatory, and in many instances exceeded the market value of the property assessed. Appellants attack all of these findings as contrary to the evidence, and not supported by it.

Upon the hearing of the protests following passage of the resolution of intention, the city council overruled them, and found that they were signed by the owners of less than 50 per cent. of the area of the property to be assessed to pay the cost of the improvement. Appellants maintain that this finding of the city council was final and conclusive, and cannot be attacked in these proceedings. We do not need to base our conclusions on this contention, even if it were correct, because a careful review of the evidence shows that the finding is not supported by it.

Throughout the hearing by the city council upon the protests to the proposed work and improvement, it was assumed by all parties that the area of the property to be assessed was 854,960.76 square feet. The correctness of this assumption was attacked in the court below, and is attacked here by both appellants and respondents. One block within the district belongs to a public school district, and is and was used for school purposes. The school property has an area of 34,846 square feet. Respondents maintain that the total area within the district as assumed by the city council should be reduced by this amount. A right of way of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company crosses the district. At least a part of this right of way was granted to the railway company under an act of Congress passed July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 292), wherein it was provided that the land to be granted should revert to the United States upon the condition subsequent of its failure to be used as railroad property. Respondents maintain that the area of this right of way should be excluded from the area of the district for two reasons, first, because of the nature of the grant to the railway company with the defeasance proviso contained, and, second, that the right of way of a railway company can neither be assessed for a public improvement nor sold upon default in payment of an assessment thereon.

Appellants contend that the school land was area within the district subject to assessment for public improvement, and therefore was properly included in determining the area of property to be assessed. They maintain that the railway right of way, included in the area which the city council considered in reaching its estimate of the number of square feet in the district subject to the assessment, was properly included therein. They also contend that an additional 53,777.74 square feet of the railway right of way lying in streets or alleys should be included as property to be assessed for the cost of the improvement, making the total area within the district subject to assessment 908,748.50 square feet.

[1] Section 20g of the Improvement Act of 1911, as added by St. 1929, p. 1658, § 11, provides, among other things, that, when any school land is included within a district to be assessed to pay the cost and expense of the improvement, and where there is no declaration made in the resolution of intention respecting its assessment, the city shall be liable for any sum thereafter assessed against it, and shall pay such assessment. Resolution of intention No. 503 was silent as to the assessment of the school land; therefore this land should have been assessed for the improvement, and the assessment should be paid by the city of Bakersfield. An examination of the assessment diagram and warrant confirmed by the city council shows that the school property, while bearing an assessment number, was not assessed for the improvement. This was contrary to the express provision of the statute. If the school property was assessed at the same rate as the property adjoining it on either side, the assessment would be approximately $3,000.

[2] Respondents contend that, since the title to the right of way of the Southern Pacific Railway Company was deraigned through an act of Congress providing a defeasance of title under certain conditions, the property was in effect that of the United States government and was subject neither to assessment nor taxation. In the case of Rio Grande Western Ry. Co. v. Stringham, 239 U. S. 44, 36 S. Ct. 5, 6, 60 L. Ed. 136, in which a similar grant was considered, it was held: "The right of way granted by this and similar acts is neither a mere easement, nor a fee simple absolute, but a limited fee, made on an implied condition of reverter in the event that the company ceases to use or retain the land for the purposes for which it is granted, and carries with it the incidents and remedies usually attending the fee."

A similar grant was considered in the case of Choctaw, O. & G. Ry. Co. et al. v. Mackey, 256 U. S. 531, 41 S. Ct. 582, 65 L. Ed. 1076, in which the Supreme Court reached a similar conclusion. In this case the question of the assessment of such railway property to pay the expense of a local improvement was involved. The court expressly upheld the right to assess the railway property for the benefits accruing to it from a local improvement.

Under respondents' second contention that the right of way of a railway cannot be assessed for public improvements nor sold upon default in the payment thereof, they have cited no authorities. The following cases are contrary to their contention, and support such assessments: Choctaw, O. & G. Ry. Co. v. Mackey, supra; Rutledge v. City of Eureka, 195 Cal. 404, 234 P. 82; McNeil v. City of South Pasadena, 166 Cal. 153, 135 P. 32, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 138; Los Angeles Pacific Co. v. Hubbard, 17 Cal. App. 646, 121 P. 306; Southern Pacific Co. v. Stibbens, 103 Cal. App. 664, 285 P. 374; and Los Angeles Railway Corporation v. Los Angeles County Flood Control District, 78 Cal. App. 173, 248 P. 532. We therefore conclude that the right of way of the Southern Pacific Railway Company was properly included within the property to be assessed. Under these authorities, and particularly under the authority of the case of Los Angeles Pacific Co. v. Hubbard, supra, we are of the opinion that those portions of the right of way of the railway company within the district, and within the area of streets or alleys, should also be assessed to pay for the improvement.

[3-6] The foregoing conclusion makes the total area to be assessed apparently 908,748.50 square feet. With this as a basis, in order to have a majority protest against the improvement, the protestants should own in excess of 454,374.25 square feet of property within the district. The maximum amount claimed by the protestants is 464,722.70 square feet. From this we must deduct the area of assessment No. 43 credited by respondents to Joe Ambrose or Mary Ambrose, his wife, or to both of them, as there is no evidence showing title to the property in either of them. A further deduction of 7,194 square feet must be made for property owned by Martha A. Mobley. She did not sign the protest. A further deduction of 21,780 square feet must be made for property lying in T street. There are, in the record, copies of two maps, one adopted by the trustees of the town of Bakersfield on July 23, 1875, and filed for record in the office of the county recorder of the county of Kern on August 17, 1875, and the other, adopted and declared the official map of the city of Bakersfield by its board of trustees on November 21, 1898, which show T street as a public street crossing the improvement district. There is no evidence that T street was ever abandoned. Its area was included by respondents in their protest, and was also included by appellants and by the city council in their total estimate of the number of square feet to be assessed in the district. As far as the record before us goes, this area will have to be deducted from both the total area to be assessed within the district and the total area owned by the protestants. As this case will have to be tried again, counsel should determine whether or not this street was legally abandoned in order to determine the area protesting and the area to be assessed within the district. A public street once dedicated cannot be abandoned except through proceedings duly taken in accordance with the provisions of law. For the reasons given, we conclude that the finding of the trial court that the protestants were owners of a majority of the property to be assessed to pay the cost of the work and improvement to be done under the provisions of resolution of intention No. 503 is not sustained by the evidence.

[7-9] Appellants challenge the finding of the trial court that the city council refused to give respondents any hearing upon their protests to the proposed improvement and the area of the district. An examination of the record before us discloses the fact that, when the protests were called up for hearing by the city council, the protestants were present in person, and were represented by their attorney, who stated the grounds of the protest and requested that witnesses be sworn and examined. No witnesses were sworn, but the city clerk and the city engineer were interrogated by the attorney for the protestants as well as by the members of the city council. Approximately one-half hour was consumed by these proceedings. The protestants requested the privilege of presenting further evidence, which request was denied by the city council. While the evidence offered was not complete, we cannot say that no hearing was had upon these protests. The city council denied to protestants the right to extend the hearing, and excluded evidence in addition to that already before it. The question of procedure upon a hearing of protests is primarily within the discretion of the city council. The hearing in this particular case was short and summary. The record does not clearly disclose what additional evidence the protestants desired to offer. For this reason we cannot say that no hearing was had, nor can we conclude, upon the evidence before us, that the city council abused its discretion in not extending the scope of the hearing.

[10] Appellants attack the finding of the trial court that, upon appeal by respondents from the assessment, the city council refused to give them a hearing and refused to hear and consider any evidence in support thereof. The record shows that respondents were present at the hearing and were again represented by counsel. The proceedings were reported by a court reporter employed by respondents. The hearing lasted approximately two hours; the time being consumed with the taking of evidence from unsworn witnesses, and in arguments between the protestants, their attorney, and members of the city council. Under these circumstances we cannot conclude that the council refused to hear any evidence in support of the appeal from the assessment nor that it refused the protestants any hearing upon such appeal.

On the hearing of protests to a proposed improvement and the area of the district to be assessed, and of an appeal from the assessment, the functions of the city council partake of the judicial in their nature. Its members should approach these hearings, and act upon them, with the same open minds that a fair judicial proceeding requires of the judge and jury. They should be ready to base their conclusions upon the evidence presented, and administer justice between the necessities of the public on the one hand and the rights of the property owners on the other. If the evidence of the summary nature of these hearings were sufficiently developed, it might be an important circumstance, when considered with the unjust and confiscatory assessments finally levied, to show that these proceedings were held by the members of the city council, with preconceived ideas of the judgment to be rendered, which would indicate an abuse of discretion on their part amounting in law to constructive fraud on the property owners. Rutledge v. City of Eureka, supra; Cutting v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 151, 187 P. 19; Spring Street Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 170 Cal. 24, 148 P. 217, 218, L. R. A. 1918E, 197.

[11] The court found that the assessments were arbitrary and confiscatory, and in many instances exceeded the market value of the property assessed. This finding is attacked by appellants as not being supported by the evidence. With this contention we cannot agree. The undisputed evidence shows that the total of the assessments is slightly in excess of one-half of the market value of the property to be assessed, after the improvement was completed. A number of the assessments equal the market value of the property assessed. The evidence further shows that more than fifteen parcels were assessed at more than two and one-half times their market value. This indicates that the assessments were both arbitrary and confiscatory. The language of the Supreme Court in the case of Spring Street Co. v. City of Los Angeles, supra, is particularly applicable here:

"Protests were filed to this so-called new assessment, urging that it was arbitrary, unjust, excessive, and illegal; but, after hearing, the council confirmed it in toto.

"The effect of the assessment so made is not and may not be questioned. It canceled every dollar of the $226,000 awarded by the court in the condemnation proceedings for the taking of this private property for a public use, under an implied omnibus finding that the property of every person whose lands fronted on Eighth street was benefited at least to the amount of his award in the condemnation proceedings for the taking of his property, and was also benefited just a little more, that little being the property owner's proportionate share of the expense of the city in the matter of its condemnation proceeding, which additional amount is contemplated by the suggestion contained in the report of the streets and boulevards committee 'that the balance of the amount to be raised be assessed equally per front foot on the land fronting on Eighth street.' Specifically, upon the property of the Hamburger Realty & Trust Company is imposed an assessment of $20,000, in cancellation of the judgment of the court of the value of its property taken for this public use, and $115.20 being its proportionate share of the expense to which the city was put in the doing of this thing. Thus, in practical effect, while real property of the plaintiff to the value of $20,000, as found by the court, is taken away from it for public use, and while the Constitution of the United States and of this state declares that this cannot be done without compensation to the owner, this plaintiff not only receives no compensation, but in addition to the loss of its property is compelled to pay $115.20 because the city has seen fit to take it. Thus plaintiff would have saved $115.20 if, upon the first intimation that the city designed to condemn its property under the laws of the land, it had hastened to make the city a free gift of it. And the same is true in the case of every other property owner having the misfortune to own lands fronting upon Eighth street. When finally we are told that this result has been accomplished under the Constitution and laws of the land, it becomes a matter of most serious importance to determine whether or not this can be true.

"It will not be amiss here to consider briefly the nature of the power exercised by the Legislature, and, under its direct authority, by its mandatories, in the matter of these so-called special assessments based on benefits. We need not be at pains to trace the development of the use of the power, nor yet is it important to refer it to any particular branch of the power of sovereignty—whether it be called the taxing power, the police power, or the power of eminent domain. Bearing in mind that with us all the power that any sovereign state ever possessed resides in the people acting through their Legislature, saving as that power is controlled or restrained by the Constitution, and as this power of sovereignty, excepting under the constitutional restraint, would permit, as was done in autocracies, the despoiling of the private citizen and the confiscation of his property, it is quite sufficient to refer to this fact for the origin of the power. Like numberless other powers which have in the past been exercised selfishly, cruelly, and unjustly, it is still a part of sovereignty, saving as it is denied, or repressed, or controlled, by the Constitution. That in certain aspects it bears a likeness to taxation is unquestioned, in that it is a charge in terms of money based upon the real property of the owner, which the owner himself is compelled to pay, or in default risk the seizure and sale of his holdings. That in certain aspects it partakes of the nature of eminent domain is manifest from the fact that if a man may be compelled to expend $1,000 for the improvement of the street upon which his property happens to front, there is a certain taking of that $1,000 for the public use. And, finally, that in other aspects it partakes of the nature of the exercise of the police power is obvious when consideration is paid to the construction of public sewers, drainage districts, and like works making for the benefit of the public health. Yet in no one, nor yet in all of these sovereign prerogatives can this particular power be said to rest under our form of government, since, if it be said that a special assessment is in strictness a tax, it does violence to our constitutional provision touching the uniformity of taxation. If it be said that this power is referable to the sovereign prerogative of the right of eminent domain, the answer is that with us the state cannot exercise that power without compensation made to the owner of the property taken. And whatever might be said of the ability to refer an assessment for a drainage system to the police power, the argument would fail utterly when applied to the opening and widening of streets, to irrigation districts, desert land reclamation, and similar forms of public control over lands privately owned. Indeed, to avoid doing violence to these constitutional limitations upon the power of the Legislature, it must be held, as it has so often been held, that a special assessment is not, in the constitutional sense, a tax at all. It is 'a compulsory charge placed by the state upon real property within a predetermined district, made under express legislative authority for defraying in whole or in part the expense of a permanent public improvement therein, enhancing the present value of such real estate, and laid by some reasonable rule of uniformity based upon, in the ratio of, and limited by, such enhanced value.' Hamilton, Law of Special Assessments, § 56. The improvement must have a certain public character, and this we find conspicuously in street improvements, and less conspicuously in reclamation district assessments. Were it not for this recognized characteristic, it would be justifiable to order any owner of any vacant lot to build thereon and to build a prescribed structure, since under the theory of benefits it could successfully be urged that the enhanced value of the land covers the cost of the structure compulsorily imposed upon it. It may be said that the interest of the public would demand that a building lot in the heart of a business district of a city should not be left vacant, its improvement tending to increase business and to enhance the values of surrounding property in which the public is interested. But so far such a public interest has not been considered adequate in support of such an exaction. That the return to the property owner by way of benefit is, under our system of government, the basic foundation upon which this right rests, becomes apparent from the consideration that, if we are not able to say that the owner for the specific charge imposed is compensated by the increased value of the property, then most manifestly we have a special tax upon a minority of the property owners, which tax is for the benefit of the public and which tax is special, unequal and ununiform.

"Therefore the compensating benefit to the property owner is the warrant, and the sole warrant, for the Legislature itself to impose the burdens of these special assessments. It has been a matter of profound regret to this court, and indeed to every court, which has been called upon to consider the question, that in the application of this principle, theoretically equitable, practical operations have shown grave wrong and injustice to be done. With ceaseless reiteration the courts have deplored these unjust exactions and extortions. With tiresome repetition have they advised the lawmakers of methods for the exercise of the power more in consonance with equity and fair dealing. Reclamation District v. Birks, 159 Cal. 233, 241, 113 P. 170. But the result here and elsewhere has been that these suggestions, instead of being received as guides, directing a more equitable exercise of the power, have been treated as though they were invitations to an excessive use of the power, in any effort to see just how far the legislative agents and mandatories might go in their taking of private property without compensation, until told by the court that they had passed the outermost bound of law and reason.

"That bound has been reached and passed by the assessment in this case. * * * Applicable to this assessment is the language of the Supreme Court of Vermont [Allen v. Drew, 44 Vt. 174], speaking through the learned Mr. Justice Redfield, when it says: 'We have no doubt that a local assessment may so transcend the limits of equality and reason that its exaction would cease to be a tax, or contribution to a common burden, and become extortion and confiscation. In that case it would be the duty of the court to protect the citizen from robbery under color of a better name.' * * *

"It is not sought by respondents to defend this assessment upon its merits. The defense is merely that the property owners had their day in court before the city council, their petitions and protests were denied, and the action of the council, in the absence of fraud, will be held conclusive. But to this we answer that the action of the council in the particulars to which this assessment is here subjected to attack is not conclusive, under the principle declared in Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 P. 81, and reaffirmed in Schaffer v. Smith, 169 Cal. 764, 147 P. 976, and that the assessment here in question does not come within the principle of Lambert v. Bates, 137 Cal. 676, 70 P. 777."

On August 11, 1924, the city council of the city of Bakersfield passed and adopted its resolution of intention No. 499, declaring its intention to have improved portions of M street and Twenty-Fourth street. The work to be done on Twenty-Fourth street was the same as that described in resolution of intention No. 503, and the exterior boundary of the district to be assessed to pay for the improvement described in resolution of intention No. 503 was the same as the exterior boundaries of the district to be assessed to pay for the work under resolution No. 499, except that the boundaries of the district described in resolution No. 499 were extended southerly on each side of M street along the work which was omitted in resolution No. 503. Four blocks of paving on M street, and property on each side of this improvement, described in resolution No. 499, was omitted from resolution No. 503.

September 2, 1924, was fixed as the date for the hearing of protests to the proposed work or improvement and the extent of the district to be assessed to pay the cost and expense thereof. On this date, protests largely signed by the owners of property within the assessment district were filed with, and presented to, the city clerk. A resolution, overruling these protests, in which it was recited that the protests were signed by the owners of approximately 49.5 per cent. of the property to be assessed, was proposed, but its adoption was defeated by a vote of, two for the resolution, to five against it. A further hearing on these protests was continued until the meeting of the city council held on September 8, 1924. The minutes of the meeting of September 2, 1924, contained a reference to the resolution which had been defeated, and it was recited that "the council proceeded to consider a protest filled by approximately 49.5 per cent. of the area of the district." Counsel for appellants maintain that this was a finding on the part of the city council that the protests were not signed by the owners of a majority of the area to be assessed. With this we cannot agree. The minutes evidently attempted to state the substance of the proposed resolution overruling the protests which was defeated by the vote which we have indicated.

On September 8, 1924, the protests were again considered by the city council. This hearing resulted in the adoption of the following resolution:

"Be it resolved by the Council of the City of Bakersfield, as follows:

"Whereas: The Council of the City of Bakersfield has heretofore initiated proceedings for certain street improvements in Street District No. 499, and

"Whereas, all proceedings for the proposed improvements up to and including the Notice of Improvement were regularly had and taken in accordance with the law in such cases made and provided, and

"Whereas, the Council of the City of Bakersfield finds that the property owners of the property in the district to be assessed for said improvement do not desire the improvement at the present time,

"Now therefore be it resolved by the Council of the City of Bakersfield, that all proceedings and each and every proceeding heretofore had and taken in the matter of the proposed street improvements in Street District No. 499, in the City of Bakersfield, be and each and every one thereof, is hereby repealed, vacated, set aside, annulled and abandoned."

Interesting questions are presented by the situation thus appearing in this case. The proceedings instituted under resolution of intention No. 499 were abandoned after protest by a large number of property owners. The city council failed to find directly whether or not the protests were signed by the owners of a majority of the property to be assessed, although the resolution raises the inference that there was a majority protest. The trial court found that it was a majority protest. On October 27, 1924, the city council passed its resolution of intention No. 503 whereby it initiated proceedings for the improvement of a considerable majority of the work described in its resolution of intention No. 499. Two questions in this connection present themselves for our consideration: First, what is the effect of the failure of the city council of the city of Bakersfield to find upon the question of whether or not the protests were signed by a majority of the owners of the area to be assessed under resolution No. 499; second, if these protests were signed by the owners of such majority of the property, can the city council abandon the proceedings initiated by resolution No. 499 and proceed with the same improvement on a portion of the streets by instituting another local improvement proceeding? In answering this last question, it will be necessary for us to determine whether or not the finding of the trial court, to the effect that there was a majority protest filed against the work described in resolution No. 499, is supported by the evidence. We will consider these two questions in the order we have stated them.

Sections 6 and 7 of the Improvement Act of 1911, as amended by St. 1915, pp. 1465, 1466, provide as follows:

"Sec. 6. At any time not later than the hour set for hearing objections to the proposed work as provided in section three hereof, any owner of property liable to be assessed for said work may make written protest against the proposed work or against the extent of the district to be assessed, or both. Such protest must be in writing and be delivered to the said clerk of the city council, and no other protests or objections shall be considered. At the time set for hearing protests the city council shall proceed to hear and pass upon all protests so made and its decision shall be final and conclusive; provided, however, that when the protest is against the proposed work, and the cost thereof is to be assessed upon the property fronting thereon, and the city council finds that such protest is made by the owners of a majority of the property fronting on the proposed work, or when the protest is against the proposed work and the cost thereof is to be assessed upon the property within a district, and the city council finds that such protest is made by the owners of more than one-half of the area of the property to be assessed for said improvements, no further proceedings shall be taken for a period of six months from the date of the decision of the city council on said hearing, unless the said protest be overruled by an affirmative vote of four-fifths of the members of the city council. The words 'proposed work' as used herein, shall mean and include all the work described in the resolution of intention. The city council may adjourn said hearings from time to time.

"Sec. 7. If no protests or objections in writing have been delivered to the clerk up to the hour set for hearing provided in section three hereof, or when a protest shall have been found by said city council to be insufficient, or shall have been overruled, or, when a protest against the extent of the proposed district shall have been heard and denied, immediately thereupon the city council shall be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order the proposed improvements."

[12, 13] We have been cited to no decisions in the state of California in which these two sections have been construed under facts similar to those of the instant case. It seems clear to us, however, that the plain language of section 6 of the Improvement Act of 1911 as amended places a duty upon the city council, in considering protests, to make a finding upon the question of whether or not they were signed by the owners of more than one-half of the area of the property to be assessed. We do not believe that this duty can be successfully evaded if the protests were in fact signed by the owners of more than one-half of the area of such property. To permit the evasion of this section by the failure of the city council to make a finding would defeat the very purpose of the latter part of the section which is to protect the property owners of a majority of the area to be assessed from having the proposed improvement forced upon them against their will and without their consent, unless its construction be so urgent and of such great public importance that four-fifths of the members of the city council shall vote in favor of the protests being overruled. We are of the opinion that, if the protests be signed by the owners of a majority of the area of the property to be assessed, and the city council refuses or fails to perform its duty of finding in accordance with such facts, and the protests are not overruled by the affirmative vote of four-fifths of the members of the city council, that then the bar raised by section 6 that "no further proceedings shall be taken for a period of six months" immediately comes into effect, and the city council has no jurisdiction to proceed with the work or improvement for such period. To give any other construction to sections 6 and 7 of the Improvement Act of 1911 as amended would in our opinion do violence to the plain language of the act and constitute judicial legislation.

Counsel for appellants strongly urge that, under the authority of Stege v. City of Richmond, 194 Cal. 305, 228 P. 461, 465, a contrary conclusion should be reached by us. We cannot so construe this case. An examination of it shows that the protests were not filed "against the proposed work or against the extent of the district to be assessed, or both." It clearly appears that the protestants "objected only to the time of the maturity of the bonds" to be issued to pay the cost of the improvement. "The issuance of such bonds is discretionary with the council under the bond act (Stats. 1915, p. 1441), and no opportunity for objection or protest to the issuance thereof is provided for by the terms of the act." Stege v. City of Richmond, supra, at page 314 of 194 Cal., 228 P. 461, 465. It therefore appears that in the Stege Case the question of the protest of the owners of a majority of the property to be assessed to pay for the improvements, against the proposed work or against the extent of the district to be assessed, was not presented, and was not considered by the Supreme Court. This case, therefore, cannot be considered as authority maintaining or supporting appellants in the instant case. As the city council of the city of Bakersfield failed to find upon this material issue, it failed to perform a clear duty which the law imposed upon it. There being no finding by the city council upon this question, the trial court was fully justified in going into the question of the sufficiency of the protests filed.

[14] We must next consider the question of whether or not the findings of the trial court that the protests against the proposed work and the extent of the district to be assessed as described in resolution No. 499 was signed by the owners of more than one-half of the area of the property to be assessed are supported by the evidence. The condition of the record before us has made the answer to this question difficult. Copies of all of the protests filed are not before us. The city clerk, while on the witness stand in the trial court, read one of the protests, and further read a number of names from other protests. The city engineer, while on the witness stand, testified as to the areas of various parcels of land within the district. The titles to properties of a number of the protestants were stipulated, and evidence was introduced as to the titles of other owners. At no place in the record, nor in the briefs, is there any attempt made to consolidate or summarize the testimony of these witnesses, which testimony covers many pages of the transcript. We have been compelled to check the testimony of each of the three witnesses with the other two and with the various maps in the record. This has consumed an undue amount of time, and has involved considerable unnecessary labor. However, we have reached the conclusion that this finding is not supported by the evidence.

It was assumed during the trial that the area of the property to be assessed consisted of 1,083,749.75 square feet. The maximum area of the property owned by the protestants, as claimed by counsel for respondents, after eliminating property clearly within dedicated alleys not subject to assessment, is 571,572.25 square feet. From this we must deduct 2,613.18 square feet under a stipulation of counsel in the court below that only one-half the area of the Hawkins and Braccamonte property be considered as protesting. We must further deduct 21,649.65 square feet in which there is no sufficient evidence of title in the protestants. We must further deduct 5,105.75 square feet in which it does not appear that the owners of the property signed the protest. Two parcels, lot No. 28 in block 191, and lot No. 25 in block B, as shown on the official map of the city of Bakersfield, to which we have referred, are each credited to two owners and their areas twice credited to the protestants, which requires that we also deduct 5,082 square feet from the maximum total of the area of the protestants which we have heretofore given. These necessary deductions total 34,450.58 square feet, which, when taken from the maximum of 571,572.25 square feet, leaves 537,121.67 square feet, or less than one-half of the total area of the property to be assessed. What we have heretofore said concerning the property included in the railroad right of way and in T street, in referring to the protests under resolution No. 503, will also apply to the protests filed under resolution No. 499. It may be that on a retrial of the case respondents will be able to furnish sufficient evidence so that the entire area of 34,450.58 square feet which we have eliminated from the area protesting should be counted as legally protesting. As the case must be retried, we strongly suggest that the protests be introduced in evidence, and that the evidence be so consolidated that the trial court and appellate court, if the case be again appealed, may be able to arrive at the total area of the property to be assessed within the district, and the total area protesting, without the considerable labor which we have been required to devote to the investigation of this question here. If counsel for respondents had heeded the repeated admonitions of the trial court, their record would be in a more satisfactory condition.

[15] Counsel for appellants seriously contend and confidently maintain that a protest of the owners of a majority of the area of the property to be assessed under resolution No. 499 will not defeat the proceedings instituted by resolution No. 503 because of the lesser amount of the work to be performed under the latter resolution. They have cited a number of cases from other jurisdictions which sustain this contention, but none from California. Section 6 of the Improvement Act of 1911 as amended provides that "the words 'proposed work' as used herein, shall mean and include all the work described in the resolution of intention." The protests provided for in this section are directed either against the proposed work or against the extent of the district. If "no further proceedings shall be taken for a period of six months," in the event a majority protest is filed, and the protest be against the "proposed work" which is defined as "all the work described in the resolution of intention," we believe this section means just what it says, and that the city council has no jurisdiction to proceed to do any part of the work for a period of six months, unless four-fifths of its members vote to overrule the protests. To place any other construction on the section would permit a city council to omit any fractional part of the proposed work it saw fit and proceed with the improvement. If four blocks of the work can be omitted, as was done in the present case, four feet could be omitted in some other case. This might result in the oppression of the property owner and the confiscation of his property.

[16] An amicus curiæ has urged upon us the theory that, since this is an equitable action, a court of equity cannot deprive the contractor of the fruits of his labor after it has been performed. In the cases cited by him, which lend color to this argument, the property owners did not protest the proceedings before the city council at all stages where the law gives them such an opportunity. In the instant case, respondents protested vigorously, and whenever the opportunity was presented, urged to the best of their ability almost every legal ground of protest. This fact was known to the contractor. It also knew of the protests to resolution No. 499 and the action of the city council thereon. We cannot conceive why, under these circumstances, the doctrines of equity should be applied any more strongly in favor of the contractor than they should be in favor of the property owner. The act of the contractor in filing his bid and in signing his contract was entirely voluntary. The assessment placed upon the property of the protestants was involuntary as far as they were concerned and against their will and without their consent and over their vociferous and repeated protests. Counsel urges that the contractor may lose some money invested in making the improvement. We reply that, if the assessment stands, many of the property owners will have their property confiscated. As we have observed, a number of parcels of property are assessed for amounts equaling their market values, and a number of others for amounts more than two and a half times their market values. Under these circumstances, if the equities of the case are involved, they should be invoked in favor of the property owner who is in danger of losing his property without receiving any compensation therefor.

A number of other questions are presented by the parties in their briefs. It will not be necessary to extend this opinion further by a consideration of them, as the judgment must be reversed, and they will not necessarily arise upon a new trial.

Judgment reversed; new trial ordered.

We concur: BARNARD, P. J.; JENNINGS, J.

PACIFIC INDEMNITY CO. v. MYERS, City Controller, et al.

S. F. 14111.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 25, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 26, 1931.

1. Statutes 🔑205.

Both sections of statute dealing with subject of discharge of bail were to be considered in arriving at legislative intent (Pen. Code, § 1305, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1386, and § 1306, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1872).

2. Municipal corporations 🔑871.

Law relating to refund of bail to surety within one year after forfeiture in case of subsequent conviction held unconstitutional as authorizing gift of public moneys (Pen. Code, § 1306, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1872; Const. art. 4, § 31).

> Pen. Code, § 1306, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1872, provides that, if defendant at any time within one year after entry of summary judgment against surety is returned into custody and is subsequently convicted of highest offense charged in complaint, information, or indictment, the principal amount of judgment, less all charges resulting from pursuit, capture, and return of defendant, should be repaid to surety, provided that surety file with his application for refund an affidavit that absence of defendant was not with his connivance.

3. Bail 🔑79(1).

Constitutional law 🔑205(2).

Statutes 🔑79(1).

Law relating to refund of bail to surety on conviction of defendant within one year held unconstitutional as lacking uniformity and granting special privileges (Pen. Code, § 1306, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1872; Const. art. 1, § 21; art. 4, § 25).

4. Constitutional law 🔑42.

One not within class whose constitutional rights are invaded by alleged discrimination cannot complain respecting validity of law.

5. Constitutional law 🔑42.

Constitutionality of statute may be raised by any one whose interests are affected when no member of injured class can complain.

6. Constitutional law 🔑42.

City controller and treasurer could attack validity of statute relating to refund of bail to surety on subsequent conviction of defendant (Pen. Code, § 1306, as amended by St. 1929, p. 1872).

> Since controller and treasurer of city are under bond to audit and pay out money intrusted to their custody only upon lawful demands, they were personally interested in attempted exaction under the statute warranting attack on constitutionality, in view of fact that sureties or exsureties discriminated against by law were in no position to raise question.

7. Constitutional law 🔑42.

Presumption of validity of statute may be attacked by litigant whenever it is material to case.

In Bank.

Original proceeding in mandamus by the Pacific Indemnity Company against John S. Myers, as Controller of the City of Los Angeles, and another.

Peremptory writ denied, and alternative writ discharged.

Holbrook, Taylor, Tarr & Horton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, S. V. O. Prichard, and Robert A. Cushman, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHENK, J.

This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel the controller and treasurer, respectively, of the city of Los Angeles to draw a warrant for and pay to the petitioner the principal amount theretofore paid by the petitioner in satisfaction of a judgment on a forfeited bail bond entered against the petitioner pursuant to sections 1305 and 1306 of the Penal Code. The matter is submitted on a general demurrer to the petition and briefs filed by the petitioner and by amicus curiæ, the county of Los Angeles.

It appears from the petition that on or about the 29th day of April, 1929, there was pending in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles a criminal proceeding entitled the People, etc., v. Charles F. Clark, wherein the defendant was charged with a violation of the Wright Act, a misdemeanor; that the defendant therein had entered a plea of not guilty and was admitted to bail in the sum of $1,700; that the petitioner executed a bail bond in the sum required and the defendant was released from custody pending his trial; that when the cause was regularly called for trial on May 21, 1929, the defendant did not appear and his bail was declared forfeited; that on September 16, 1929, ninety days having elapsed from and after the declaration of forfeiture, the city prosecutor appeared before the court and upon a sufficient showing and motion a summary judgment was entered against the surety; that thereafter on January 10, 1930, the surety paid the principal amount of the bond and interest and the same was deposited by the clerk of the court with the treasurer of the city; that within one year after the entry of the summary judgment, solely through the efforts of and at the sole expense of the petitioner herein, the defendant Charles F. Clark was returned to the custody of the chief of police of said city, and said defendant was on August 11, 1930, duly and regularly convicted of the highest offense charged against him in the complaint; that thereafter, on August 26, 1930, pursuant to notice, the petitioner moved the court for an order to refund to the petitioner the principal amount of said bond pursuant to section 1306 of the Penal Code; that concurrently with said notice there was presented to the court the affidavit of the attorney in fact of the petitioner to the effect that the absence of the defendant Clark had not been with the connivance of the petitioner; that upon this notice and showing the court entered an order requiring the respondent controller herein to draw his warrant on the city treasurer in the sum of $1,700 payable to the petitioner, and that the respondents herein, after demand duly made, have refused to comply with said order of court, basing their refusal on the alleged unconstitutionality of certain provisions of the next to the last paragraph of said section 1306 of the Penal Code.

Said section 1306 contains the following final paragraphs:

"Payments made to a city, city and county, or county, by reason of a summary judgment shall be paid into a bail bond trust fund in the treasury of such city, city and county, or county, and properly designated with the title and number of the criminal action out of which such judgment arose. If at any time within one year after entry of such judgment the defendant in the criminal action is returned into custody and is subsequently convicted at any time of the highest offense charged in the complaint, information or indictment upon which such defendant was admitted to bail, the principal amount of such judgment, less all charges resulting from the pursuit, capture and return of the defendant, including rewards paid, shall be repaid, in the same manner as are all other payments to such surety; provided, that the surety file with his application for refund under the provisions of this section an affidavit that the absence of the defendant was not with his connivance. Such payment is hereby made a proper charge against such trust fund account in the treasury of any city, city and county, or county. The board of supervisors or other legislative body of the city, city and county, or county shall provide by resolution for the maintenance of records in the appropriate offices showing the amount of disbursements by said city, city and county, or county, resulting from the pursuit, capture and return of the defendant, including payment of rewards, and shall provide for a report thereon to the treasurer of the city, city and county, or county, within thirty days after the return to custody of such defendant.

"If the defendant is not so returned within one year after the entry of the summary judgment, the amount of said judgment shall thereupon be deposited in the general fund of the city, city and county, or county, and all liability for the return thereof shall terminate."

It is contended that the foregoing portion of section 1306 is in contravention of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, providing that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law; section 11 of article 1 of the state Constitution providing that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation; section 21 of article 1 providing that no citizen, or class of citizens, shall be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens; section 25 of article 4 providing that the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following cases, that is to say, "twenty-sixth, remitting fines, penalties, or forfeitures, thirty-third, in all other cases where a general law can be made applicable"; and section 31 of article 4 prohibiting the Legislature from authorizing any gift of public money.

In view of these contentions it is well to note the various statutory enactments on the subject of discharge of bail and forfeiture. From 1905 until 1927, section 1305 of the Penal Code provided that, if, within twenty days after the entry in the minutes of the court of the order of forfeiture of the bail, "the defendant and his bail appear and satisfactorily excuse his neglect," the court might direct the forfeiture to be discharged upon such terms as appeared to be just. During the same period of time, section 1306 of the same Code provided that, if the forfeiture be not discharged as provided in section 1305, the district attorney might, within twenty days after such forfeiture, proceed by action against the bail upon the undertaking. In 1927, section 1305 was amended (St. 1927, p. 1386) so as to enlarge the time from twenty to ninety days for the return of the defendant after the declaration of forfeiture, and a discharge of the forfeiture upon a satisfactory showing of excuse from neglect on the part of the defendant and nonconnivance on the part of the bail. This amendment was construed by this court to require a concurrence of excusable neglect and nonconnivance before the bail was entitled to apply for a discharge of the forfeiture. Seaboard Surety Corp. v. Municipal Court, 208 Cal. 596, 283 P. 289.

Section 1306 was also amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1385) to provide as follows:

"When any bond is forfeited, if the court which has declared the same forfeited has civil jurisdiction to render judgment in an action arising upon a contract of similar nature and amount ninety days after such forfeiture, if the same has not been set aside, it shall enter a summary judgment against each bondsman named in such bond in the amount for which such bondsman shall have bound himself; if the court declaring such forfeiture has not jurisdiction to give judgment in an action arising upon a contract of similar nature and amount, said court ninety days after such forfeiture, if the same has not been set aside, shall deliver to the district attorney of the county in which said court is located said bond, together with a certified copy of its order declaring the same forfeited, and immediately thereafter said district attorney must file said bond and said certified copy of forfeiture in a court having jurisdiction to render judgment in an action arising upon a contract of similar nature and amount. The court in which said bond and certified copy of forfeiture shall be so filed shall forthwith enter a summary judgment against each bondsman named in such bond in the amount for which said bondsman shall have bound himself.

"A dismissal of the indictment or information after the default of the defendant shall not release or affect the obligation of the bail bond or undertaking.

"Within five days after said judgment becomes final the district attorney or other civil legal adviser of the board of supervisors shall demand immediate payment of said judgment. If the judgment remains unpaid for a period of ten days after demand has been made, he shall forthwith cause a writ of execution to issue and be levied upon the property of the judgment debtor and shall take any other steps necessary to collect said judgment."

[1] Section 1305 was not amended in 1929, but in that year section 1306 was amended (St. 1929, p. 1872) by adding thereto the final paragraphs first above quoted. A consideration of both sections is appropriate in arriving at the legislative intent in dealing with the subject of discharge of bail and forfeitures. Seaboard Surety Corp. v. Municipal Court, supra. It was the obvious intention of both sections to provide some relief to the bail after forfeiture upon return of the defendant to custody. It is therefore pertinent to inquire what relief has been and what relief has not been accorded the bail and whether constitutional requirements have been observed as between bail under the same circumstances.

Under section 1305, as above noted, the bail may be discharged if the defendant is returned within ninety days and a showing is made excusing the defendant's neglect and of nonconnivance on the part of the bail, whether or not the defendant is convicted. Under section 1306 the bail is sought to be relieved in the absence of a satisfactory excuse on the part of the defendant and upon an ex parte showing of nonconnivance on the part of the bail, but the defendant must be returned within one year and be convicted of the highest offense of which he was charged. In the one case excuse of the defendant and nonconnivance of bail must concur. In the other, the excuse or the neglect of the defendant is not required. On what ground such a refinement in the showing favorable to one bail and not to the other, can be made is difficult to discover, and none has been suggested.

Under neither section is any relief from forfeiture accorded cash bail or bail furnished after conviction. Cash bail, it is argued by the petitioner, may properly be excluded from consideration for the reason that as between the state and the defendant the cash bail is deemed to be the defendant's personal property (Mundell v. Wells, 181 Cal. 398, 184 P. 666, 7 A. L. R. 383), and a return of forfeited cash bail might be deemed a reward to the defendant arising out of his own wrong. But a defendant released on his own cash bail may be innocent of any wrongdoing. His absence may be entirely excusable, yet he is afforded no relief under section 1306. Furthermore the bail, other than cash bail, furnished after conviction and to which the court has decided the defendant is entitled pending appeal, is accorded no relief whatever from forfeiture. It is no answer to say that bail before conviction in certain cases is a matter of right under the Constitution while bail on appeal is a matter of right only in other specified cases and in still others is discretionary with the court under the statute. Pen. Code, § 1272. In either or any case the bail is in accordance with law. Bail furnished after conviction was accorded the same consideration under the statutes from 1872 to 1929 as bail furnished before conviction. No sufficient reason appears why the bail in the one case should be entitled to relief and be denied it in the other.

It also appears that under the amendment in 1929 of section 1306 the defendant must be convicted of the highest offence charged before relief from forfeiture may be granted. It is argued by the petitioner that this is a valid classification for the reason that the showing thus required insures that the public interest has not been prejudiced by the absence of the defendant when otherwise the public interest would be prejudiced if the defendant is acquitted or is convicted of a lesser offence or is dismissed. It is true that a delay in bringing a defendant to trial often results in a loss of evidence or a failure of justice for other reasons. But it cannot be said that the public interest is not as often subserved by the acquittal of the defendant found to be innocent as by conviction of a guilty one.

[2] The petitioner insists that the amendment of 1929 is valid because, when viewed in its proper light, it is not a provision for the relief of the bail after forfeiture but in reality is a public aid statute in the nature of offering a reward to an ex judgment debtor, and that the reward is not obtainable until after conviction of the highest offense, just as under section 1547 of the Penal Code the right to the reward is conditioned upon the conviction of the defendant. But when the amendment of 1929 is considered in the nature of a reward, the following curious situation develops: The right to the reward is not available to the person who returns the defendant unless that person happens to be the ex judgment debtor. It therefore strikingly appears that the former bail and now ex judgment debtor is entitled to the reward notwithstanding he has done nothing whatsoever to bring about the return of the defendant. In such case the payment of the money is not a reward for services rendered, but is clearly a gift of public moneys in contravention of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution.

[3] Therefore, considered as a measure for the relief of bail after forfeiture, the amendment of section 1306 in 1929 attempts to classify those who furnish a bail bond before conviction and to afford them relief and those who furnish a bail bond after conviction and denies them any relief. The contract of bail is essentially the same in both cases, namely, an undertaking that, if the defendant does not appear when required, the amount of the bond shall be forfeited. No good reason appears why one should be favored as against the other. We fail to discover any natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction between those favored and those disfavored. Again, as has been seen, we have an attempted classification of those who furnish bail for a defendant who is subsequently convicted of the highest offense charged, and who are favored, and those who furnish bail for a defendant who is subsequently convicted of a lesser offense or who is acquitted or dismissed. All of which we deem to be contrary to the provisions of the Constitution requiring uniformity of operation of the statute and prohibiting the granting of privileges to one class of citizens not granted to others upon similar terms.

Considered as an offer in the nature of a reward, as contended for by the petitioner, we find set apart as the parties solely entitled to the reward those who are ex judgment debtors, regardless of whether they have effected or contributed to the return of the absconding defendant, contrary to the constitutional provision prohibiting special laws in favor of a particular class arbitrarily selected from those maintaining the same relation to the subject of the law and prohibiting special laws remitting penalties and forfeitures.

[4-7] It is contended by the petitioner that neither the respondents herein are, nor the county of Los Angeles appearing as amicus curiæ is, in position to raise the question of the unconstitutionality of section 1306, for the reason, it is argued, that neither the city nor the county are injured, but in fact are benefited by the statute, even if the same be unconstitutional. In this connection the petitioner relies on the general rule that one not within the class whose constitutional rights are invaded by an alleged discrimination cannot complain, and many authorities are cited in support of the general rule. Counsel for the petitioner, however, do not dispute the existence of the rule, referred to by both parties as an exception to the general rule, that when no member of the injured class can complain the question may be raised by any one whose interests are affected. But it is insisted that the so-called exception to the general rule is not here applicable. We think that it is, for several reasons. First, it is apparent that the sureties or exsureties discriminated against are in no position to raise the question. They are not entitled to any relief from forfeiture under the statute as it now reads, and no proceedings need be taken against them after forfeiture and payment thereunder. Secondly, if the amendment of section 1306 in 1929 be invalid, the title to the money now in the treasury of the city is vested in the municipality under the former part of the section as amended in 1927 and as continued in force in 1929, if the two provisions be severable. And lastly, the respondents are under bond to audit and pay out money intrusted to their custody only upon lawful demands. They are thus made personally interested in the attempted exaction under the statute. The presumption of the validity of the statute may be attacked by a litigant whenever it is material to the case. If the statute is offensive to the Constitution it is "no law at all." Quong Ham Wah Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 184 Cal. 26, 31, 192 P. 1021, 1023, 12 A. L. R. 1190. We think the amendment in 1929 of section 1306 falls within that category and is invalid. But the provisions of the amendment are clearly severable from the provisions of the section in force prior to the amendment and continued in force, for there is no indication in the statute or otherwise that the Legislature would not have left the section as enacted in 1927 undisturbed if its attempt to relieve some arbitrarily selected sureties from the rigors of a forfeiture had not been undertaken. We are not apprehensive, therefore, that bail bonds in pending proceedings will be jeopardized by the determination herein, as suggested by counsel for the petitioner.

The peremptory writ is denied, and the alternative writ is discharged.

SUTRO HEIGHTS LAND CO. et al. v. MERCED IRR. DIST.

Sac. 4290.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 25, 1931.

Rehearing Denied March 26, 1931.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1149.

Supreme Court may correct error appearing in findings.

2. Appeal and error 🔑758(3).

Party assailing findings on appeal must point out in brief particular evidence upon which he relies as being insufficient to support findings.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑263.

Property owners acquiescing in construction of canals could not enjoin irrigating district from operating them nor have them abated.

> Evidence disclosed that plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest had deeded rights of way for canals as constructed on their lands and that at about time district was constructing canals plaintiffs were engaged in selling campaign of their lands which they had divided into 40-acre tracts, and plaintiffs, for some time before and while canals were being constructed, urged and demanded that defendant district complete construction of canals at as early date as possible so that plaintiffs could successfully sell their lands.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑224.

Irrigation district is agency of state, and use to which water owned and controlled by district is put is "public use."

5. Nuisance 🔑82.

Where property owner expressly consents and importunes taking of land by public corporation for public use, he cannot enjoin continuance of use or abate use as nuisance.

6. Eminent domain 🔑280.

Property owners, by grant of rights of way and other acts indicating consent to construction of canals, were estopped from claiming damage for seepage reasonably to be anticipated (Const. art. 1, § 14).

7. Waters and water courses 🔑263.

In property owners' action against irrigation district to enjoin water seepage and for damages, evidence warranted court's finding district had not damaged plaintiffs.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑262.

Under statute, irrigation district must provide for drainage made necessary by operation of irrigation system (St. 1907, p. 569, §§ 1, 2).

9. Mandamus 🔑15.

Before writ of mandate will issue to compel public agency to perform act involving expenditure of money, it must affirmatively appear there are funds available for purpose (Code Civ. Proc. § 1085).

10. Waters and water courses 🔑262.

Irrigation district need not, under statute, provide drainage facilities, the expense of which is beyond its financial ability to meet or pay for (St. 1907, p. 569, §§ 1, 2).

11. Mandamus 🔑15.

Where irrigation district had done all that could be reasonably required with money available and resources of district, as regards drainage, no writ of mandate would lie to compel district to furnish drainage to plaintiffs' land (St. 1907, p. 569, §§ 1, 2; Code Civ. Proc. § 1085).

12. Mandamus 🔑7.

Writ of mandamus is equitable remedy and will not always issue as matter of right.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by the Sutro Heights Land Company and others against the Merced Irrigation District. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hatfield, Wood & Kilkenny and Treadwell, Van Fleet & Laughlin, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Downey, Brand, Seymour & Dunn, of Sacramento, A. L. Cowell, of Stockton, and Stephen W. Downey, of Sacramento, for respondent.

CURTIS, J.

The complaint in this action asks for an injunction against the defendant prohibiting it from permitting water to flow or seep through its canals upon plaintiffs' lands, for the abatement thereof as a nuisance, and for damages alleged to have been already sustained by reason of seepage of water upon plaintiffs' said lands. By a separate cause of action plaintiffs also ask that defendant be compelled to install a drainage system for the purpose of relieving plaintiffs' lands from the water which the plaintiffs allege has been caused to flow thereon through seepage from the canals of the defendant.

Plaintiffs allege in their complaint that they are the owners in severalty of three tracts of land, being parts of a tract of land formerly owned by Louis Titus and commonly known as the Titus ranch, all of which last-named tract, except the southwest one-fourth of section 18, township 7 south, range 11 east, M. D. B. & M., lies within and is a part of the Merced irrigation district. The lands of the plaintiffs are practically contiguous, and are in the extreme southwest portion of the district, and comprise 2,500 acres or thereabouts.

The defendant is an irrigation district organized under the General Irrigation Act of 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 254) and acts amendatory thereof. It comprises about 180,000 acres of land, and is situated in the county of Merced.

In their complaint the plaintiffs allege that the defendant, the Merced irrigation district, during the year 1922 constructed certain canals over and upon the lands of plaintiffs and particularly a certain canal known as the McCoy canal, the McCoy spillway, the Arena canal or spillway, and certain branches thereof, for the purpose of the carriage of water for the irrigation of the land within the said district, and also for the purpose of spilling the surplus water in the canals of said district into certain natural and artificial drainage beyond the boundaries of said district. The complaint then continues, and it is alleged therein:

"That the said land of the plaintiffs is extremely sandy in character and the canals so constructed and operated by the said district were and are likewise constructed through land of loose, sandy nature, and the said district constructed the said canals with banks made entirely of loose, sandy material, and so constructed the said canals that the banks were raised extremely high and the water in said canals was carried above the natural surface of the ground and against the loose, sandy banks of said canals, and ever since said time the said defendant has carelessly and negligently, and entirely disregarding the rights of the plaintiffs, maintained and operated the said canals so constructed in such a careless and negligent manner, and has carried water in the said canals and above the natural surface of the said ground and against the said sandy banks of said canals, and has carelessly and negligently permitted the said water to escape from the said canals and through the sandy banks thereof and to flow in large quantites outside of the said canals and through, over and upon the said lands of the plaintiffs, and to seep through the said banks in large quantities, and into and under the lands of the said plaintiffs; and the said defendant has carelessly and negligently failed to in any way control the said water or to confine the same within the said canals and has carelessly and negligently failed to properly line the said canals or to otherwise prevent the same from flowing and seeping out of the same, as aforesaid, and as a result thereof large quantities of water have so flowed and seeped out of the said canals and formed lakes and ponds upon the surface of the said lands of plaintiffs, and raised the water table in the said lands in other places on the same so near to the surface as to water-log the same and destroy the same for the growth of crops to which the same were otherwise adapted, and so as to kill and destroy the crops already growing thereon, and so as to make the said lands utterly unfit for agricultural purposes.

"That the said defendant still maintains and operates the said canals and threatens to continue to maintain and operate the same and threatens to continue to carry large quantities of water through the said canals, and to carry the same against the said sandy banks of the said canals, and threatens to and will, unless enjoined by this court, continue to permit the same to seep and flow out of the said canals and through the banks thereof and into, over and upon the said land of the plaintiffs, and to still further flood and water-log the said land and raise the water table under the same; and the said trespasses of the said defendant are and will be continuous and will gradually entirely destroy the said property, and the whole thereof, and render the same entirely unfit for agricultural purposes, and will prevent the said plaintiffs from growing any crops whatsoever upon the same, and will also cause noxious growths upon the same, and will cause salts to accumulate upon the surface thereof, permanently injuring and destroying the same; and the said acts of the defendant interfere with the comfortable use and enjoyment of the said property and constitute a nuisance and a continuing trespass thereon."

Then follow allegations as to the damage sustained by the respective plaintiffs.

To these allegations the defendant made certain denials and admissions. It also set up a number of affirmative defenses, and pleaded the statute of limitations. Upon the issues thus made by the pleadings the case went to trial and at the conclusion of the evidence the trial court made and filed its findings of fact pursuant to the issues made by said complaint and the amended answer thereto, including the affirmative defenses of the defendant. These findings are voluminous, and are entirely too lengthy to be set forth in full herein. They are in favor of the defendant on every issue made by the pleadings, with one apparent exception which we will later mention. The court found:

That for more than ten years prior to the year 1922, the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company had owned an extensive canal system in said county, and as early as 1913, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the predecessors in interest of the plaintiffs, they had constructed a certain canal known as the Arena spillway as a part of their canal system. In January, 1922, the defendant district purchased from the Crocker-Huffman Land & Water Company its said canal system, including said Arena spillway, and has continued to and is now using said system as it was used prior to its purchase by defendant. That the predecessors in interest of plaintiffs owned in one tract the said lands through which said Arena spillway was constructed and the lands now owned by the plaintiffs, and described in their complaint, from a date prior to 1910 continuously to the year 1921, and knew of the character of the land through which said Arena spillway canal was constructed and the manner of its construction and use, and acquiesced therein and controlled the water therein and diverted water therefrom and used the water so diverted during all of said period of time. That, after the purchase by the defendant district of the Crocker-Huffman Company, said district constructed in August, 1922, a portion of the McCoy canal; between March 1st and August 1st of the same year the district constructed a canal known as the Stockman canal through the lands of the plaintiffs; between March 1st and July 10, 1923, the district constructed a canal known as the McCoy extension from the end of the McCoy canal through certain portions of plaintiffs' lands. During the same period of time the district constructed certain laterals leading from said canals on and across the lands of the plaintiffs, also the Arena relocation, a portion of which was constructed on and through the lands of the plaintiffs. These canals and laterals were, and each of them was, so constructed for permanent use of the district, in the manner and place, and with full knowledge and acquiescence, and at the request and upon the urge of the plaintiffs and the then owners of the land over which the same respectively were constructed, and the manner of use and intended use by defendant of each of said water conduits was at all times known to the plaintiffs, and plaintiffs have at all times demanded and insisted upon the use of said canals and laterals for the delivery by defendant, as such irrigation district, of water for irrigation purposes to their respective lands. "That the said plaintiffs at all times knew of the character of the soil, as to being loose or close in texture, through which each of said conduits was so constructed and the nature of the banks and bottom of each of said conduits and of their resistance to water flowing in said conduit, and said plaintiffs and all persons owning the land through which said conduits and each of them were built knew that defendant intended to use permanently for the public use of said district, each of said conduits as so constructed as a part of its distributing system of canals to distribute water for irrigation of land in said defendant district, including the lands described in plaintiffs' complaint, and the said defendant has with the knowledge of plaintiffs and each of them, since the construction of each of said conduits, respectively, continuously, uninterruptedly, notoriously, adversely and with the acquiescence of the plaintiffs, and each of them, and under a claim of right against the whole world, used the said conduits as a part of the distributing system of canals to distribute water for irrigation of land in said defendant district, including the lands described in plaintiffs' complaint, and the service of the public use to serve which said defendant was organized, and the said conduits and each of them were at the time of their construction and at all times, necessary to said public use for which said defendant was organized and necessary in order that the said defendant could supply water with which to irrigate the lands within the boundaries of said district including the said land described in the plaintiffs' complaint, all of which facts were at all times herein mentioned known to the plaintiffs.

"That it is not true that the land described in said complaint is extremely sandy in character nor that it is any more sandy in character than many more large areas in defendant district and in other portions of the State of California, and particularly in the San Joaquin Valley in said state, which are and for many years have been irrigated by means of canals constructed of the same kind of material and located in the same manner as the canals constructed by defendant as aforesaid. That it is true that the said canals were constructed of the material of the soil through which said canals were built, and that such canals are commonly and usually built through such material in the San Joaquin Valley and that it would not have been practicable or feasible to have built or operated said canals otherwise than as the said canals were built and used as aforesaid. That it is not true that defendant so constructed said canals, or any of them, that the banks thereof were raised extremely high or any higher than was necessary to provide in a reasonable and customary and proper manner for the irrigation of the lands to be irrigated from said canals, including the said lands described in said complaint, or any higher than is usual and proper in construction of canals in and through lands of the character of the lands described in said complaint. That it is true that the lands described in said complaint are portions of a certain tract of land formerly owned by Louis Titus and commonly called the Titus ranch, comprising the land shown on the map attached to defendant's answer as being subdivided into lots designated by numbers enclosed in circles; that all of said tract except the southwest quarter of section 18 is, and ever since the 8th day of December, 1919, has been within and a part of the Merced Irrigation District; that said tract has a general slope from northeast to southwest, but has an undulating surface and consists of a series of ridges and swales of varying width; that said ridges and swales do not run in a uniform direction and are not continuous lengthwise across said tract, but said swales are of spoonlike or saucerlike formation so that water accumulating therein cannot escape therefrom except by evaporation or sinking into the soil, and said ridges are broken in certain places by depressions or are crossed by certain of said swales; that in order to provide for the irrigation of as much of said tract as practicable, including the lands described in said complaint, it was necessary to, and defendant did, with the acquiescence of plaintiffs and each of them, construct said canals along certain of said ridges except where it was necessary to cross certain of said depressions or certain of said swales, or to follow or to run on lot lines or approximately parallel to lot lines, and at such places it was necessary to, and defendant did, with the acquiescence of plaintiffs, construct fills to carry said canals across said depressions or said swales, and defendant, at the request of plaintiffs, did change locations so as to run on lot lines or approximately parallel to lot lines. That it is not true that the water in said canals was or has been or is carried above the natural surface of the ground except where said water was so carried with the acquiescence or at the request of plaintiffs and where it was and is necessary so to do in order to convey water across the depressions or the swales crossed by said canals as aforesaid."

The court then finds that the defendant has never carelessly or negligently maintained or operated said canals and laterals located upon plaintiffs' lands, nor has it carelessly or negligently permitted any water to escape from said canals or laterals nor to drain or seep through the banks of said canals or laterals upon the lands of the plaintiffs. Continuing, the court finds: "That it is not true that as a result of any unlawful or improper acts of defendant, or as a result of the omission of any duty or duties of the defendant, large quantities or any quantities of water have flowed or seeped out of any canal or canals of the defendant and formed lakes or ponds upon the surface of the lands described in said complaint, or any of said lands or raised the water table in said lands, or any of them, in other places on the same, or at all, so near the surface as to water-log the same or to water-log any of said lands or destroy the same for the growth of crops to which the same were otherwise adapted, or so as to kill or destroy the crops already growing thereon, or any crops, or so as to make said lands, or any of them, utterly, or at all unfit for agricultural purposes."

A further finding of the court was to the effect that said canals and laterals were designed and constructed in a workmanlike manner, with due care, skill, and prudence and in accordance with plans properly drawn and such as are customarily and usually adopted for the construction of canals through lands of the nature and topography of said Titus ranch for the irrigation thereof, and that the seepage from said canals has been only in such quantities as is usual and unavoidable from canals constructed as aforesaid in and through lands of the nature and topography of the Titus ranch.

As accounting at least in part for the high-water plane under the lands of the plaintiffs the court found that during the years from 1922 to 1926 large quantities of water delivered upon the Titus ranch for irrigation purposes had seeped and percolated through and from said lands so irrigated into the ground water in and under said Titus ranch, and that many of the persons to whom said water was delivered for irrigation purposes, carelessly and negligently caused and allowed large portions of the water so delivered to them in certain of said years to run into certain swales or depressions and accumulate therein, thus causing the ground water in and under said Titus ranch to rise during the spring and summer of each of said years; furthermore, that plaintiffs' lands are underlaid with a thick layer of impervious material known as hardpan, at a depth of from six inches to two feet below the bottoms of some of the swales and depressions, and at a depth of from six inches to four feet below the surface of much of the remainder of said land; that due to the location of the Titus ranch being lower in elevation than the lands to the north and east thereof, water used in irrigating the higher lands, or at least a considerable portion thereof, seeps and flows down to the lands of the plaintiffs, and thereby causes the water plane, underlying said lands, to rise and stand at a higher level than it otherwise would, especially during the spring and summer months of each year, and that the use of water for irrigation in said territory to the eastward and northeastward of Titus ranch has continued and increased each year from and since the year 1922, and that as a result thereof the flow of ground water to and into the lands of the plaintiff has continued as aforesaid, except as said ground water has been controlled by the defendant, as set forth in other portions of said findings. As a further reason for the rise of the water underlying plaintiff's said lands, the court found that during the year 1892 the then owner of section 9, township 7 south, range 11 east, described in the complaint, being a portion of the lands now owned by one of the plaintiffs, sunk an artesian well about 300 feet deep near the center of said section 9 and developed from said well a large flow of water, and ever since said time said artesian water has been permitted to flow from said well and has maintained a large lake in the depression surrounding said well; that the water from said well is strongly impregnated with alkali, and ever since said year 1892 the water from said well has seeped and percolated into the soil westward from said well. As this well is located near the easterly boundary line of the Titus ranch, the seepage therefrom would extend into the soil of a large portion of said ranch.

As a final finding on this phase of the case, the court found that defendant had not damaged the lands of the plaintiffs, or the lands of any of said plaintiffs in the particulars set forth in plaintiffs' complaint, or in any of said particulars, or in any other manner, or in any amount, or at all.

In response to certain of the affirmative defenses interposed by the defendant, the court found that the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest had executed and delivered the following conveyances to rights of way over and across the land described in plaintiffs' complaint, for the construction, maintenance, and operation of canals and laterals for the purpose of conveying water for irrigation purposes:

(1) Agreement between John W. Mitchell and the Merced Canal Irrigation Company, dated May 21, 1885, whereby the said John W. Mitchell purported to grant to said company, its successors and assigns, the right of way for the purpose of constructing ditches, canals, flumes, pipes, and conveyances for water through and across all of the lands described in said agreement, which said lands include the lands described in the complaint as belonging to the plaintiffs. As this agreement contains direct words of grant, it will be referred to hereafter as a deed.

(2) Deed from East Side Investment Company, dated April 24, 1922, to Merced irrigation district, a right of way sixty feet in width for the construction of the McCoy canal, and right of way fifty feet in width for the construction of the Stockman canal over portions of the lands of the plaintiffs and substantially along the routes of said canals as they were subsequently constructed over the land described in said deed.

(3) Deed between said parties of the same date, of right of way fifty feet in width for the Stockman canal over other lands, now owned by the plaintiffs and described in the complaint, on a portion of which the said Stockman canal was subsequently constructed and is now maintained.

(4) Deed from Lyon & Hoag, a corporation, one of the plaintiffs herein, to the Merced irrigation district, dated May 3, 1922, of a right of way fifty feet in width for portion of Stockman canal as the same was subsequently constructed over a part of the land described in the complaint.

Upon the question of the statute of limitations set up in the defendant's amended answer, the court found that each and every cause of action stated in the complaint was barred by the provisions of subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 338, and subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] As before noted, the court apparently found in favor of plaintiffs as to one of the issues made by the pleadings. This finding is found in paragraph XVIII of the findings. We are satisfied that there is a clerical error in this finding as it appears in the record before us, in that the word "not" in the first line of said finding was inadvertently placed therein when said findings were prepared. Each of the parties herein agrees that such is the fact. Under our power to make findings, we undoubtedly have the authority to correct an error appearing in the findings, so that they will conform to the evidence as shown by the record. Finding XVIII is therefore corrected by striking out the word "not" in the first line thereof, and as corrected said finding is hereby made the finding of the court. It is as follows: "That it is true that during the years 1921 and 1922 the plaintiffs herein and each of them represented repeatedly to defendant that they respectively were interested in certain portions of that certain tract of land known as the Titus ranch, and shown on the map attached to defendant's answer and marked 'Exhibit "A",' including the lands described in said complaint, and the plaintiffs repeatedly urged, and each of them repeatedly urged, defendant to hasten the construction of canals to and through said Titus ranch to provide water for the irrigation of all the lands therein which were included within defendant district; and said plaintiffs and each of them offered to and did cooperate with defendant in removing objections to defendant's use of the rights of way selected by defendant for certain of said canals; that plaintiffs and each of them at all times well knew that all the land in said Titus ranch was of a sandy nature and that said ranch contained numerous swales and depressions, and that the ground water in said Titus ranch was at all times near to and at certain times higher than the bottoms of certain of said swales and depressions; that plaintiffs and each of them knew the plans of defendant for the construction of said canals and of the necessity of constructing said canals with high banks across said swales and depressions in order that all of said land might be irrigated; that plaintiffs and each of them at all times knew that defendant had no funds with which to pay for lining any portions of said canals with concrete and would not have funds for that purpose for many years after the construction of said canals, and plaintiffs and each of them at all times well knew that defendant had planned a graudual development of a comprehensive system of drainage; that notwithstanding their knowledge of the facts aforesaid, plaintiffs and each of them repeatedly urged defendant during the winter and spring of 1923 to complete certain canals constructed by defendant in said Titus ranch in the year 1922 for permanent use of defendant in supplying water for the irrigation of lands in said district, including the lands described in said complaint, and repeatedly urged defendant to hasten the delivery and continue the delivery of water in 1923 and 1924 through said canals as the same had been so constructed; that defendant, in response to said urgings of plaintiffs and each of them, did hasten the construction of said canals and the delivery of water to said lands, including the lands described in said complaint as urged and requested by plaintiffs, and did construct said canals as urged by the plaintiffs at the places and in the manner so urged by plaintiffs and by each of them, and with the soil through which said canals were constructed, and defendant believed, and was led by the aforesaid repeated urging of plaintiffs and each of them to believe, that the plaintiffs and each of them would consider that any damage that might be caused by the seeping or breaking of water from said canals would be necessary and incidental to the development of said Titus ranch by means of irrigation from said canals; that defendant would not have constructed said canals or any canals to said lands described in said complaint, and would not have constructed said canals with high banks across said swales and depressions except for said repeated urging of plaintiffs and each of them, and unless it had understood and believed that plaintiffs and each of them would consider the construction of said canals aforesaid as the full performance of defendant's duty to plaintiffs and to other owners of land to be irrigated from the said canals."

Before passing to the consideration of the questions arising from the appeal from the judgment, denying plaintiffs' prayer for an injunction and damages, we will set forth the nature and character of plaintiffs' second cause of action, in which they ask for a mandatory injunction directing and commanding the defendant to forthwith construct and install suitable drainage works to drain the lands of the plaintiffs and to remove therefrom water brought thereon by the defendant.

In their second cause of action, the plaintiffs incorporate all of the allegations of the first cause of action and make them a part of their second cause of action. They then allege that one of the purposes for which the defendant was organized was that of supplying drainage to the lands within the district, and particularly lands which would require drainage on account of the irrigation carried on by the district, and that all of plaintiffs' lands within the district are entitled to be supplied with drainage facilities; that the district has levied assessments and voted bonds in part for the construction of drainage works, and has constructed numerous such works within the district; that it now has on hand certain funds available for that purpose; that the defendant has constructed no works for the drainage of plaintiffs' lands except one well which is inadequate, and that, in order to restore plaintiffs' said lands to their natural condition and make them capable of growing crops, it will be necessary to line said canals with concrete, and construct and operate such wells as shall reduce the water table under all parts of plaintiffs' lands to a depth of at least ten feet below the surface of said lands, and to keep it at said level; that defendant will, unless enjoined by this court, apply said funds, available for drainage purposes and raised for that purpose, to other uses and purposes, thus depriving plaintiffs of the drainage facilities to which they are entitled; and that plaintiffs have demanded that defendant construct said drainage works, but defendant has refused said demand, except the one well mentioned above.

To the allegations contained in this cause of action, the defendant in its amended answer to the complaint made answer consisting of certain admissions and denials, and a further recitation of facts as to the drainage conditions existing in said district, and the efforts made by the defendant to remedy these conditions, and, as the court's findings follow in all substantial respects the allegations of the answer, it will not be necessary to separately state these allegations, but we will pass to the findings of the court in response to the issues made by the pleadings in this cause of action. Preliminary to statement of facts as found by the court, it might be well to state that the defendant admits that it is under obligation, in so far as the funds of the district will permit, to provide for drainage facilities for all lands within the district, which are in need of drainage by reason of the irrigation operations of the district. The court found: That immediately after its organization the defendant, during the years 1920, 1921, and 1922, caused studies and investigations to be made in order to formulate a comprehensive plan for the control of ground water and the drainage of lands of the district injuriously affected thereby. That such a plan was adopted, and in pursuance thereof defendant purchased certain drainage canals and works theretofore constructed, and installed within the district thirty-five drainage wells and pumping plants in such locations within the district as the drainage engineer of the district determined would be most effective in controlling the ground water and preventing its flow into and upon the lands in the westerly and southwesterly portions of the district. These wells and pumping plants were installed prior to the 31st day of March, 1924, and were operated during the irrigation season of 1924 and thereafter. Six additional wells and pumping plants were installed during the seasons of 1925 and 1926, and fourteen during the following season, all located to the eastward and northeastward of the lands of plaintiffs and so located in the judgment of the board of directors of the defendant and of its engineers as to be most effective in controlling the ground water within the district and to prevent the flow of as much thereof as possible toward the lands in the westerly and southwesterly portions of the district. That up to September 30, 1926 (the complaint in this action was filed October 26, 1926), the district had expended in carrying out its drainage plans the sum of $495,978.63. During the following year, the district spent for the same purpose $172,561.13, and its budget for the year beginning September 30, 1927, contains estimated items of expenditure in the sum of $288,048.24 for drainage purposes and lining of canals. The amount of $495,978.63 mentioned above includes the sum of $130,000 for canal lining; and the item of $172,561.13, expended for drainage purposes during the year ending September 30, 1927, includes $40,000 paid out for canal lining.

Then follows the following finding: "That all drainage pumping plants have been operated since their installation whenever necessary for the control of ground water; that thereby great quantities of water have been prevented from flowing into the lands described in the complaint, and if it should be considered and determined by the board of directors of defendant district that for the best interests of said district further drainage works than as aforesaid are required, defendant will, as funds can be obtained from time to time for that purpose, install additional drainage works or adopt other practicable means of controlling the ground water in the district, to such an extent as may be practicable, fair and equitable, and for the best interests of said district, everything considered."

A further finding of the court is to the effect that none of the lands of the plaintiffs are entitled to be supplied by defendant with facilities for drainage, except such facilities as may from time to time be found necessary by the board of directors of the defendant in pursuance of the comprehensive plan for the control of ground water adopted by the district; that the district had on hand at the commencement of this action no funds available for drainage purposes; that the district since the commencement of this action has raised no money for the purpose or available for drainage purposes, except such money as has been expended by the district for that purpose. In addition to the foregoing, the court also made the following findings:

"That it is true that defendant has done all that it could reasonably and fairly and equitably do for the drainage of plaintiffs' said lands and the control of the ground water flowing therein and thereto, with the funds available for that purpose, and that the money heretofore expended by defendant for the control of ground water and canal lining as set forth was all the money that could have been fairly and equitably expended for that purpose. * * *

"That it is not true that defendant has refused to construct drainage works for the lands described in the complaint. That it is not true that defendant has constructed only one drainage well for the benefit of the land described in the complaint. That it is true that defendant has made provision for the drainage and protection of said lands in accordance with the best, fair and honest judgment of the board of directors and the necessities and funds of the district."

Upon the findings thus made by the court, judgment was entered that plaintiffs take nothing by said action and that defendant recover its costs. From this judgment the plaintiffs have appealed.

[2] The first attack upon the judgment is that the findings are not supported by the evidence. Some eight different assignments are stated in plaintiffs' brief in which they claim the evidence is insufficient. This statement is brief and does not attempt to do more than assign the grounds upon which plaintiffs rely in support of their contention that the evidence is insufficient.

Plaintiffs have not indicated in their brief any particular testimony on which they rely in support of their contention that the findings are not supported by the evidence, nor have they pointed out, or attempted to, any lack, defect, or deficiency in the evidence on the part of the defendant which would render it subject to plaintiffs' attack. Plaintiffs' brief contains a comparatively short general résumé of the evidence without a single reference to the reporter's transcript and with the mention of the names of only three witnesses out of the forty or more witnesses who testified during the trial. In the place of an argument as to the facts of the case, the plaintiffs have inserted in their brief what purports to be the testimony in the case reduced to narrative form, consisting of some 165 pages of closely printed matter, preceding it with the following statement: "The main facts in the case are all established by positive engineering testimony of both parties, and it is without any material conflict. We recognize the burden that we are required to place upon the court in asking it to review the findings, and we do not wish to do so on a mere argument as to the facts, and have, therefore, carefully reduced the testimony of the witnesses for both parties to narrative form and, with the résumé which we have already made of it, that testimony we deem the best answer to the findings in the case."

In such a case it is not the duty of the court to discover, even if it were able to do so, the particular evidence upon which the plaintiffs rely. On the other hand, the decisions of this court are to the effect that this burden is with the party assailing the finding. In Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 689, 76 P. 661, 662, where a like situation arose, the court said: "It is claimed that the findings are in many particulars unsupported by the evidence. The greater number of these objections are not presented in a manner that will warrant us in noticing them. * * * The court and counsel for respondent are left to discover, if they can, the particular point in which the evidence fails to support the respective findings. 'Under these circumstances we do not feel called upon to prosecute an independent inquiry in order to find out' in what respects the evidence is insufficient." In the case of Brovelli v. Bianchi, 136 Cal. 612, 613, 69 P. 416, we find a similar statement of the law in the following language: "The first point made is that the evidence does not sustain the findings. The evidence is not pointed out in the brief of appellant, and no suggestion made as to the respects wherein the evidence fails to support the findings or any finding. In such case we will not endeavor to discover the respects wherein the evidence is insufficient, but will presume that it supports every material finding of fact." Again this court, in the case of Kyle v. Craig, 125 Cal. 107, 116, 57 P. 791, 795, held as follows: "And, even if the specifications in the assignments of error were sufficient, counsel has not pointed out in his brief and called our attention to the particular finding or findings claimed to have no support in the evidence, and the particulars in which such finding is not supported by the evidence. In such case we do not deem it our duty to investigate the questions as to the insufficiency of the evidence." In Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, vol. 2, Revised Edition, § 278, p. 1544, we find the rule stated as follows: "And where briefs are filed it is the duty of counsel to present all that is material to the points involved. Thus in Williston v. Perkins, 51 Cal. 554, where the appellant's counsel in his brief made out a prima facie case of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify a finding of fact, and the respondent did not advert to the appellant's showing upon this point, the court modified the judgment, saying: 'If there be in the voluminous record on file any evidence going to support the findings in the respect referred to, the respondent should have pointed it out. It is not our business to institute a search to find it.' "

We feel that the language quoted from the foregoing authorities correctly states the situation in the present action. If there is any evidence or lack of evidence in the record which will sustain plaintiffs' contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, they should point out this evidence to the court rather than to present us a voluminous document, purporting to contain the evidence of both parties to the action, and require this court to sift out of this mass of testimony that which may support the contention of the plaintiffs. Furthermore, the narrative of the evidence as prepared by the plaintiffs does not, it is evident, contain all the evidence of both parties to the action. The defendant calls attention to the fact that there is omitted therefrom all the cross-examination of plaintiffs' witnesses, and, by comparing it with the reporter's transcript, it appears that the larger part of defendant's evidence has not been included in plaintiffs' statement of facts. In fact, while more than thirty witnesses testified on behalf of the defendant, the testimony of only two of these witnesses is contained in plaintiffs' statement.

It is true that these two witnesses were engineers, and plaintiffs state in their brief that "the facts in the case are all established by positive engineering testimony," but there is nothing to show the court, unless we review the entire typewritten record in the case, that at least some of the other twenty-eight witnesses who testified for defendant did not either give "engineering testimony" or testimony which, while not strictly of that nature, was of such weight and character as to have a material bearing upon many of the issues of the case. For these reasons we find ourselves at great disadvantage in reviewing the points made by the plaintiffs in respect to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. We have, however, carefully gone over the narrative statement of the evidence prepared by the plaintiff, with such other parts of the testimony as appear to have a material bearing upon the questions raised by plaintiffs' attack upon the findings.

[3] Among other findings the court found that the plaintiffs were barred from relief, either equitable or legal, because they or their predecessors in interest had deeded rights of way for the canals as constructed on their lands, or had consented or acquiesced in the construction of said canals. Plaintiffs do not question the execution and delivery of the deeds heretofore mentioned nor that they were bound by the terms thereof, with possibly one exception, nor that substantially all of the canals constructed on their lands were constructed upon rights of way acquired by defendant through said conveyances. Plaintiffs do contend that the deed from John W. Mitchell to the Merced Canal & Irrigation Company is not of any binding effect upon them, for the reason that its terms are so indefinite and uncertain as to render it void, and that it failed to specify any particular kind of canals that were to be constructed thereunder. We question whether either of these reasons constitute a valid objection to said deed. But, leaving out of consideration the Mitchell deed, the two deeds from the East Side Investment Company, and the one from Lyon & Hoag cover rights of way for substantially all the canals constructed by defendant upon plaintiffs' lands. Besides these deeds, the evidence shows without contradiction, and the plaintiffs so concede, that they consented to and acquiesced in the construction of all of said canals and laterals. At or about the time the defendant was constructing said canals, the plaintiffs were engaged in a selling campaign of their lands, which they had some time before divided into 40-acre tracts. It was necessary, in order to sell the lands to any advantage, to have water for the same, and the plaintiffs for some time before and while said canals were being constructed urged and even demanded that the defendant complete the construction of said canals at as early a date as possible so that plaintiffs could successfully wage their selling campaign. In fact, a statement appears in the record, which is not contradicted, that the plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant asking damages for the delay of defendant in the construction of certain of said canals. Having acquiesced in the construction of said canals, plaintiffs are now in no position to ask for an injunction prohibiting defendant from maintaining and operating them, nor to have the same abated as a nuisance.

[4, 5] The defendant, the Merced irrigation district, is an agency of the state, and the use to which water owned and controlled by it is put is a public use. The law is too well established in this state to require any extended citation of authorities that, where the owner of property acquiesces in, or even stands by and makes no suitable objection to, its use for a public purpose, he cannot thereafter enjoin the continuance of such public use. The latest case upon this subject is Conaway v. Yolo Water & Power Co., 204 Cal. 125, 266 P. 944, 946, 58 A. L. R. 674, in which this court said: "Where property is taken for a public use by a public service corporation and the owner of the property has not in an appropriate way objected to its being so taken, but has, by silence or quiescence, permitted the public use to be inaugurated and carried on for some period of time, he has thus waived or lost his right to proceed against such use of his property by ejectment or abatement." Other cases enunciating the same rule are Reed v. Oakdale Irrigation District, 46 Cal. App. 139, 142, 188 P. 832; Barton v. Riverside Water Co., 155 Cal. 509, 515, 101 P. 790, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331; Miller & Lux v. Enterprise Canal & Land Co., 169 Cal. 415, 423, 147 P. 567, and Gurnsey v. Northern Cal. Power Co., 160 Cal. 699, 711, 117 P. 906, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185. If mere acquiescence in the use of private land by a public corporation will work a waiver of a property owner's right to enjoin such use, the rule should be much more strictly drawn against one who has not only acquiesced, but has expressly consented and urged and importuned the taking of his land for such public use. In neither case will an injunction lie against such use of his property, nor will the court abate the use thereof as a nuisance.

In the case of Conaway v. Yolo Water & Power Co., supra, it was held that, "in such case, if he has suffered damage to his property * * * he is, of course, entitled to be compensated in damages." This brings us to a consideration of the question of damages which the plaintiffs contend they are entitled to by reason of the maintenance and operation of said canals upon their lands. Are the plaintiffs barred from recovering such damages by reason of the conveyances executed by them and their predecessors in interest, under which by far the greater, if not all, of said canals and laterals were constructed, and by their acquiescence and consent to the construction of all of said canals and laterals?

We have already referred to certain deeds executed either by the plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest, under which some of the canals complained of were constructed over the plaintiffs' lands. Besides these deeds conveying rights of way for specific canals named therein, there was the deed from John W. Mitchell, who owned the Titus ranch a long time prior to the time the plaintiffs acquired their lands. In this instrument Mitchell, who was the party of the second part, granted to the Merced Canal & Irrigation Company, a predecessor in interest of the defendant, "and assigns the right of way for the purpose of constructing and using ditches, canals, flumes, pipes and conveyances for water through and across all the lands hereinbefore mentioned and all lands belonging to party of the second part situate in said county of Merced south of the Merced river." It is conceded that the lands referred to in this conveyance included the lands now owned by the plaintiffs in the Titus ranch. Plaintiffs claim that this deed is void for uncertainty, and for other reasons is invalid. We think none of these objections can be maintained, but we do not rest our decision in this case solely upon the effect of this conveyance. Aside from this deed, plaintiffs concede that they acquiesced and consented to the construction of all of said canals and laterals, both those which were constructed under express grants of rights of way therefor, and those which were not so constructed.

[6] Nevertheless, the plaintiffs contend that they are entitled to damages under the Constitution of the state, which provides that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to the owner. Const. art. 1, § 14. Plaintiffs contend that they occupy the same position regarding their right to recover damages claimed to have been sustained by reason of the seepage from defendant's canals, as if, instead of securing grants of rights of way, and rights by acquiescence and consent, the defendant had by condemnation proceedings acquired the right to construct said canals over the lands of plaintiffs. In Sternes v. Sutter Butte Canal Company, 61 Cal. App. 737, 741, 216 P. 66, 68, it was held "that a grant of a right of way, in general terms, is the exact counterpart of whatever damages would be considered and determined by the court and allowed in condemnation proceedings." We think the same rule would apply when instead of a grant deed the landowner expressly agreed to the taking of his property for public use. In case private property has been taken by condemnation, the rule is that the owner has received in said proceeding all damages to his property which would be the natural, necessary, and reasonable incident to the taking thereof for public use. In case he has given his consent to such taking by deed, he is precluded from subsequently recovering any damage that he might have recovered in an action had the public use been taken by condemnation. Sternes v. Sutter Butte Canal Company, supra. We think the same rule applies where the private owner has, as the plaintiffs in this case have, expressly consented to the taking of their property for a public use. Particularly should this be so when, as in the instant case, the private owners have not only acquiesced and consented, but have importuned and demanded the construction of the public improvement upon their property.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs, in respect to their right to recover damages for seepage of water upon their lands from defendant's canals, are in the same position as they would have been in had the defendant condemned the right to construct said canals upon plaintiffs' lands. If damages for seepage could be recovered in a condemnation proceeding, then the plaintiffs, having expressly given their consent to the construction of said canals upon their lands, are precluded from thereafter recovering any damages which they may have sustained from the seepage of water therefrom. In the case of Sternes v. Sutter Butte Canal Company, supra, this question was squarely before the court, with the result that the court held that damages for seepage was a proper item to be taken into consideration by the court in determining in a condemnation proceeding the extent and amount of defendants' damage. That part of the opinion in that case bearing upon this question is to be found on page 742 of 61 Cal. App., 216 P. 66, 69, and is as follows:

"That damages inflicted upon land not taken by seepage may be considered in condemnation proceedings seems clearly allowable. In Denver City Irr. Co. v. Middaugh, 12 Colo. 434, 13 Am. St. Rep. 234, 21 P. 565, the court thus expressed its views: 'In assessing damages in condemnation proceedings for lands taken for the purpose of constructing a ditch or reservoir thereon, injuries likely to result from seepage and leakage from such canal or reservoir would naturally be among the first items to occur to a jury.' Further: 'An examination of the reported cases shows that there is no substantial difference in the general rules applicable to the assessment of damages in condemnation proceedings, as announced by the courts of last resort, but in the application of such rules to particular cases the same uniformity has not been observed; still no case has been called to our attention which by any fair construction can be held to be in conflict with the conclusion that damages for seepage and leakage should have been determined in the first proceeding.'

"In the more recent case of Farmers' Reservoir & Irr. Co. v. Cooper, 54 Colo. 402, 130 P. 1004, the Supreme Court of Colorado uses the following language: 'In condemnation proceedings all damages, present and prospective, that are the natural, necessary, or reasonable incident of taking the property sought to be condemned, must be assessed.' It was there held that seepage, and damages resulting from seepage, constituted an incident to be considered by the court or jury whenever land was taken for a right of way to construct a canal."

We find nothing contrary to this decision. Plaintiffs have cited the case of Turpen v. Turlock Irrigation District, 141 Cal. 1, 74 P. 295, where the trial court expressly found that the canals were negligently constructed, and this court held that "damages caused by the seepage from faulty construction of the canal could not have well been anticipated, and were not included in the condemnation proceeding." Such damage was not the natural, necessary, and reasonable incident to the use and operation of said canal. In the present action the court found that the canals and laterals were constructed with care, skill, and prudence and in a workmanlike manner. Plaintiffs do not question this finding. The seepage therefrom was only in such quantities as was usual and unavoidable from canals of that character constructed over lands like the plaintiffs'. It was therefore but the natural, necessary, and reasonable incident to the use and operation of said canals. It was such damage as could be recovered in an action of condemnation. Quoting further from Sternes v. Sutter Butte Canal Company, page 743 of 61 Cal. App., 216 P. 66, 69, the court said: "It thus appears by an unbroken line of authorities, and also as well by good reasoning, that whenever a grant of a right of way is executed by a land owner he thereby estops himself from afterwards prosecuting any action for the past, present, or future damages that may have occurred, or reasonably be expected to occur, by reason of the necessary, natural, and ordinary use of the utility or public service for which the right of way is granted. And this includes the natural, reasonably to be anticipated, and ordinary injury resulting to adjacent land from seepage, if the land is of a character that admits of or may be reasonably expected to admit of such action of the waters taking place."

We have no question that the facts in this case bring it within the rule announced above. Plaintiffs concede that their lands were sandy and porous in character. They, and their predecessors in interest, well knew that canals constructed over them would cause more or less seepage. They did not in their conveyances of rights of way, or in any other manner, make any provision to protect themselves against such damages, or require of defendant that it construct any particular kind of canal or that the canals be constructed of any material different from the soil and materials through which they were built. Plaintiffs admit that they knew that said canals would seep large quantities of water unless they were lined with cement and that this knowledge was gained from reading a report prepared by J. D. Galloway, an engineer employed by the district to make investigations regarding the conditions in the district preparatory to the preparation and adoption by the district of plans for a comprehensive irrigation system. This report was prepared and presented to the district some time prior to June 23, 1921, as we find on that date Mr. Galloway presented a supplemental report to the board of directors of the district. We have been unable to determine the date of the original report. The supplemental report was filed almost a year before the two deeds of rights of way from the East Side Investment Company to the district were executed and about the same length of time before the date of the deed from the plaintiff Lyon & Hoag to the district. In none of these deeds is there to be found any provision for the lining of the canals or for the protection of the grantors from damage due to seepage. Considerable correspondence passed between the several plaintiffs and the district before and during the time the canals and laterals complained of were being constructed, and our attention has not been directed to a single line in this correspondence in which the plaintiffs or any of them expressed the belief, or in the slightest respect indicated that they expected the canals would be lined or constructed any differently than they were actually constructed. From these facts we can draw but one conclusion, and that is that the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest at all times before and after they consented to the construction of the canals and laterals upon their lands knew that in all reasonable probability there would be seepage from said canals as a matter of course, and with this knowledge they executed said deeds to rights of way for said canals and in other ways already referred to acquiesced in, consented to, and demanded the construction of said canals and laterals across their lands. Under these circumstances it is apparent that the damage, if any, sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of seepage from said canals was "the natural, reasonably to be anticipated, and ordinary injury resulting to" their lands from the construction of said canals, and under the authorities above cited plaintiffs, by the grants of rights of way, and other acts indicating consent to the construction of said canals, are estopped from prosecuting any action for the recovery of such damage by reason of the said seepage from said canals.

Plaintiffs make the claim, however, that they and their predecessors in interest were led to believe by the defendant that they would be protected from any damage which might arise from seepage, and that said grants of rights of way and their acquiescence and consent to the construction of said canals were obtained under the belief that the defendant would line said canals with cement, and would install appliances for the drainage of said lands, should the same require drainage. This claim is based almost, if not entirely, upon the report of Engineer Galloway already referred to. This report, as we have seen, was prepared by Mr. Galloway for the district before the district began the construction of its irrigation system and for the purpose of providing a comprehensive plan under which the district could work and install an adequate and proper system for the irrigation of the lands of the district. In his report, Mr. Galloway emphasized the drainage problem as one of the serious problems with which the district would have to contend after its irrigation system was in operation. He mentioned, as the most feasible and practicable solution of the drainage problem, lining of canals to prevent seepage, excavation of open ditches, and installation of pumping plants lifting water from the lower strata. He estimated that it might be necessary to spend $750,000 for drainage purposes, and that this amount might be exceeded in the distant future. He expressly stated that the problem was one to be solved in the future. In a subsequent part of his report he placed the costs "for pumps, canals, etc., the sum of $350,000." It is not contended by plaintiffs that they had any promise or understanding, either direct or indirect, that the district would install any system for the drainage of their lands. If they placed any reliance or confidence in the report of Mr. Galloway, they had every reason to believe that there might be a certain amount of seepage from the canals, yet neither the plaintiffs nor their predecessors in interest made any attempt to have the district protect them from such damage. The grants of rights of way, as we have seen, were absolute in form, and contained no reservations or provisions which might be construed into an attempt to provide against damage from seepage, or as a requirement of the defendant to line its canals or to install any drainage facilities. When the plaintiffs were urging and insisting that the district hasten the construction of said canals so that they might secure water upon their lands, they gave no intimation that they were relying upon the Galloway report or upon any implied promise of the district that they would be given special protection from the results which they had every reason to expect would follow from the construction of earthen canals in which to convey the water to and over their lands. There is no evidence before us of a convincing character that either the plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest were influenced in any manner whatever by anything contained in the Galloway report.

[7] The court found that the defendant had not damaged the plaintiffs in the "particulars set forth in plaintiffs' complaint or any of said particulars, or in any other manner or in any amount at all." There is no question that the water plane under plaintiffs' lands is higher now, or was at the time of the trial, than it was in years previous and before the canals of the defendant had been constructed upon their lands. There was also ample evidence to support a finding that this rise in the underground water was largely due to seepage from defendant's said canals. On the other hand, there was evidence that long prior to the organization of the defendant district, and as early as 1904, the water plane under the lands of plaintiffs began to rise, due in part at least to the extensive irrigation system constructed and operated by the Crocker-Huffman Company upon their land to the north and east of the Titus ranch. G. S. Bloss, who owned the Titus ranch from 1904 to 1919, testified that there was a gradual rise in the water plane during the time he owned the ranch of about one foot a year. Other witnesses gave testimony corroborating this evidence. While there was evidence that, after defendant constructed its canals upon the Titus ranch, the rise in the water levels showed even a greater increase than in previous years, yet plaintiffs' own witness, H. L. Haehl, an engineer employed by the plaintiffs to make measurements and observations in regard to the water plane under the Titus ranch, testified in a number of instances that the measurements made by him showed a rise in this water plane of about one foot per year from 1920 to 1927. It will thus be seen that there is substantial evidence to be found in the record showing that the rise in the water plane in the Titus ranch showed no increase after the construction of defendant's canals over what it had been before the defendant began any of its irrigation projects.

Conceding that the evidence shows that there was some increase in this rise of water after the date defendant began its operations, there is ample evidence in the record to account for a material part, if not all, of said increase. In January, 1922, the defendant district acquired the irrigation system of the Crocker-Huffman Company. At that time there were only 52,000 acres of land under irrigation. The district immediately began to extend the irrigation system acquired by it not only to lands lying northeast and east of the Titus ranch, but into the Titus ranch itself. In 1924, there were 66,000 acres irrigated in the district; in 1925, 93,000; in 1926, 103,000; and in 1927, 112,000 acres. As we have seen, the plaintiffs' lands were located in practically the lowest part of the district, and necessarily they would receive an increased amount of underground water as irrigation was extended to the lands in other parts of the district. So whatever increase there was in the elevation of the water underlying the lands of the Titus ranch could be reasonably accounted for to a large extent by the increase in the acreage within the district brought under irrigation during this period of time. The court further found, and there was substantial evidence to support the finding, that the users of water on the Titus ranch carelessly and negligently caused large portions of water delivered to them for irrigation purposes to run into certain swales and depressions and accumulate therein, thus causing the ground water thereunder to rise during the spring and summer. The court also found that an artesian well installed on the Titus ranch and flowing a large stream of water had been permitted to flow during the period complained of and that the water from this well had contributed to a certain extent in causing the rise of water under portions of the Titus ranch. With this testimony before us we are unable to hold that the finding of the court that defendant had not damaged the plaintiffs finds no support in the evidence. On the other hand, it is apparent from the references herein made to the testimony that said finding finds substantial support in the evidence.

There are other specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence, but they relate to minor matters and we deem it unnecessary to give them any special consideration, for the reason that, if we are correct in the views expressed above, these other questions are of no material importance. For the same reason we consider it unnecessary to pass upon the question as to whether the plaintiffs' cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations or to discuss other findings of the court made in response to said affirmative answer. If plaintiffs have failed to sustain the cause of action alleged in the complaint, as we have held they have, then it is of no consequence, in so far as this action is concerned, whether the alleged cause of action is or is not barred by the statute of limitations, or whether or not certain of the affirmative defenses were sustained by the evidence.

[8-12] Plaintiffs' second cause of action, in which they ask for a mandatory injunction requiring the defendant to install suitable drainage works to drain their lands and to remove therefrom the water brought to said lands by the defendant, is predicated upon an act of the Legislature entitled, "An act to provide for drainage by irrigation districts." Stats. 1907, p. 569. Section 1 of this act empowers an irrigation district to "provide for any and all drainage made necessary by the irrigation provided for" by the laws relating to irrigation districts. Section 2 of said act reads as follows: "Whenever it appears necessary, or proper, or beneficial to the lands affected thereby, to drain such lands or any portion thereof on account of the irrigation which has been done, or which is intended to be done under such laws, whether for the purpose of more beneficially carrying on such irrigation, or to protect such districts from liability by reason of such irrigation, whether the irrigation works have already been constructed or not, it shall be the duty of the board of directors to provide for such drainage, and said board and its officers, agents and employees shall do all necessary and proper acts for the construction, repair, maintenance and management of drainage work for such purpose."

It is the contention of the plaintiffs that the duty of an irrigation district to furnish drainage to lands within the district requiring the same is expressly enjoined upon it by this statute, and therefore such duty may be enforced by mandate of the court. Code Civ. Proc. § 1085.

There can be no question but that by this act of the Legislature, an irrigation district is given the power and authority to provide for drainage made necessary by the operation of the irrigation system installed and operated by the district. It is equally clear that this act makes it the duty of an irrigation district to provide for such drainage. Being a duty enjoined by law, it can be enforced by a mandate of court. Whether in a particular case a landowner in the district can invoke the aid of the court to compel the district to perform the duty imposed upon it by the statute would depend upon the facts of that particular case. There are two propositions at least which must be established before a court would be justified in issuing the mandate requiring the district to perform the duty of providing drainage. The first of these is that the landowner in the district must prove by satisfactory and sufficient evidence that his lands are in need of drainage made necessary by the irrigation operations of the district; and the second is whether the district is acting under the power conferred upon it by the statute and is doing all within its power to perform the duty enjoined upon it by the statute.

As to the first of these two propositions, we think there can be no question but that the plaintiffs have shown that their lands are in need of drainage by reason of the irrigation operations of the district. On a large part of the plaintiffs' lands the evidence shows that the underground water is so near the surface that neither trees, vines, nor ordinary crops can be profitably grown thereon. This high-water plane is shown to be due in the main to the irrigation of plaintiffs' lands and those of the district lying in their near vicinity and to the east and northeast of the Titus ranch. It is also shown that a certain amount of water seeps from defendant's canals and ditches and contributes to the rise of the water underlying plaintiffs' lands. Practically the only contributing cause to the rise of this water plane, not due to the acts of the district, is that which is occasioned by the artesian well heretofore mentioned. The defendant had no control over said well, but its influence upon the water plane was confined to only a small area adjacent to said well, and in itself constituted but a small factor in producing the general condition existing through plaintiffs' lands.

We will now pass to the second of the two propositions stated above, and in its consideration we will endeavor to determine what steps, if any, the defendant has taken toward discharging the duty enjoined upon it by the statute to drain plaintiffs' lands, and whether the same have been such as to constitute a reasonable compliance with the requirements of the statute. We have already referred to the report of Engineer Galloway, made before the district had begun any of its irrigation operations. In that report the question of drainage was given extended consideration, and the best means of draining lands of the character of those composing the district were outlined in said report with great care. Following the installation by the district of its irrigation system, as shown by the findings quoted above, large sums of money were expended by the district in the lining of its canals, so as to prevent seepage therefrom upon adjacent lands, and in sinking wells and installing pumps thereon for the purpose of extracting water that had as a result of the irrigation in the district flowed into and collected under the lands in certain parts of the district. No question is raised but that the means thus employed were suitable and proper for drainage purposes. The evidence further shows and the court finds that the district had at the time of the trial made provision in its annual budget for a large sum of money, amounting to $288,048.24, "for drainage purposes and lining of canals." It will be presumed that the same policy of raising money for the purpose of perfecting and extending its system of drainage has been followed by the district in succeeding years. At least there is nothing before us that the district has not done so.

But disregarding what the district may have since done, the evidence shows that up to the time of the trial it had followed a consistent, effective, and comprehensive plan for the drainage of the lands in the district, including those of the plaintiffs, and, with particular reference to the efforts of the district to drain the lands of the plaintiff of the underground water therein, the court found: "That the defendant has done all that it could reasonably and fairly and equitably do for the drainage of plaintiffs' lands, and the control of the ground water flowing therein and thereto, with the funds available for that purpose and that the money heretofore expended by defendant for the control of the ground water and the canal lining as set forth was all the money that could have been fairly and equitably expended for that purpose."

It is true that the district has not yet solved its drainage problems, nor has it installed sufficient and adequate equipment to thoroughly drain all of plaintiffs' lands. In fact, the evidence shows that, at the time of the trial, large bodies of plaintiffs' lands were injuriously affected by surface waters that had accumulated in and under said lands as a result of the irrigation of lands in the district. Plaintiffs insist that under the statute they are entitled to have their lands, if not absolutely, at least reasonably drained and freed from the water that has thus accumulated thereunder. Under a proper showing they would undoubtedly be entitled to this relief, but not under the facts proven in this proceeding. The plaintiffs are, of course, entitled to no greater right than any other landowner in the district whose lands are situated and affected similarly as those of the plaintiffs. There is evidence in the record, which we think is uncontradicted, that there are 50,000 acres of land in the district in need of drainage on the average more seriously than do the lands of the plaintiffs. If the plaintiffs are entitled to a mandatory injunction requiring the district to drain their lands so that they will be free from ground water injuriously affecting them, then the balance of the owners of the 50,000 acres of land, whose lands are entitled to drainage by the district, would be entitled to the same remedy by the courts; and if the plaintiffs are successful in this proceeding, then it would only be reasonable to expect the balance of the owners of lands similarly situated to seek enforcement of their rights. The result would be that the district would be forced at once to enlarge its drainage system by the lining of practically all its canals and ditches, and by sinking wells equipped with pumps sufficient to drain all of the 50,000 acres in the district entitled to drainage. According to the testimony of Mr. Means, an engineer and a witness for the defendant, canal lining would cost about $12,000 a mile, or between six and eight million dollars to line the canals of defendant in the sand area alone, and lining of canals without drainage works would not, according to Mr. Means, control the ground water. The evidence shows that the district is in no position to meet the cost of such extensive additions to its present drainage system. The district had at the time of the trial a bonded indebtedness of $16,000,000, and the entire assessed value of all property within the district was less than $23,000,000. Its tax rate was one of the highest in the state. To compel the district to immediately install the facilities and works necessary to drain all the land in the district requiring drainage would bring financial ruin upon the district and irreparable injury to the landowners in the district, including the plaintiffs. We do not believe that, under this state of facts, it was ever intended by those responsible for the enactment of the Drainage Act of 1907 that an irrigation district, situated as is the defendant in this action, should be compelled to work its own destruction by undertaking to provide drainage facilities for the district, the expense of which is beyond its financial ability to meet or pay for. In fact, before a writ of mandate will issue to compel a public corporation or agency to perform an act involving the expenditure of money, it must affirmatively appear that there are funds available for that purpose. Buschmann et al. v. Turlock Irr.

Dist., 47 Cal. App. 321, 190 P. 491; Nelson v. Anderson, etc., Irr. Dist. 51 Cal. App. 92, 196 P. 292, 293; Farris v. State, 46 Neb. 857, 65 N. W. 890.

In the Nelson Case, the court said: "By finding 16 it appears that there is no money available, and cannot be made available, for the immediate construction of lateral 3—1—2, under the law authorizing an assessment of 2 per cent. of the aggregate value of the lands within the district, as provided by chapter 291 of the statutes of the state of California enacted in 1919; and that the amount of money in said funds so created does not exceed the aggregate of the duly authorized and issued warrants of said irrigation district. As to when any of the funds of the district can be used for construction purposes, and what steps must be taken to authorize such use, have been discussed by this court in Buschmann et al. v. Turlock Irr. Dist., 47 Cal. App. 321, 190 P. 491, and need not here be repeated. And until these funds are available for the construction of the canals, ditches, and laterals authorized by the voters of the district, it is evident that this court can issue no mandate requiring the immediate undertaking of such work. It will be presumed that the directors of the district will expend the money for the purposes for which it has been raised, and the fact that the directors of the district were not able to complete the construction of the lateral referred to out of the moneys raised as the proceeds of prior bond issues does not authorize the issuance of the writ of mandate. It must be first shown that the money is available before its application can be directed. We do not deem it necessary to cite authorities upon this point."

Our conclusion, therefore, as to the second proposition stated above, is that the defendant district recognizes the duty imposed upon it by the statute and is endeavoring to comply with the requirements of said statute. While it has not succeeded in discharging this duty to its fullest extent, it has done all that could reasonably be required of it with the money available for that purpose, and which the resources of the district will permit. Under such a state of facts, the writ of mandate will not lie. The writ is an equitable remedy and will not always issue as a matter of right. As was said in Gammon v. McKevitt, 50 Cal. App. 656, 665, 195 P. 726, 730: "The writ of mandamus is not wholly a writ of right, but lies, to a considerable extent, within the sound judicial discretion of the court where the application is made; * * * and no court should allow a writ of mandamus to compel a technical compliance with the letter of the law, where such compliance will violate the spirit of the law." In California Jurisprudence, vol. 14, p. 178, the rule is stated as follows: "As in other cases, the propriety of issuing a mandatory writ is determined according to the particular circumstances, and issuance of it rests in the sound discretion of the court." The author cites in support of this text, Clough v. W. H. Healy Co., 53 Cal. App. 397, 200 P. 378.

The present action appears to have been thoroughly tried in the court below, the trial lasting about six weeks, and the reporter's transcript covering over 2,000 pages. Every phase of the drainage problems of the district was minutely gone into by each side through experienced engineers and able counsel. The trial judge visited the district and personally examined the lands therein and ascertained their condition in respect to drainage needs. He had the benefit of an inspection of the canals of the district, their susceptibility to seepage, and the facilities installed by the district for the purpose of overcoming this seepage and of draining the underground waters underlying the lands of the district. The case was also thoroughly argued before the trial court. The brief of the plaintiffs, who are the appellants, is, as stated therein, simply an answer to the argument made by the district before the trial court. That nothing additional was contained in the defendant's brief in this court to that presented to the trial court is indicated by the fact that the plaintiffs have filed no reply brief herein to the brief of the defendant. With these matters thus presented at the trial, that court refused to issue a mandatory injunction as prayed for by the plaintiffs. As we view the record before us, and as indicated in the views above expressed, we find no reason that would justify this court in holding that the trial court erred in its denial of said writ. We are therefore of the opinion that its action in that respect should not be disturbed by this court.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; J. S. Larew, Judge.

Action by W. S. Nakamura against Barney Balish and another, transacting business under the name of Balish Brothers. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Harry W. Horton, of El Centro, for appellants.

R. B. Whitelaw and Don C. Bitler, both of El Centro, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The defendants appeal from the judgment of the trial court in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of $3,000 for a lettuce crop upon 100 acres of land, alleged to have been sold and delivered to the defendants at the agreed price of $3,000, which the defendants have refused to pay. The answer of the defendants is a denial of the averments of the complaint, and consists, by way of further and affirmative defense, in certain averments as to the nature of the transaction out of which the alleged liability arose, which, however, the court, upon conflicting evidence, found to be untrue. The appellant filed an opening brief herein, to which the respondents have made no reply, nor have they made any response to the order to show cause herein why a respondent's brief has not been filed.

The alleged liability arose out of a written agreement in the following form:

"I, Barney Balish, this day bought from John Bunn and W. S. Nakamura for $3000.00, 100 acres lettuce at end of lettuce crop; Balish Bros. to give U. S. Nakamura 20 per cent net profits.

"B. Balish."

At the time the above agreement was signed, B. Balish drew and delivered to the sellers of the lettuce crop a check for $1,000 as a payment upon the purchase thereof, but on the following day procured the return of said check by a subterfuge and then tore it up and repudiated the transaction; whereupon this action was brought.

[1] The appellants upon this appeal contend that the transaction, as shown by the terms of the above agreement, was one between B. Balish personally and the sellers of the lettuce crop and was not a firm transaction. The agreement, it is true, purports to be the individual contract of Barney Balish, and his name alone is signed thereto. It, however, contains an important clause purporting to bind Balish Bros. to share the profits of the transaction with one U. S. Nakamura. It is thus rendered uncertain as to whether or not it is to be treated as a copartnership agreement, and the trial court upon sufficient evidence concluded it to be a firm transaction. This conclusion will not be disturbed upon appeal.

[2] The appellants further contend that the trial court was in error in rendering its judgment against the defendants for the entire purchase price of the lettuce crop, the contention in that regard being that the rule of damages governing such a transaction is that set forth in section 3311 of the Civil Code. The difficulty with this contention is that by the terms of said section it is made applicable to "the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property," while in the instant case the plaintiff alleged, and the trial court found, that the defendants had accepted delivery of the lettuce crop at the time of the purchase thereof and at the agreed price of $3,000, no part of which had been paid. The evidence in the case, contained in a scant bill of exceptions, seems to be sufficient to sustain the foregoing finding of the trial court, and, this being so, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover in damages the purchase price of the personal property thus found to have been sold and delivered. There is, therefore, no merit in this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Divorce 🔑286.

Order of trial court granting wife alimony could not be disturbed, there being no affirmative showing of abuse of discretion.

> The bill of exceptions merely set forth the wife's affidavit, the order to show cause, and the order of the court. The order recited that, on the hearing, testimony both oral and documentary was introduced and considered, but none of such testimony was presented in the bill of exceptions.

2. Appeal and error 🔑758(1).

Appeal was regarded as abandoned, where appellant's only brief pointed out no errors.

> The appellant's opening brief, his only one, merely recited that he appealed from the order involved, without any attempt to point out error.

3. Appeal and error 🔑758(2)

Allowance of attorney's fees in divorce action was not reviewable, no error regarding it being pointed out.

4. Divorce 🔑240(3).

In wife's divorce action, unpaid medical bills incurred by wife prior to trial held properly admitted as bearing on financial ability and necessities of wife (Civ. Code, § 139).

> Civ. Code, § 139, provides that where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, he may be compelled to make such suitable allowance to the wife for her support during her life, or for a shorter period, as the court may deem just, having regard to the circumstances of the parties.

5. Divorce 🔑240(3).

In wife's divorce action, evidence of wife's support of adult invalid daughter was properly admitted.

6. Appeal and error 🔑882(10).

In divorce action, defendant could not complain of meager description of condition of adult invalid daughter, where defendant's objections prevented fuller description.

7. Divorce 🔑240(1).

Allowing wife $35 per week alimony in divorce action held not error under facts.

8. Evidence 🔑589.

Court, in weighing defendant's testimony in divorce action, could consider its contradictions by admissions of his answer.

9. Divorce 🔑239.

In divorce action, defendant's denial of plaintiff's allegations that community property consisted of undivided one-half interest in copartnership of approximate value of $25,000 merely denied such interest was community property and did not deny its value.

10. Divorce 🔑239.

In divorce action, denial that defendant was able to earn $400 per month, in answer to allegation that he was capable and did earn $400 per month, was admission that he earned $400 per month.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fletcher Bowron, Judge.

Action by Ida Louise Younger against William Raymond Younger for divorce. From the decree and from an order granting alimony, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Randall & Bartlett and Alfred L. Bartlett, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

GRAY, Justice pro tem.

Appeals by the husband in an action of divorce for desertion, from that part of the interlocutory decree awarding the wife the sum of $35 a week as permanent alimony and $100 as attorney's fees, and also from an order granting her, during the pendency of the first appeal, the sum of $25 a week alimony and additional attorney's fee for such appeal.

[1-3] As to the appeal from the order, the bill of exceptions merely sets forth the wife's affidavit, the order to show cause, and the order of the court. The order recites that, on the hearing, testimony both oral and documentary was introduced and considered, but none of such testimony is presented in the bill of exceptions. In the absence of an affirmative showing of an abuse of discretion, the order of the trial court cannot be disturbed. Webster v. Webster, 43 Cal. App. 772, 185 P. 863; Duffey v. Duffey, 79 Cal. App. 734, 251 P. 218. Since the opening brief (the only one on behalf of the appellant) merely recites that he appealed from the order, without any attempt to point out error, the appeal from the order will be regarded as abandoned. 2 Cal. Jur. 727. Likewise, no error is pointed out with reference to the first allowance of attorney's fees and this matter will not be reviewed.

[4] Medical bills incurred by the wife prior to the trial, but then due and unpaid, were properly admitted as a circumstance, which section 139 of the Civil Code required the court to consider. Lamborn v. Lamborn, 80 Cal. App. 494, 251 P. 943. They had a bearing upon financial ability, necessities, and health of the respondent.

[5, 6] Evidence of the wife's support of an adult daughter who was sick and unable to work was properly admitted. Anderson v. Anderson, 124 Cal. 48, 56 P. 630, 57 P. 81, 71 Am. St. Rep. 17. Appellant cannot complain of the meager description of the daughter's condition, because a fuller description was prevented by the sustaining of his objections to respondent's questions. Harp v. Harp, 136 Cal. 421, 69 P. 28.

[7-10] The husband—the only witness as to his financial ability and necessities—testified that he was a partner in a plumbing business, whose assets were $3,000; accounts receivable, $13,000; loss, preceding year, $7,700; and bank debt, $5,000. He further testified he draws as wages $60 a week and expends weekly the following sums: Treating customers, $5 to $10; room, $10; board, $15 to $20; automobile, $10; clothes $5; laundry, $5 to $10; doctor, $5; and pocket money, $10. Respondent argues that, since his testimony shows that his net salary (after deducting cost of treating customers and of automobile, both necessary to the business) is $40 a week, the court, in allowing his wife $35 a week alimony, must have erroneously rejected his uncontradicted and unimpeached testimony. "Undoubtedly, as a general rule, positive testimony as to a particular fact, uncontradicted by any one, should control the decision of the court; but that rule admits of many exceptions. There may be such an inherent improbability in the statements of a witness as to induce the court or jury to disregard his evidence, even in the absence of any direct conflicting testimony. He may be contradicted by the facts he states as completely as by direct adverse testimony; and there may be so many omissions in his account of particular transactions, or of his own conduct, as to discredit his whole story. His manner, too, of testifying may give rise to doubts of his sincerity, and create the impression that he is giving a wrong coloring to material facts. All these things may properly be considered in determining the weight which should be given to his statements, although there be no adverse verbal testimony adduced." Quock Ting v. U. S., 140 U. S. 417, 420, 11 S. Ct. 733, 734, 851, 35 L. Ed. 501. The addition of the items of expense show that their total exceed his wages by from $5 to $20 a week. He further testified that he had paid his wife $25 weekly as temporary alimony (presumably for over one and a half years before trial) and had paid $800 for her doctor's bill and $325 for his doctor's bill. The query naturally arises, if he could pay in the past $25 weekly, in addition to the doctor's bills, might he not be able to pay $35 in the future. He attempted to meet this by testifying that these payments were met by overdrawing his account with the firm in the sum of $1,800, but it is hard to see how this overdraft could be allowed by a firm of such small assets, heavy losses, and debts. The court, also, was entitled in weighing his testimony to consider its contradictions by the admissions of his answer. Bellus v. Peters, 165 Cal. 112, 130 P. 1186. His denial, in his answer, of plaintiff's allegations that the community property consisted of an undivided one-half interest in the copartnership of the approximate value of $25,000, merely denied such interest was community property and did not deny its value. Wolff v. Wolff, 102 Cal. 433, 36 P. 767, 1037. Likewise, in answer to the allegation that he "is capable and does earn the sum of $400 per month," he merely "denies that he is able to earn $400 per month." Such denial is an admission that he does earn $400 per month.

Appellant having failed to show any error, the interlocutory decree and order are affirmed.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County. California.

3. Exceptions, bill of 🔑55(1).

Where trial judge refuses to allow bill of exceptions in accordance with facts, statute authorizes superior court to settle bill, including evidence added, subtracted, or incorrectly stated (Code Civ. Proc. § 988a).

> Code Civ. Proc. § 988a, provides that, if judge refuses to allow bill of exceptions in accordance with facts, party desiring bill settled may apply by petition to superior court to prove such bill, and, when proved and filed, it has same effect as if settled by trial judge.

Appeal from Municipal Court of City of Los Angeles; W. D. McConnell, Judge.

Action by Herald E. Koonz against the Comfort Supply Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appealed, and filed a petition to prove a bill of exceptions.

Petition denied, and judgment affirmed.

Gallaudet & Hoffman, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Leonard G. Shelton, of Glendora, for respondent.

McLUCAS, P. J.

This is an action brought to recover for services rendered. Judgment was granted to plaintiff in the sum of $356.98. Defendants appeal from the judgment.

Defendants filed a petition in this court to prove a bill of exceptions under the provisions of section 988a of the Code of Civil Procedure, alleging that the bill of exceptions, as settled by the trial judge, was not in accordance with the facts. Section 988a, in part, provides as follows: "If the judge in any case refuses to allow a bill of exceptions, or to certify to a transcript, in accordance with the facts, the party desiring the bill settled, or the transcript certified, may apply by petition to the superior court to prove the same. The application may be made in such mode and manner and under such regulations as may be prescribed by rules adopted for that purpose; and the bill, when proved, or the transcript, when prepared, must be certified by the judge of the superior court by whom said application is determined, and filed with the clerk of the municipal court, and when so filed, it has the same force and effect as if settled or certified by the judge who tried the cause." There being no rules adopted pursuant to the foregoing section, the applicants were advised to file a petition supported by affidavits, together with a copy of the bill of exceptions originally proposed by them, and to serve copies thereof on the respondent together with notice of the hearing. At the hearing, the petition being held sufficient, it was ordered that the petitioners be granted leave to offer proof of their proposed bill of exceptions, and the matter was referred to the presiding judge of this department to take testimony in reference to the bill of exceptions submitted by the petitioners, and to report the result of his proceedings. The report of the referee, containing a transcript of the proceedings before the referee, has been filed in this court.

[1, 2] Section 988a is similar in its provisions to section 652 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "If the judge in any case refuses to allow a bill of exceptions in accordance with the facts, the party desiring the bill settled may apply by petition to the supreme court to prove the same; the application may be made in the mode and manner, and under such regulations as that court may prescribe; and the bill, when proven, must be certified by the chief justice as correct, and filed with the clerk of the court in which the action was tried, and when so filed it has the same force and effect as if settled by the judge who tried the cause." In so far as we are able to learn, section 988a, which was originally adopted in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 121), has received no interpretation from the appellate courts, although section 652 has frequently been reviewed by the higher courts. Under the authorities, this court has no power to settle a proposed bill of exceptions where the trial court has, for any reason, refused to settle a bill of exceptions. The remedy in case of such refusal is by mandamus. Keown v. California Pac. Realty Co., 207 Cal. 769, 279 P. 764.

[3, 4] The question has been raised as to whether this court has the power to correct, add to, or subtract from the evidence as stated by the trial judge in the bill of exceptions. In Estate of Dolbeer, 147 Cal. 359, 81 P. 1098, it was said that, as to the extent of the power of the Supreme Court under section 652, the construction of this section has been rather strict. It was further held that section 652 did not afford a remedy in respect to any exception allowed by the court, though the statements of the evidence in regard thereto may be incorrect, but section 652 was soon thereafter amended, changing the words, "an exception" to "a bill of exceptions." St. 1907, p. 716. Estate of Dolbeer, supra, being decided before the amendment of section 652, was based on the statute reading "an exception." Since the amendment of section 652, the question of the power of an appellate court to correct the evidence in accordance with the facts has not been raised. In Rauer's L. & C. Co. v. Templar Motors Co., 69 Cal. App. 782, 232 P. 464, a petition to prove a bill of exceptions was granted where the trial judge had stricken out a bill of exceptions including all the evidence taken at the trial. Section 988a was amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 858) so as to add the words "or to certify to a transcript," so that this section now applies to the refusal of a trial judge to allow a bill of exceptions or to certify to a transcript. It is clear that the Legislature intended to authorize the superior court to settle a bill of exceptions or transcript in accordance with the facts, including any evidence added to, subtracted from, or incorrectly stated in the bill of exceptions or transcript by the trial judge, where the trial judge has refused to allow a bill of exceptions or certify to a transcript in accordance with the facts. In order to establish such refusal, the petitioner must show that a bill or transcript identical in substance with that which he seeks to have settled by this court was presented to the trial court for allowance or certification at the proper time.

[5-7] The presumption on appeal is that the lower court pursued its authority regularly, and, if it is claimed that it did not do so, the facts showing irregularity must affirmatively appear. Estate of Wempe, 185 Cal. 557, 563, 197 P. 949. Where a bill of exceptions is contained in the record, it is presumed to contain all the evidence material to the rulings to which the exceptions were reserved and which were specified therein. Bedan v. Turney, 99 Cal. 649, 652, 34 P. 442. In Hyde v. Boyle, 89 Cal. 590, 26 P. 1092, it is said: "The settlement of a bill of exceptions is one of the duties imposed upon a judge by virtue of his office, and is to be performed by him under the sanction of his official oath. It is not to be presumed that he will in any instance so far violate his official obligation as either willfully or knowingly to insert in the bill any matter that is not properly there, or exclude therefrom any matter that should be inserted." There is a presumption that official duty has been regularly performed. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15. There is also a presumption that a judicial record, when not conclusive, does still correctly determine or set forth the rights of the parties. Code Civ. Proc., § 1963, subd. 17. Petitioners urge that the trial court failed to include in the bill of exceptions the grounds given for motion of nonsuit, also that the trial court included in the bill of exceptions certain testimony not given at the trial before motion for nonsuit. Examination of the transcript of the proceedings held before the referee discloses that the trial was had in November, 1929, and that there was no court reporter present. The testimony of the witnesses as to what occurred at the trial is either in hopeless conflict or their recollection is so poor as to make their testimony of little value. Many of the witnesses apparently testified from their recollection of the facts and not from their recollection as to what evidence was given at the trial, although cautioned by the referee to confine their testimony to the trial proceedings. In view of the strong presumption in favor of the bill of exceptions as settled by the trial judge, we are not prepared to hold that the conflicting evidence taken by the referee is sufficient to overcome that presumption. The petition is ordered denied.

It was stipulated in open court by counsel for appellants that the judgment should be affirmed in the event that the petition be denied. The judgment is ordered affirmed, with costs of appeal to respondent.

BRIGGS et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

L. A. 12410.

Supreme Court of California.

Feb. 25, 1931.

As amended March 16, 1931.

1. Judges 🔑51(4).

Statute prohibiting judge from passing on his disqualification manifests legislative intention to apply to every possible case involving disqualification of trial judge (Code Civ. Proc. § 170, as amended by St. 1929, p. 958).

> Code Civ. Proc. § 170, as amended by St. 1929, p. 958, provides in part that no judge of a court of record who shall deny his disqualification shall hear or pass upon question of his own disqualification.

2. Judges 🔑51(4).

Statute prohibiting judge from passing on his disqualification held inapplicable to direct contempt proceeding (Code Civ. Proc. § 170, as amended by St. 1929, p. 958).

3. Contempt 🔑61(1).

Legislature could provide procedure for hearing and determination of cases of constructive contempt (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1209–1222).

4. Judges 🔑51(4).

Statute prohibiting judge from passing on his disqualification held applicable to constructive criminal contempt proceeding (Code Civ. Proc. § 170, as amended by St. 1929, p. 958, and §§ 1209–1222).

5. Prohibition 🔑31.

Writ prohibiting judge from passing on his disqualification in constructive contempt proceeding was confined to particular judge who was respondent and not extended to superior court, which not only had jurisdiction over original matter, but had also other judges probably not disqualified.

In Bank.

Application by H. B. R. Briggs and others for writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, and Frank C. Collier, Judge, to restrain further hearing in a proceeding for contempt.

Writ granted as against Frank C. Collier, Judge.

McAdoo, Neblett & Clagett and S. S. Hahn, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Everett W. Mattoon and Robert W. Kenny, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The petitioners applied for a writ of prohibition which had for its purpose that of restraining the respondent court, acting through the respondent judge thereof, from proceeding with a further hearing upon a certain contempt proceeding pending in said court; the petitioners contending that the aforesaid judge was disqualified to proceed further with the hearing of the cause by virtue of the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure (as amended St. 1929, p. 958) and of the action of the petitioners taken thereunder presenting such disqualification and of the action of said court and judge thereon. The petitioners in support of their application alleged, in substance, that on May 17, 1930, a contempt proceeding had ification and of the action of said court and before the said judge thereof through the filing of an affidavit charging the petitioners with contempt of court, in which affidavit there was set forth in thirteen separate counts thereof the details of the petitioners' alleged several contempts. In each of said counts the affiant purported to set forth a series of separate offenses alleged to have been committed by the petitioners through the publication, prior to said date, of certain articles and cartoons in the Los Angeles Record, a newspaper of general circulation, and of which newspaper the petitioners were and are the publishers and editors. That as to each of said counts it was stated by said affiant that the publications, statements, and cartoons set forth therein naturally tended and were calculated to and were made and published by the aforesaid publishers thereof with the purpose and intent that they should and would embarrass, impede, interrupt, obstruct, and intimidate the grand jury of said court then in session, and the members thereof, in its proceedings and in the performance of its duties, and interfere with, influence, sway, and control the proceedings of said grand jury, and interfere with, influence, sway, control, and intimidate any persons who might be called upon to testify as witnesses by said grand jury, hold up to ridicule and opprobium the investigation and proceedings then pending before said grand jury, and interfere with the orderly and due performance of its duty by said grand jury and the duties of the members of said grand jury as grand jurors, and with the orderly and due administration of justice. From the foregoing epitomy it sufficiently appears that a series of actual interferences with the due and orderly administration of justice in said court and before said grand jury were asserted to have occurred and to be still in course of occurring at the time the aforesaid accusations were filed, and with direct reference to proceedings then pending and undetermined before said court and grand jury. The petitioners herein proceed to aver that, pursuant to said accusations, and on May 17, 1930, an order to show cause had been issued out of said superior court directing the petitioners to appear in department 49 thereof upon June 2, 1930, then and there to show cause why they and each of them should not be punished for contempt of court; that the Honorable Frank C. Collier was during all of the times mentioned in said application and still is the judge of said court assigned to department 49 thereof; that on May 31, 1930, the petitioners, having been duly served with such order or citation, appeared in response thereto and filed with the clerk of said court a duly verified statement in writing, objecting to the hearing of such matter or the trial of any issue of fact or law therein before said judge, and purporting to set forth the fact or facts which were alleged to constitute the grounds of disqualification of such judge, and alleged that, by reason of the bias and prejudice of said judge, as set forth specifically in said statement, a fair and impartial hearing upon said contempt proceeding could not be held before him. It is not necessary for the purposes of the present hearing to enter into further detail as to the content of said statement.

On June 2, 1930, at the place and hour fixed by the court for a return upon its said citation, all parties interested being present in the aforesaid department of said court, and the Honorable Frank C. Collier also being present and presiding therein, and the court being duly convened, said Frank C. Collier caused himself to be sworn as a witness and thereupon proceeded to deny or explain specifically all of the material contents and contentions set forth in the petitioners' aforesaid statement and objections and having done so further proceeded to hold and determine that section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure had no application to such a contempt proceeding as was then pending before said court and the said judge thereof, and he thereupon ordered the petitioners to appear before him on June 9, 1930, for such further hearing and determination of said contempt proceeding as might there and then be undertaken. That said Frank C. Collier thereupon stated in open court that his order continuing the matter until June 9, 1930, was made to enable counsel, if they so desired, to apply for and obtain a writ of prohibition, whereby the question of the applicability of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure might be determined by the Supreme Court and the correct rule established. The petitioners allege that the said court through the said judge thereof, and in violation of the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, threatened upon said date to proceed with the further hearing of said contempt matter before the said court and the judge thereof, in alleged excess of the jurisdiction of the said court and judge so to do; wherefore they applied for the issuance of an alternative writ of prohibition herein.

In response to their application and to said writ, the respondents court and judge herein have appeared and have demurred to the petition, and have also presented answers thereto which, however, apparently raise no material issue of fact. The only issue of law thus presented is, therefore, as to whether the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, especially as to the portion thereof embraced in the amendment thereto adopted in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 958), have application to contempt proceedings of the character of those brought under our review in this proceeding.

It is at the outset to be noted that the several and separate acts of contempt of court of which the petitioners were alleged by the terms of the original affidavit to have been guilty were each and all of the nature usually defined as constituting constructive criminal contempt, contained in articles and cartoons published at various times in said newspaper, and thus necessarily out of the immediate presence and hearing of said court and of the judge thereof, but which, according to the averments of the original affidavit presented and filed therein, consisted in a series of attempts to interfere unlawfully with the processes and proceedings of said court, constituting an actual and intended interference with the orderly administration of justice therein, and hence being such as to subject the petitioners herein to such summary proceedings for the punishment of contempt of court as are provided for in sections 1209 to 1222 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Whether or not the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure have application to such constructive criminal contempt is practically the only question which we are called upon herein to decide.

In the recent case of Blodgett v. Superior Court, 290 P. 293, this court had occasion to fully discuss and determine the question as to whether or not the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, either as the same originally read or as it has been recently amended to read, could be given application to proceedings for the hearing and determination of direct contempts; that is to say, of contempts alleged to have been committed within the immediate presence of the court and of the judge thereof proceeding to summarily determine and punish such contempt. In deciding that the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, either as it originally read or as it has been recently amended could not be given application to such a situation as that which was involved in the Blodgett Case, we were careful to confine the reasoning and conclusions of the court in that matter to cases of direct contempt. It is, however, the contention of the petitioners that, conceding the entire correctness of our reasoning and conclusions in that case as applicable to situations involving a direct contempt of court, the rule therein laid down is a rule of necessity wherein the inherent powers of courts of justice must be immediately set in motion to prevent and punish interferences with the due and orderly administration of justice when committed in the actual and immediate presence of the court, such drastic and summary action is not required to be applied with the same urgency in cases of constructive contempt. In support of this view we are pointed by the petitioners to an essential difference in the procedure provided by the statute to be applied to cases of direct as distinguished from constructive contempts. This distinction it is urged is given expression in the very terms of sections 1211 and 1212 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The first paragraph of the former section provides that, "when a contempt is committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, or judge at chambers, it may be punished summarily; for which an order must be made, reciting the facts as occurring in such immediate view and presence, adjudging that the person proceeded against is thereby guilty of a contempt, and that he be punished as therein prescribed." The second and concluding paragraph of said section provides: "When the contempt is not committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, or judge at chambers, an affidavit shall be presented to the court, or judge, of the facts constituting the contempt, or a statement of the facts by the referees or arbitrators, or other judicial officer." Section 1212 immediately follows, providing the procedure to be applied to contempt when not committed in the immediate view and presence of the court or judge. It is provided that "a warrant of attachment may be issued to bring the person charged to answer, or, without a previous arrest, a warrant of commitment may, upon notice, or upon an order to show cause, be granted; and no warrant of commitment can be issued without such previous attachment to answer, or such notice or order to show cause." Section 1217 of the same Code provides that, "when the person arrested has been brought up or appeared, the court or judge must proceed to investigate the charge, and must hear any answer which the person arrested may make to the same, and may examine witnesses for or against him, for which an adjournment may be had from time to time, if necessary." Section 1218 follows with the provision that, "upon the answer and evidence taken, the court or judge must determine whether the person proceeded against is guilty of the contempt charged, and if it be adjudged that he is guilty of the contempt, a fine may be imposed on him not exceeding five hundred dollars, or he may be imprisoned not exceeding five days, or both."

The courts of this state have had frequent occasion to pass upon the application of the foregoing provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure in cases of both direct and constructive contempt. As to the former it has been uniformly held that the inherent power of the court or judge thereof to deal summarily with an offender who by tumultuous or offensive conduct or by opprobrious or insulting language perpetrated in the immediate view and presence of the court or judge actually impedes or interferes with the due and orderly administration of justice in a pending cause may not be taken away or materially diminished by legislation. This subject was quite fully considered by this court in the case of Lamberson v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 458, 91 P. 100, 101, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 619, wherein the earlier cases were reviewed and the unimpeded right of the court or judge to punish immediately and summarily a direct contempt was fully upheld, and in which case also it was declared that the judge was not and could not be disqualified from sitting in or hearing in direct contempt, even though the contempt itself consisted in imputations upon his motives and attacks upon his integrity. In so deciding the court quoted with approval the following apt language of Chief Justice Beatty in the case of In re Philbrook, 105 Cal. 471, 38 P. 511, 884, 45 Am. St. Rep. 59: "The law which in such cases makes us the judges of offenses against the court places us in an extremely delicate and invidious position, but it leaves no alternative except to allow the court and the people of the state, in whose name and by whose authority it acts, to be insulted with impunity, or to exercise the authority conferred by law for the purpose of compelling attorneys to maintain the respect due to courts of justice and judicial officers." In commenting upon the foregoing language, this court said: "Were the rule otherwise so that it was required that another judge should be called in to sit in the proceeding, the recalcitrant and offending party would need only to insult each judicial officer in turn until the list was exhausted, and thus, by making a farce of legal procedure, go scathless and unpunished." The court further quoted at length from the case of In re Shortridge, 99 Cal. 526, 34 P. 227, 229, 21 L. R. A. 755, 37 Am. St. Rep. 78, which, while a case of constructive contempt, went very far in denying the power of the Legislature to interfere materially with the inherent right of the court "to punish as a contempt an act, whether committed in or out of its presence, which tends to impede, embarrass, or obstruct the court in the discharge of its duties"; the court stating in conclusion that "the legislative department may regulate the procedure and enlarge the power, but it cannot, without trenching upon the constitutional powers of the court * * * fetter the power itself." In the latter case, however, it is to be noted that, as the record discloses, no issue as to the disqualification of the trial judge was presented, but that the language of the court above quoted had reference to a then recent legislative attempt to take away from courts altogether the power to punish as a contempt any speech or publication reflecting upon any court or any officer thereof unless the same was "made in the immediate presence of such court while in session, and in such manner as to actually interfere with its proceedings." It was this particular change in the wording of subdivision 13 of section 1209 of the Code of Civil Procedure which the court by its foregoing utterance declared to be beyond the scope of legislative power.

In the recent case of Hotaling v. Superior Court, 191 Cal. 501, 217 P. 73, 29 A. L. R. 127, this court made a careful review of certain cases dealing with the specific nature of contempt proceedings as being sui generis; as not constituting a civil action either at law or in equity, but being a separate proceeding of a criminal nature and summary character, wherein the court exercised but a limited jurisdiction; and as being a proceeding prosecuted by or on behalf of the people of the state for the protection of their courts of justice. In so doing the court defined the precise procedure to be followed in cases of constructive contempt. In certain other both early and recent decisions it has uniformly been held that the procedure to be thus employed in cases of constructive contempt must be most strictly pursued in order to give the court jurisdiction to make and enforce whatever orders it may enter therein. Ex parte Rickert, 126 Cal. 244, 58 P. 549; Fletcher v. District Court, 191 Cal. 711, 218 P. 391; In re Brambini, 192 Cal. 19, 218 P. 569; In re Wood, 194 Cal. 49, 227 P. 908. Bearing in mind the foregoing utterances of this court in seeking to interpret the provisions of sections 1209 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to direct and indirect or constructive contempts, it must be conceded that both by these decisions and by the language of the statute itself a distinction may well be said to be created between these two classes of contempts, not as to the nature or even the effect of each, but as to the procedure to be employed in order to determine the fact as to the existence of each and the judgment in each instance to be arrived at and enforced. In cases of direct contempt there is in fact no procedure at all resembling that to be pursued in the course of civil or even criminal actions. The court in such cases acts immediately upon its own observation and knowledge, and administers instant and summary punishment. But a quite different method has been prescribed by the statute for the ascertainment, determination, and ultimate punishment in cases of constructive contempt—a method in fact which partakes of the nature of the usual procedure in both civil and criminal cases. The accusation is in the nature and form of a verified complaint. The warrant, citation, or order to show cause is the equivalent of a summons and must be similarly served. The alleged culprit becomes the defendant, and upon his appearance is entitled to present his answer or defense. The issues being thus made up, the court is required to hear and determine the same, to examine witnesses pro and con, for which purpose adjournments may be had from time to time. Upon the eventual submission of the matter, the court must determine, upon the answer and evidence taken, whether the person proceeded against is guilty of the contempt charged, and must enter its judgment accordingly. It would seem from the foregoing résumé of the terms of the statute relating to contempts that a clearly marked distinction is discernible between the instant and in a sense unique action of the trial court or judge in cases of direct contempt and the orderly and detailed procedure strictissimi juris prescribed in case of constructive contempt; a distinction which persists regardless of the gravity in each instance of the offense or of the intent, purpose and effect of the action or conduct of the offender.

[1-4] Bearing in mind this distinction, we are brought to a consideration of the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it existed originally and as it has been recently amended. This section of the Code in its original form provided that "no justice, judge or justice of the peace shall sit or act in any action or proceeding" in which there shall be made to appear any one or more of the several specified disqualifications so to do set forth in the subdivisions of said section. In its original form, the question of the existence of the particular disqualification urged by the objecting party or parties to the action was to be determined by the judge himself, and his determination thereof was final except upon the main appeal. While the statute stood in the above form, it was, as we have seen, decided by this court that the section could not be given application to cases of direct contempt, for the reason that so to do would be to approve a legislative interference with an inherent power in the courts, the existence and exercise of which in all its force was indispensable to the due and orderly administration of justice in the cause then pending in the particular court. It was not, however, as we have already seen, directly decided in any case that the section could not be given application to cases of constructive contempt, although it must be admitted that there were strong intimations in certain of our cases above cited to that extent and effect. In the year 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1403) however, section 170 was amended so as to read in its present form. The amendment to said section thus made went to the very substance of the subject-matter thereof by the taking away from the trial judge of any court of record, denying his disqualification, the power theretofore given to hear and determine the question of his own disqualification. It will be seen that the opening language of the section giving it application "to any action or proceeding" is broadened by the terms of the amendment so as to render the section as amended applicable to every case wherein the question of the disqualification of the judge of a court of record could arise. In the presence of the precise terms of this amendment to the section in question we are constrained to hold it to have been the legislative intent to thereby render said section applicable to every possible case involving a disqualification of the trial judge. We nevertheless adhere to the views expressed in our earlier decisions as to the inapplicability of this section of the Code, whether as it read originally or as it has been made to read by its aforesaid amendment, to cases of direct contempt, and we place our present conclusion upon the same ground as that expressed in our former opinions, viz. that of necessity the courts must be held to retain their ancient and inherent power to summarily deal with all cases of direct contempt committed in the immediate view and presence of the court directly effecting or intended to effect an interference with the due and orderly conduct of the causes then pending therein. We do not, however, perceive from the careful reading and consideration which we have above devoted to the language and content of sections 1209 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure that a like necessity for immediate and summary action on the part of the trial court or judge exists in cases of constructive contempt, since this class of contempts, under the precise wording of the above sections of the Code creating the same, are made to require for their determination and punishment a course of procedure similar, though it is true more summary than that prescribed for ordinary actions or proceedings of a civil or criminal nature involving pleadings, process, appearances, answers, the presentation of evidence and the continuances and delays incident to the trials of actions in general. We are unable to say that the Legislature was without power to provide such a procedure for the hearing and determination of cases of constructive contempt; and for an even stronger reason we are unwilling to hold that the Legislature by its recent amendment to section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure was without power to prescribe the otherwise usual and salutary provision that the trial judge in such, as in all other cases save those of direct contempt, shall no longer be permitted to pass upon the question of his own disqualification. In thus concluding we have examined the many and conflicting decisions of the courts of other jurisdictions touching the inherent powers of courts and judges to deal with the subject of contempts, whether direct or constructive. The practically universal trend of decision favors the views we have steadfastly maintained as to the inherent and untrammeled power of trial courts and judges to deal summarily with cases of direct contempt; but as to constructive contempts, the trend of modern decision is toward upholding the exercise of legislative discretion in limiting the power of trial courts and judges to pass upon the question of their own asserted disqualification to hear and determine such causes. The recent amendment of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure is, we think, in accord with this trend, and we therefore hold it applicable to cases of constructive contempt.

[5] In directing the issuance of the writ herein, it is obvious that it should be confined in its application to the particular judge who is made a respondent herein, and only to the extent of prohibiting him from passing upon the question of his own disqualification, and should not be extended to the superior court, which not only has jurisdiction over the original action, but which has also numerous other judges, some of whom at least are probably not subject to the disqualifications urged against the particular respondent herein.

Let the writ as thus limited accordingly issue.

PRESTON, J.

The questions raised on appeal are technical and without substantial merit. Certain causes of action were consolidated and tried together; these being claims for building materials and labor furnished and used in the construction of a five-unit bungalow on the property of the defendants Coates. The prayer was for judgment against the contractor and for the fixation of a lien upon the property of the owners for the several items found due. Issues were made up; the contractor defaulted; and, as to certain of the plaintiffs, judgment was given impressing a lien upon the property, from which the defendants Coates alone have appealed.

When the case came up for trial, the court of its own motion, and over the objection of appellants, referred it to one Robert E. Abbott, an attorney at law, as a referee. The language of the order is not in the record. The bill of exceptions recites, however, that the "court, upon its own motion, announced that a reference would be made to try any and all issues of fact and law arising under the issues made by the pleadings herein. * * *" The referee heard the evidence at length and reported the same to the court. The court conducted a hearing thereon, approved the findings of the referee, and amplified them by findings of fact and conclusions of law of his own. Although not expressly stated, apparently all the evidence taken by the referee was before the court, and he may have heard additional evidence.

[1-5] If said order of reference was properly made, the findings of the referee on the whole issue stand as the findings of the court, and the entry of judgment in such case becomes merely a clerical duty. Section 644,

Code Civ. Proc. It is plain, therefore, that the court in that case practically abdicates its position under the law in favor of a third person, and this should not be attempted without the full consent of the parties. But the record in this case shows that an examination of a "long account" was necessary; hence an order of reference by the court was warranted under the provision of section 639, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes a reference "when the trial of an issue of fact requires the examination of a long account on either side; in which case the referees may be directed to hear and decide the whole issue, or report upon any specific question of fact involved therein." The decision of the "whole issue" meant here is the whole issue involved in the accounting. Fredendall v. Shrader, 45 Cal. App. 719, 188 P. 580; Williams v. Benton, 24 Cal. 424; 22 Cal. Jur. 693.

The case is then reduced to this query: Why is not the order of reference good pro tanto to the extent allowed by the last-mentioned Code provision? The court below evidently treated it as having no more than that effect, approved the report of the referee in full, and proceeded to amplify his findings by findings of its own covering the issues respecting the rights of the parties.

The evidence in full has not been embodied in the bill of exceptions, but there is a concession found therein to the effect that plaintiffs "made prima facie proof of the matters and things alleged and set forth in the various complaints composing this consolidated action." We are therefore brought to the conclusion that, under the situation presented to us here, the appellants have suffered no injury by the broad terms of the order of reference made, for in effect the court did just what appellants intended that it should do—it heard and determined the cause. Under this construction the findings of the referee did not determine the whole case, and the court could make its own findings and conclusions. Clark v. Millsap, 197 Cal. 765, 784, 242 P. 918; Faulkner v. Hendy, 103 Cal. 15, 20, 36 P. 1021; Nat. Brass Works v. Weeks, 92 Cal. App. 318, 268 P. 412.

[6] Moreover, viewing the record as a whole, it is apparent that appellants have based practically their entire appeal upon the contention that it appears without contradiction that they demanded of the several materialmen and laborers that they furnish the owners with a statement in writing of all material supplied for and labor performed upon the structure, and in compliance therewith said parties rendered such statements promptly, but failed to verify them as required by section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But appellants' requests bore no special reference to that section, nor did they ask for a verification of the statements; further, upon getting the desired information, appellants made no objection thereto upon the ground that the statements were not verified or upon any other ground. Under this state of facts it must be held that the provisions of the statute were waived.

No further questions require discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Gus Linberg against Angelo Stango. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

C. W. Pendleton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lloyd S. Nix, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This in an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in a personal injury action, tried before the court without a jury. Defendant appeals on a bill of exceptions, alleging that the findings of the trial court to the effect that the defendant was negligently operating his automobile at the time of the accident are not supported by the evidence, and also contending that there is no finding to support the verdict of $1,509.

It was stipulated at the trial that the plaintiff suffered the injuries of which complaint is made on July 1, 1924, while standing on the sidewalk at the intersection of Nineteenth street and Pacific avenue, in San Pedro, Cal.; that such injuries were incurred by reason of the fact that an automobile driven by the defendant came upon the sidewalk and hit the plaintiff; that, as a result of said injuries, plaintiff suffered a broken arm, a broken hip, injuries about the head and back, abrasions and contusions on both lower limbs between the knee and thigh; that, as a result of such injuries, one of plaintiff's legs has permanently become four inches shorter than the other; that plaintiff has actually expended in doctor, hospital, and other similar expenses the sum of $535.

[1, 2] At the trial there was no issue of contributory negligence, the sole issues being as to whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in the operation of his automobile at the time and place of the accident, and, if so, whether such negligence proximately contributed to the injuries of the plaintiff. Plaintiff could not testify as to any of the circumstances of the accident, except that he was standing on the sidewalk forty or fifty feet from the corner, and was struck from behind by defendant's car. Defendant admitted that such was the fact, but contended that, just prior to the accident, he was proceeding in a lawful and careful manner in an easterly direction on Nineteenth street; that after he had entered the intersection of said street with Pacific avenue and had passed the center thereof, another automobile, driven by a party unknown, ran into him, causing him to so lose control of his car that he ran onto the sidewalk and hit the plaintiff. Defendant admits that, if he was negligent and if such negligence proximately contributed to plaintiff's injuries, the mere fact that the negligence of another tort-feasor contributed to the accident would in no way release him from liability. It is well settled, of course, that one who is injured by the concurrent negligence of two tort-feasors can sue either or both for the entire damage, and it is no defense to the person sued that another's negligence contributed to the injuries of which complaint is made. Defendant contends, however, that such rule has no application to the facts of this case for the reason that the evidence shows that he was entirely free from negligence, and that the accident was caused entirely by the negligence of the unknown driver who, defendant contends, ran into him.

[3, 4] It is our opinion that there is sufficient positive evidence in the record to sustain the court's finding that, at the time of the accident defendant was operating his car in a negligent and careless fashion, and that such finding, being based on conflicting evidence, cannot be disturbed on appeal. It must be remembered, under the factual situation here presented, that plaintiff established a prima facie case by proof of the mere happening of the accident. When an automobile leaves its accustomed place of travel in the street and runs upon the sidewalk and there strikes a pedestrian, the cases have quite uniformly held that the plaintiff establishes a prima facie case by the mere proof of the accident. In Smith v. Hollander, 85 Cal. App. 535, 539, 259 P. 958, 960, the court in dealing with a similar situation where a pedestrian while standing on the sidewalk was hit by an automobile stated:

"In such case all the elements necessary for the application of the doctrine [res ipsa loquitur] are present. The injured person is not in a position to know the cause of the mishap. The one in control of the instrumentality causing the injury is or should be in a position to know. Such an occurrence does not usually happen in the absence of negligence on the part of the one in control of the automobile. * * *

"At most, it was for the jury to decide whether to infer negligence of the appellant from the fact that she came upon the sidewalk with her automobile, or whether to decide that the proof of the skidding of the automobile under the circumstances and in the manner testified to by the witnesses was a sufficient explanation to justify it in deciding that she was not negligent in the operation of her automobile."

See, also, Goss v. Pacific Motor Co., 85 Cal. App. 455, 259 P. 455; Cal. Jur. 1928 Supplement, p. 119, § 55; Berry on Automobiles (6th Ed.) § 452; Huddy on Automobiles (7th Ed.) § 512.

[5-7] It is true that in the case at bar the defendant sought to prove that the accident was caused solely by the negligence of another. The sufficiency of this explanation was a matter for the trial court. The trial court could have inferred that the defendant was entirely without blame, but the evidence offerred was likewise capable of sustaining the inference that defendant was negligent in attempting to pass in front of the other car, or that defendant was negligent in not stopping after he was hit by the other car, and before he hit plaintiff. There was no evidence offered which would indicate that the collision with the other car injured the steering apparatus or brakes of defendant's car. In fact, the evidence indicated that such was not the fact. The evidence indicated that Pacific avenue was a wide street and that plaintiff was hit forty or fifty feet from the corner. The defendant admitted that "* * * I saw the machine there and I tried to go ahead and pass and she hit me." He could not state how far away the other car was when he first saw it. In this connection he stated: "I can guess it was about 20 feet from me when I was crossing the car tracks. I couldn't say it was 20, 30 or 40, or 50—I couldn't say well because I can only guess. I sure saw that car." No evidence at all was offered that defendant attempted to avoid the accident. The weighing of such evidence, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom, were matters entirely within the power of the trial court, and cannot be disturbed on appeal.

[8-10] As stated above, the parties stipulated as to the extent of plaintiff's injuries and the actual expenditures resulting therefrom, amounting to $535. The trial court also found that as a result of such injuries plaintiff has been compelled to remain away from his place of business from and after July 1, 1924, without finding exactly the amount of the damage caused thereby. Nor did the court expressly find as to the damages suffered by virtue of plaintiff's injuries, but, as a conclusion of law from the above-enumerated findings, ordered judgment to be rendered against defendant in the sum of $1,509. The defendant contends that it was reversible error to order any judgment in excess of $535, based on such findings. The point is without merit. The alleged conclusion of law was of itself a finding as to plaintiff's damages. It is well settled, in spite of the fact that section 633 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that facts and conclusions must be separately stated, that a finding may be regarded as one of fact, although mistakenly placed among the conclusions of law. 24 Cal. Jur., p. 960, § 199. We think that is the situation here.

Moreover, if the findings are deficient in this respect, this court since the addition in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 583) of section 956a to the Code of Civil Procedure has the power in a proper case to make new or additional findings in support of the judgment of the lower court. The evidence amply supports a finding that as a proximate result of the negligence of defendant, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $1,509. If such a finding is necessary, we hereby adopt the same as a finding of this court.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BURKHART.

Cr. 3381.

Supreme Court of California.
March 13, 1931.

Rehearing Denied April 6, 1931.

1. Criminal law 🔑55.

Voluntary intoxication is never excuse for crime but may be considered in determining whether particular purpose, motive, or intent actuated accused (Pen. Code, § 22).

2. Homicide 🔑270.

Weight to be given evidence of intoxication and whether intoxication precluded accused from forming specific intention to kill and murder are for jury.

3. Homicide 🔑9.

Specific intention to kill and murder is necessary element of first degree murder.

4. Homicide 🔑253(4).

Jury's implied finding that killing was product of abandoned and malignant heart and was premeditated held supported, and warranted infliction of death penalty.

5. Criminal law ⚷369(1).

Ordinarily, evidence of commission of other crimes is inadmissible.

6. Criminal law ⚷369(2).

Proof of one crime tending to prove material facts in trial of another is admissible.

In such case, the fact that such evidence may tend to prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jurors by inducing the belief that he has been the perpetrator of another crime is no ground for its exclusion.

7. Criminal law ⚷369(15), 371(4).

In murder prosecution, evidence showing defendant shortly before homicide purchased automobile and rented apartment under assumed name, issuing fictitious check, held admissible.

The fact that defendant did such acts, and thereafter apparently shot deceased while in the car so obtained and brought her to the apartment thus rented, tended to show preparation and premeditation on defendant's part and an attempt to conceal his identity.

8. Criminal law ⚷661.

Evidence that defendant shortly before homicide purchased automobile and rented apartment under assumed name was not rendered inadmissible by offer to stipulate that he purchased car and rented apartment.

Such a stipulation would not have disclosed that defendant prior to the homicide was proceeding under assumed name to divert suspicion.

9. Criminal law ⚷438.

In murder prosecution, obscene shocking picture showing position and condition of deceased's body when found held not inadmissible, though prosecution was not to be commended for offering it in evidence.

10. Criminal law ⚷829(6).

In murder prosecution, refusal of instruction respecting effect of intoxication, substance of which was covered by other instructions given, held not error.

11. Criminal law ⚷1144(15).

It will be presumed that jurors were true to oath and followed admonitions and instructions to disregard anything stricken from record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

William Henry Burkhart was convicted of murder in the first degree with death penalty, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Orbison & Irwin, Charles J. Orbison, and Ralph Paonessa, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, C. J.

The defendant was charged with the murder of Ann McKnight Burkhart, his estranged wife. The jury brought in a verdict finding the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree and recommending that he suffer the death penalty. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying defendant's motion for new trial.

The homicide of which defendant stands convicted occurred on March 24, 1930, at a time when the parties were living separate and apart, the deceased having theretofore instituted divorce proceedings. On two distinct occasions prior to the homicide, the defendant had attempted in vain to get in touch with his wife, with the view of having her return to him, and, upon being informed by the persons with whom she was living that his wife would not return to him, he stated: "By God, I will have her. She is my wife and if I can't have her nobody else shall because I will kill her first;" and, "I have made up my mind that if I cannot have her nobody else will if I have to spend the rest of my life in the penitentiary." On the day preceding the homicide, defendant purchased a Ford coupé under the name of Charles G. Thompson, and gave a fictitious check for the initial payment. On the day of the homicide he resigned his position with the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation and drew his pay. Immediately thereafter he rented a bungalow court apartment under the name of C. L. Burns, and gave a fictitious check in payment of the first month's rent. The defendant informed the owner of the apartment that he was married and that his wife was working and would arrive about 6:30 that evening. At that time defendant appeared at the apartment house with the deceased and introduced her to the owner, who was then sprinkling the lawn. Within a very few minutes after the parties had entered, the door of the apartment was jerked open and the owner saw the deceased standing between the open door and the closed screen door. The defendant appeared behind the deceased, placed his arm around her, and drew her back into the room. As this was done, the deceased uttered a "guzzling sound, sort of a moaning cry." Approximately one-half hour later the defendant and deceased left the premises in the Ford coupé. Later that evening the defendant went to the apartment occupied by Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Thompson to "borrow a match," and stated to those present that he had just moved in next door and had been drinking and was "pretty stiff," adding that his wife was "stiffer." After defendant had apparently returned to his own apartment, a noise, resembling the falling of a human body, was heard by the Thompsons and their guests. The defendant returned to the Thompson apartment and asked if he might talk to Mr. Thompson "as a friend," whereupon Thompson followed him to his apartment. Defendant then told Thompson that his wife "had passed out drunk" in back of the house, and requested him to help lift her into the house. Thompson and one of his guests went through the defendant's apartment to the rear sidewalk or alleyway, where they found the deceased's body. The police were summoned, and the defendant was taken into custody. Upon his person was found a full loaded .38-caliber Smith & Wesson revolver. This weapon, found to have powder burns at the point where the chamber fits to the barrel, gave off a slight acrid odor, indicating that it had been recently discharged. The autopsy surgeon testified that the deceased had come to her death by reason of bullet wounds, five bullets having entered various part of her body. A ballistic expert gave as his positive opinion that the bullets extracted from the deceased's body had been fired from the gun found on the defendant's person at the time of his arrest. Examination of the Ford coupé disclosed two bullet holes in the upholstery of the car and several blood stains, tending to indicate that the homicide had been committed in the car after the parties left the apartment at approximately 7 in the evening. The bullets thereafter removed from the car were identified as having been discharged from a gun similar in make and caliber to the one found in the defendant's possession.

The evidence points positively and unmistakably to the defendant as the perpetrator of the homicide. He admits the sufficiency of the evidence to support a conviction, but contends that the overwhelming evidence shows that he had been on a protracted "spree" for several weeks, and on the day of the homicide was so intoxicated as to be incapable of fully comprehending the nature and quality of his acts. By reason of such prolonged voluntary intoxication, he argues, his physical and mental condition were such as to exclude any idea of the intent, deliberation, and premeditation essential to murder of the first degree. Therefore, he contends that a verdict of manslaughter is the only verdict warranted by the evidence.

Defendant's claim of prolonged inebriation prior to the homicide finds some support in the evidence introduced on his behalf, but such inebriation is by no means as conclusively nor as overwhelmingly established as contended. The testimony adduced by the prosecution created a sharp conflict on this issue. There is evidence that the defendant worked continuously up to the time of the homicide, resigning his position only a few hours prior thereto. The witness Hunter Graham, from whom defendant purchased the Ford coupé on the day preceding the homicide, testified that defendant was not under the influence of intoxicating liquor when dickering for the car. The owner of the bungalow court apartments stated that she had seen defendant three times on the day of the homicide, the last time being as late as 7 in the evening, and that he did not appear to be under the influence of intoxicants at any of these times. Mrs. Thompson corroborated this testimony, and also stated that defendant appeared perfectly normal when he came to her apartment after 10 o'clock on the night of the homicide, with the exception that his speech was a little slow. Mr. Thompson gave virtually the same testimony, and stated that while, in his opinion, the defendant had imbibed of intoxicating liquor, he was not drunk, and only appeared to be so when in the custody of the police. One of the arresting officers stated that defendant was only "spasmodically" intoxicated, and in his opinion was simulating drunkenness. This witness also testified that defendant answered all preliminary questions as to name, age, occupation, etc., in a coherent manner, but would lapse into a "coma" when directly questioned concerning the homicide.

[1-4] Voluntary intoxication is never an excuse for crime, but, whenever the existence of any particular purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any particular species or degree of crime, the jury, in determining whether such purpose, motive, or intent actuated the accused in the perpetration of the offense, may properly take into consideration the fact that he was intoxicated at the time. Section 22, Pen. Code; People v. Methever, 132 Cal. 326, 64 P. 481; People v. Blake, 65 Cal. 275, 277, 4 P. 1; People v. Sainz, 162 Cal. 242, 245, 121 P. 922. The weight to be given to evidence of intoxication and whether such intoxication precluded the accused from forming a specific intention to kill and murder, which intent is a necessary element in murder in the first degree, are essentially questions of fact for the jury's determination under proper instructions. People v. Yeager, 194 Cal. 452, 474, 229 P. 40; People v. Sainz, supra.

The jury's implied finding in this case that the killing was the product of an abandoned and malignant heart, and was premeditated, finds ample support in the record, and warranted the infliction of the death penalty. We see no real analogy between this case and that of People v. Kelley, 208 Cal. 387, 281 P. 609. Here, as distinguished from the Kelley

Case, there was a motive for the crime, for the deceased had separated from the defendant and he had threatened to kill her to prevent any one else from having her. There is also a showing of preparation and premeditation in the case now before us, which showing was not made in the Kelley Case, for the defendant here resigned his position, and purchased a car and rented an apartment under fictitious names. The car and the apartment were apparently intended to be and were used in the commission of the homicide. The case is not one, therefore, in which the deceased was killed under circumstances which might have shown an accidental or unpremeditated killing, as in the Kelley Case. She was slain with a deadly weapon from which five bullets were discharged into her body. In our opinion, the jury had no alternative but to bring in a verdict of first degree murder.

[5-8] Defendant next contends that the trial court erred in permitting the prosecution to show that shortly prior to the homicide he had purchased the Ford coupé and rented the bungalow apartment under assumed names, and had issued fictitious checks in consummation of each transaction. He argues that such evidence was inadmissible because it tended to prove the commission of other and distinct crimes in no way connected with the offense charged in the information. Ordinarily, evidence of the commission by the defendant of crimes, other than the one for which he is standing trial, is inadmissible. This is not an inexorable rule, and, whenever proof of one crime tends to prove any facts material in the trial of another, such proof is admissible, and the fact that it may tend to prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jurors by inducing the belief that he had been the perpetrator of another crime is no ground for its exclusion. People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 114, 193 P. 92. The evidence here complained of had a material bearing on the charge of which the defendant stands convicted. The fact that shortly prior to the homicide he purchased an automobile and rented an apartment under fictitious names, and issued checks therefor, and thereafter apparently shot the deceased while in the car so obtained, and brought her to the apartment thus rented, tended to show preparation and premeditation on his part and an attempt to conceal his identity. It also revealed his plan or scheme for doing away with the deceased. The testimony of the police officer and the bank manager along this same line was also properly admitted. Nor do we think any of this evidence was rendered inadmissible by reason of defendant's offer to stipulate that he had purchased the car and rented the apartment. Such a stipulation would not have disclosed that defendant, prior to the homicide, was proceeding under assumed names to divert suspicion from him.

[9] It is also urged that the court below erred when it permitted the prosecution to introduce a photograph (Exhibit No. 24), showing the position and condition of the deceased's body when found. This picture is asserted to be obscene and shocking, and to have been introduced solely for the purpose of inflaming the minds of the jurors against the defendant. The exhibit is all that the defendant states, and the prosecution is not to be commended for offering it in evidence. Its introduction was not necessary, and added little to the case against the defendant. However, we cannot say it was inadmissible, and for this reason the assignment is without merit.

[10] Defendant next asserts that the court below fell into error when it refused to give an instruction tendered by him which had to do with the effect of intoxication upon the species or degree of crime perpetrated. This instruction, if given, would have told the jury that, should they find defendant was so intoxicated at the time of the commission of the homicide as to be incapable of forming a premeditated design or entertaining the necessary malice, the offense would be reduced to manslaughter. The substance of the refused instruction was adequately covered by other instructions given. The record discloses several instructions distinguishing between murder and manslaughter, and others covering the subject of intoxication and its effect upon the species and degree of crime. There is therefore no merit in the point.

[11] In his next assignment of error, the defendant advances some eighteen or twenty charges of misconduct on the part of the district attorney during the progress of the trial. To review them in detail would unduly prolong this opinion, and would serve no useful purpose. We have separately examined each of these many assignments, and have found nothing of a prejudicial character. At times, the district attorney may have exceeded the bounds of propriety, but, whenever necessary to protect the rights of the accused, the trial court immediately rebuked the prosecutor, and forcefully admonished the jury to disregard anything stricken from the record as not intended for its ears. It will be presumed that the jurors were true to their oaths and followed the various admonitions and instructions of the court. In fairness to the prosecuting officer, it must be said that most of the charges of misconduct leveled at him by the defendant are without merit.

Defendant's final contention is that the verdict of the jury recommending the death penalty, and the judgment of the court sentencing him to hang, are excessive. Our discussion and disposition of the first assignment of error sufficiently dispose of this point.

The judgment and order are, and each is, affirmed.

WHITESIDE v. WILKERSON.

L. A. 10822.

Supreme Court of California.

Bastards 🔑92.

Trial court investigating alleged father's earning capacity, and needs of mother was warranted in determining amount reasonable for support of illegitimate child.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elias V. Rosenkranz, Judge.

Action by Martha Whiteside against Squire Wilkerson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Willedd Andrews, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Willis O. Tyler, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This appeal is from a judgment directing the defendant and appellant to pay to the plaintiff and respondent the sum of $50 per month for the support of the illegitimate minor child of plaintiff and defendant. The respondent has filed no brief herein either originally or after the issuance and service upon her of an order to show cause. We have, however, examined the entire record with a view to determining the merits of the only two points presented by the appellant upon this appeal. As to the first of these, to the effect that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the court in making the judgment appealed from, we find the appellant's contention in this regard to be utterly without merit, and the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the trial court to be fully supported by the evidence in the case. As to appellant's second contention that the court did not require, nor did the plaintiff offer, upon the trial any evidence showing the amount of money necessary for the support and maintenance of the alleged minor child, we find it also to be without the semblance of merit. The trial court had the parties before it and investigated the station in life of each as well as the earning capacity of the defendant and the condition and needs of the mother and child. The evidence educed as to these matters furnished the trial court all that was necessary to enable it to determine what amount would be reasonable for the support of the child. The order made thereon was moderate and was fully supported by the evidence in the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte ROSENCRANTZ.

Cr. 3414.

Supreme Court of California.
March 17, 1931.

1. Constitutional law 🔑250.
Criminal law 🔑1206(1).

Statute fixing maximum punishment for fraudulently issuing checks, and giving judge discretion regarding confinement in jail or state prison, held not discriminatory (Pen. Code, § 476a).

Since every person charged with offense involved has the same chance for leniency as well as the same possibility of receiving maximum sentence, there is no discrimination.

2. Criminal law 🔑1202(1).

Defendant who pleaded guilty and was granted probation without judgment of conviction held not "convicted of felony" within statute imposing life imprisonment on fourth conviction (Pen. Code, §§ 17, 644).

Pen. Code, § 644, imposes life imprisonment without eligibility for parole on fourth conviction of any felony. Section 17 makes distinction between felony and misdemeanor depend on nature of punishment, and provides that, when crime is punishable either by imprisonment in state prison or in county jail, it is a misdemeanor for all purposes after a judgment imposing any punishment other than imprisonment in state prison.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of Convicted; Conviction, see Words and Phrases.]

3. Criminal law 🔑1211.

Defendant convicted of fraudulently issuing checks, having been previously convicted and imprisoned for felony, held liable under statute to maximum punishment (Pen. Code, § 476a, and § 667, subd. 1).

Petition by Evelyn Rosencrantz for a writ of habeas corpus against the Warden of San Quentin State Prison.

Writ discharged.

Thos. T. Califro, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

LANGDON, J.

This is a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

Petitioner was tried in the superior court of Alameda county and convicted of a violation of section 476a of the Penal Code. The information filed against her also charged the prior conviction of three separate felonies. Petitioner admitted the second and third, but denied the alleged first prior conviction. A finding against her was made on this issue, and she was thereupon sentenced to life imprisonment without eligibility for parole, under the provisions of section 644 of the Penal Code.

Petitioner has heretofore made application for writs of habeas corpus to this court, as well as to the superior court of Marin county and to the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, all of which applications were denied. It is urged, however, that the grounds for the present petition are raised here for the first time, and accordingly we have examined them with great care.

[1] The contention is made that section 476a of the Penal Code is unconstitutional, in that by reason of the discretion which it gives to the trial judge to sentence the convicted offender either to the state prison or the county jail, it is discriminatory in operation, and constitutes a denial of equal protection of the laws. The legislative practice of vesting in trial courts or juries discretion in fixing punishments, within certain limits, is quite general and not new. Since every person charged with the offense has the same chance for leniency as well as the same possibility of receiving the maximum sentence, there is nothing discriminatory in the statute.

[2] The main point urged in the petition is that the judgment and commitment under section 644 of the Penal Code was improper because, it is contended, petitioner had not previously been convicted of three prior felonies. It is asserted that the alleged first conviction never occurred. The record shows that she was charged on January 12, 1920, in the county of San Diego, with violation of the same statute as in her later convictions. She pleaded guilty and was granted probation for a period of two years. No judgment of conviction was pronounced by the court. The question is whether this constitutes the conviction of a felony within the meaning of Penal Code, § 644.

It is established in this state, both by statute and judicial decision, that whether a crime is a misdemeanor or a felony is to be determined by the punishment; and where a crime is punishable either by incarceration in the state prison or the county jail, the sentence actually given determines the nature of the offense. Cal. Pen. Code, § 17; People v. Bigelow, 94 Cal. App. 28, 270 P. 460. Hence if petitioner had been sentenced to the state prison, she would have been convicted of a felony; and had she been sentenced to the county jail, she would have been convicted of a misdemeanor. However, she was not sentenced at all, nor was any judgment of conviction pronounced; and this appears to us to be decisive of the problem. There being no conviction, there is nothing to bring this first case within the provisions of section 644.

[3] It therefore appears that petitioner should not have been sentenced to life imprisonment without possibility of parole; nor does her case come within the language of section 644 providing for life imprisonment with eligibility for parole after two prior convictions for certain enumerated felonies. Issuing checks with intent to defraud is not one of these specified felonies. The applicable section is obviously Penal Code, § 667, subdivision 1, which provides: "If the offense of which such person is subsequently convicted is such that, upon a first conviction, an offender would be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, such person is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for the maximum period for which he might have been sentenced, if such offense had been his first offense." Under this section, petitioner is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for the maximum period provided for a violation of Penal Code, § 476a, which is fourteen years.

[4] The judgment committing petitioner to incarceration in the state prison for life without eligibility for parole was therefore improper; but inasmuch as petitioner should have been sentenced to the state prison anyway, there is at the present time no ground upon which she may be discharged from custody. We gave consideration to this precise question in a prior application of petitioner (In re Rosencrantz, 205 Cal. 534, 271 P. 902, 905), and we there said, quoting from In re Morck, 180 Cal. 384, 181 P. 657, "It is the established practice of the Supreme Court not to consider any question of excess of sentence until the expiration of the time for which the prisoner may be lawfully confined. * * * It is clear, therefore, that a writ should not be granted at this time."

It follows that the writ must be discharged, and it is so ordered.

Offense of possession of still is established where it is shown that all parts are in possession and immediate control of person, ready for connection.

2. Intoxicating liquors 🔑236(4).

Possession of pipe and gasoline for use with still were sufficient circumstances to warrant finding of guilty of aiding and abetting in possession of still.

Pipe in possession of accused fitted perfectly into still found on premises and was intended to be component part of particular still, while gasoline was the only fuel with which still could be operated, in addition to which the still was ready for use, except for such piece of pipe and gasoline necessary to operate it.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal in 291 P. 857.

Elliott H. Barrett, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Warner I. Praul, of Los Angeles, for the People.

PER CURIAM.

This cause was originally appealed to the District Court of Appeal where it was heard, and by a divided court the judgment of the trial court was reversed. Upon petition of the Attorney General, we ordered a transfer to this court. After due consideration given to the opinions rendered by the members of the District Court of Appeal at the time this cause was before said court, we are satisfied that the dissenting opinion, written by Gates, justice pro tem., correctly states the views of this court upon the questions presented by this appeal. We, therefore, adopt the following portions of said opinion (291 P. 857, 858) as the opinion of this court:

"On the evening of December 13, 1929, at about 9 p. m. of that day, an investigator and other members of the enforcement squad of the district attorney's office called at a residence on Warfield avenue, Los Angeles. Upon their arrival at the above place, they saw one of the defendants, Octeau, walking from the driveway. One of the officers took him by the arm and walked into the house. In the house they found in the kitchen a still, with condenser, coil, and gooseneck. In the next room they discovered a pressure tank with some sugar and empty one-gallon bottles. In the front room and front bedrooms, around the walls, were sixteen fifty-gallon barrels of mash. In the front living room were two fifteen-gallon barrels of whisky, and also forty-five gallons of whisky and brandy. According to the people's witness, the still was operated by gasoline burners, and was capable of producing intoxicating liquor containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. by volume fit for beverage purposes. Defendant Octeau told the officers, if they would permit him to remain outside, others connected with the still would soon drive up; that he was only the watchman. The officers permitted him to remain outside. Presently a Chevrolet coupe arrived outside the house, the occupants of which were the appellant, his wife, and defendant Cotton. These people were immediately placed under arrest. On the back seat of the car driven by appellant was found People's Exhibit 2. From a personal inspection of this exhibit, it appears that it is not a single ordinary piece of pipe, but consists of three separate and distinct pieces, which are screwed together, viz.: First, a one-inch by six-inch galvanized iron nipple; second, a one-inch by three-quarter inch reducer; and, third, a three-quarter inch standard male hose nipple. The evidence clearly showed that this exhibit was not a piece of pipe that might be used for any purpose, but, on the contrary, it fitted perfectly into a connection on top of the mash pump, which pump was a part of the still found on the premises. The one-inch by six-inch galvanized iron nipple screwed into the mash pump, one end of the reducer fitted into the galvanized iron nipple, and the other end of the reducer, the smaller end, fitted into the mash hose. In addition to People's Exhibit 2, there was taken from appellant's car two five-gallon cans of gasoline, which appellant stated he had purchased for his truck but had forgotten. It also appeared from the evidence that without the addition of People's Exhibit 2, the connection above referred to, the still found on the premises was usable, but with the addition of People's Exhibit 2 it became a more complete and efficient still—one easier to operate. This is illustrated by the testimony of Officer Summers, a portion of whose testimony is as follows:

" 'A. I took the piece of pipe (People's Exhibit 2) from McDonnell. (The investigator who had previously taken the piece of pipe [People's Exhibit 2] from appellant's car.)

" 'Q. By Mr. Holland: People's Exhibit 2?

" 'A. Yes, sir,—and screwed an iron connection which had been on the table in the kitchen—and screwed that onto the mash pump.

" 'Q. Will you show the jury that connection, please?

" 'A. (Illustrating.) Screwed that into the mash pump and then screwed the piece of pipe (People's Exhibit 2) into that connection and then attached the mash hose onto the other end of the reducer, and there we had a complete outfit for the operation of this still, but without that piece of pipe (People's Exhibit 2) we would have not been able to.

" 'Q. By Mr. Reams: You mean pump?

" 'A. You would have a hard time running that still if you hadn't that mash pump.

" 'Q. By the Court: You referred to a complete still. You mean a complete pump?

" 'A. Yes. This piece of pipe (People's Exhibit 2) was the one thing missing to make this still and this pump and this apparatus complete, and without that (People's Exhibit 2) you would have had to pour your mash with a bucket into the still, but with that piece of pipe (People's Exhibit 2) you could pump it in, which is the customary way.'

"It also appeared that the defendant Octeau rented the premises under an assumed name while in the company of the defendant Cotton. Appellant and Cotton were acquainted with each other. Octeau admitted ownership of the still, after having first claimed that he was the watchman on the premises. Appellant denied having any interest in the still. His story was: That he met the defendant Cotton on Warfield avenue on his way home from work. He offered to help Cotton, who had a flat tire. That he took him over to Twenty-Eighth street to get his key to his spare tire. That when they came near the house in question, he was arrested by Officer McDonnell. He was taken inside of the house and questioned. It is also shown by the evidence that, upon being interrogated by the officers as to the use of People's Exhibit 2, he stated that it might be used for a lot of things. People's Exhibit 2 was on the back seat of his car. He stated: That he got it from a plumber who works for the Edison Company. That he took this particular connection (People's Exhibit 2) around, thinking that he might need it. He did not state for what purpose he might need it. He also stated that he had the gasoline in the car to use; that it had been there for about ten days.

"It further appears from the evidence that appellant, in traveling on Warfield avenue, which is not a through main street, was driving out of his ordinary course or way from his work to his home. Appellant first denied that he knew Cotton, but later, when it was shown that appellant and Cotton resided about a year before at the same address, he admitted he knew him.

[1, 2] "Appellant's first contention that the still found on the premises had not been completely set up is met by the evidence that the still was complete and could have been used for the purpose for which it was intended, but that without the addition of People's Exhibit 2 it would not have been as efficient. Irrespective of whether this still was a completed still, it is immaterial, for it is well settled that the offense of possession of a still is established where it is shown that all of the parts are in the possession and immediate control of a person, ready to be connected up and used. Bradley v. State, 171 Ark. 1083, 287 S. W. 387; McGarity v. State, 151 Ark. 423, 236 S. W. 611; Gamble v. State, 19 Ala. App. 82, 95 So. 202. Appellant insists that People's Exhibit 2 is not such a portion of a still as to come within the terms of the statute. * * * It must be borne in mind that appellant was not convicted of having a part or parts of something that might be used in connection with a still in his possession. He was tried and convicted with his codefendants of having in his possession a still, the still found on the premises. Appellant's contention, however, would be tenable if he had been found with People's Exhibit 2 in his possession and there was no other evidence to connect him and People's Exhibit 2 with the particular still found on the premises. However, the fact that appellant had in his possession these three connected pieces of pipe (People's Exhibit 2), which unquestionably, to my mind, is and was intended to be a component part of this particular still, which part fitted perfectly into the still found on the premises; together with the fact that he had in his possession two five-gallon cans of gasoline, gasoline being the only fuel with which the still could be operated, these facts, together with his lack of explanation, acquaintance with codefendants, the fact that the still was ready for use and that the only things lacking to effectively and efficiently operate it were People's Exhibit 2 and the gasoline to fire it up, which were both brought by appellant, without any explanation on his part that the articles did not belong to him, are sufficient circumstances in themselves to warrant the jury in finding appellant guilty of aiding and abetting his codefendants in possession of the still found on the premises.

[3] "It is well settled that, where one has been charged with the unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquor, it is proper to permit parts carried by the defendant to be put together, in the presence of the jury, with other parts found with a still, to determine whether they belonged together, and the value of this evidence is for the jury. Hixson v. State, 158 Ark. 642, 239 S. W. 1057.

[4, 5] "It is also clear that one may be guilty of aiding and abetting another in the possession of a still. Washington v. State, 21 Ala. App. 239, 107 So. 34. And likewise, it is well established by the cases that a defendant's connection with a crime of this kind may be shown either by positive proof or by circumstantial evidence which excludes every other reasonable hypothesis except that of guilt. 33 C. J. 777. It was stated by this court in People v. Baker, 94 Cal. App. 628, 271 P. 765, 767, that 'Circumstantial evidence need not, in order to justify the inference of legal guilt, consist of inculpatory facts which are absolutely and to the point of demonstration incompatible with innocence. "A conviction in the minds of the jurors to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, arising from the evidence of the defendant's guilt, is sufficient." People v. Bellamy, 109 Cal. 610, 42 P. 236. Circumstantial evidence may be as conclusive in its convincing force as the testimony of direct witnesses to the overt act. "Circumstances very largely control the conduct of men in the most important affairs of life, and may be sufficient to justify a conviction of crime where they are such as to exclude any other reasonable theory than that of the guilt of the accused." People v. Nagy, 199 Cal. 235, 248 P. 906.' * * *

[6] "The District Court of Appeal, in People v. Kiser, 24 Cal. App. 540, 141 P. 1078, has enunciated the principle that the direct testimony of the accused may be so contradicted by circumstantial evidence alone that the jury need not believe it. And, also, it is a well-settled principle of law in this state that, although the defendant's own story exculpates him, it is for the jury to say whether that story should be believed. People v. Rongo, 169 Cal. 71, 145 P. 1017; People v. Sears, 119 Cal. 267, 51 P. 325; People v. Billings, 34 Cal. App. 549, 168 P. 396; People v. Stephens, 29 Cal. App. 616, 157 P. 570, 572.

[7] "In the instant case the jury's verdict indicates that they did not believe the appellant's story; the effect of this finding being that the testimony of the appellant, positive though it seems to be, is contradicted by the circumstantial evidence, which evidence, to my mind, is amply sufficient to support the verdict of guilt."

The judgment is affirmed.
